An Account of John Hancock, Esq; President of the Congress of the United Colonies of the Continent of North-America.

With an elegant and striking Likeness, beautifully engraved from an original Picture.

JOHAN HANDCOCK, Esq; was born in the province of Massachusetts-Bay, in North-America, in which he enjoyed a very considerable fortune. From the first disturbances in America, about the stamp-act, he took a very active part in the defence of, what he concluded to be, the rights and liberties of his native country. When delegates were first chosen to meet in Continental Congress, he was elected one of the representatives for his province; and on the death of Peyton Randolph, Esq; was unanimously chosen president. His eloquence was manifested by his very spirited oration on the anniversary of the massacre at Boston; and his coolness must be acknowledged, when it is known that most of the dutiful addresses, and conciliatory proposals, originated from his pen. He is at present in his thirty-eighth year, and was married last autumn to one of the most beautiful and accomplished ladies in America, who brought him a very considerable addition to his paternal fortune; yet he scorned to lay down in the lap of ease, but resolved to devote all his abilities to the benefit of that country, whose united voice, from a knowledge of his many virtues, called him to preside over the free elected representatives of the whole continent.

January, 1776.

Caracaras and Zedaria; an Indian Tale.

THE name of Caracaras had been heard with terror by the Spaniards, long after their settlement in South America; he was a prince descended from the inca's of Peru, and most of his ancestors had been sacrificed to the treachery and inhumanity of the christian invaders. He had taken the field twice against the Spanish viceroy with great success, and would in all probability have possessed himself of the city of Mexico, but for the baseness of his own countrymen, who insidiously betrayed him to Don Lopez, one of the Spanish generals.

Finding his head quarters surpris'd, Caracaras, accompanied by his son Guyomar and a few faithful followers, cut his way through a host of the enemy, in the most desperate manner. He fled with precipitation to the mountains, where he was sure to find a temporary asylum from the malice of his foes. The Spaniards by this stroke had gained a capital advantage; such of the Mexicans, who were not destroyed in the attack, laid down their arms, and became slaves to the conquerors, who possessed themselves at the same time of an immense treasure, which the unfortunate Caracaras had accumulated for recovering the liberties of his country.

Among

Among the prisoners made by the Spaniards, were his wife Orella, and his daughter Zedaria, a beautiful girl, about twelve years of age; they were taken undistinguished among the tumult, and carried to Mexico, with a great number of unhappy captives. Orella took particular pains to conceal her rank from the Spaniards, hoping she and Zedaria were more likely to escape, as private persons, than if their real characters were known. They were settled in the family of Don Lopez, who had been lately married to the daughter of the viceroy. This lady, though a native of Spain, felt greatly for the sufferings of the miserable people over whom her father exercised his authority. She no sooner saw Zedaria, than she became prejudiced in her favour, and placed her and her mother, after a short time, among those attendants who were constantly about her person.

Orella had formed several plans to escape to her affectionate Caracaros; but the great distance of the place where he was posted from Mexico, and the continual successes of the Spaniards against such of the natives as made any opposition to their progress, deterred her from attempting to put any of them into execution. The repeated alarms she suffered, and her anxiety for the fate of her husband, threw her into a malady which nature was not able to sustain, and she died some months after, in the arms of Zedaria, conjuring her, in her last moments, to pursue the fortune of her father, and never to depart from the religion of her country.

Caracaros did not continue long in the place where he first took refuge, but with Guyomar, and a small number of his troops, penetrated through a desert part of the country, till they arrived at a warlike nation of Indians, who had been long settled on the borders of the great South-Sea, where he hoped by his representations of the Spanish tyranny to gain some assistance for his desponding brethren, who groaned under their yoke.

He spent a considerable time among these people, without being able to effectuate his purpose in the manner he expected. As a nation, these people were by no means inclined to commence hostilities against an army of Europeans, who from report could command thunder and lightning to destroy their assailants; they however gave Caracaros leave to raise as many men as would voluntarily enter into his service. With this permission he in a short time augmented his troops to about 1500, with whom he returned towards Mexico, not doubting but that his army would be considerably increased, when his adherents heard he was once more able to act offensively.

During these transactions, the Lady of Don Lopez had behaved with the greatest tenderness to her favourite Zedaria, who was so filled with gratitude for the obligations she had received, and so little able to oppose the arguments which were made use of to prevail on her to renounce Paganism, that she readily embraced the Catholic religion, and was christened with great ceremony by the name of Mariana.

Don Sebastian, the youngest son of a Grandee of Spain, who commanded a troop of horse under Don Lopez, and occasionally visited his family, was so struck with the beauty and accomplishments of this amiable captive, that he felt great uneasiness on the occasion. He was too much a man of honour to violate the laws of hospitality by attempting to seduce her from the protection of his friend, and had too much pride to think of declaring a virtuous passion for an obscure slave, who was supposed to be the offspring of a Peruvian peasant. A report which Orella, in order to conceal her quality, had successfully propagated.

Sebastian, however, could not absent himself from the object of his admiration, and every day added to the violence of his passion, which was at length discovered by Don Lopez, who had long secretly entertained unlawful views upon his wife's favourite. He determined therefore to break off their connection as soon as possible, and, pretending to be greatly offended with Sebastian's conduct, forbade him his house. The lady of Lopez was carried off by a sudden illness about this period, an accident which gave Sebastian the utmost concern, as he had for some time suspected a rival in that General; and, trembling for the consequences of Mariana being in his power, was determined at all events to rescue her from destruction.

For this purpose, despising the ridicule to which he laid himself open by the declaration, he boldly avowed his affection for Mariana, and applied to the Viceroy for leave to marry her in public. This request was not complied with; but the Governor directed, that, as the girl was a Christian, and as her kind mistress had made her free some time before her dissolution, she should be at liberty to leave the family of Lopez, whenever she thought proper.

The Spanish General, irritated at these proceedings, caused his attendants to remove move Mariana in the night to a village about six miles from the capital, near the place where his head-quarters were fixed.

Caracaros, agreeable to his wishes, was joined by great numbers of the wretched natives in his march, and fortunately fell in with a body of 1200 Peruvians, who were engaged in the same cause with himself, and determined to sacrifice their lives in defence of their country. With this force he encompassed the advanced guard of the Spaniards, who little imagined their foes were so formidable, and cut most of them in pieces. Lopez himself narrowly escaped being taken prisoner, and fled with disgrace into the capital. The village to which Mariana had been sent fell into the hands of Caracaros at the same time; and, as she was richly habited, she was supposed to be a person of no small distinction, and as such brought into the presence of her father. Four years had now elapsed since he last beheld her, and though time had greatly improved her infant beauties, the instant he cast his eyes upon her, he recollected her to be his long lost child. She threw herself at his feet, and was unable to speak the effusions of her heart, from the surprise and joy which possessed her. After mutual caresses, she was sent under the conduct of her brother Guyomar to a town called Mestees, at that time garrisoned by the Mexicans, as a place of security, while Caracaros was determined to pursue his advantage, and push on to the walls of the capital.

The next morning however he found it necessary to alter his resolution, as he received certain intelligence that a body of the Spaniards and their auxiliaries, consisting of four times his numbers, were strongly posted within a league of the city, and his followers seemed to be unanimous in resolving not to hazard a battle against such superior force.

For these reasons he, though unwillingly, wheeled about, and divided his troops into small bodies, in order to harass the enemy, fixing the general rendezvous at Mestees, where he had dispatched Guyomar the day before.

In the dead of the night, a messenger arrived at the camp of Caracaros with the unwelcome tidings that the detachment, which had been sent off under the command of Guyomar, had been defeated by a troop of Spanish horse, and that the gallant youth had been mortally wounded by the Spanish Chief, whose principal object seemed to be the carrying off Zedaria, in which he had unfortunately succeeded.

The distress our noble Indian felt upon this occasion can be easier imagined than described: He started from his tent, frantic at the intelligence; and flew to Mestees, where he had the mournful satisfaction of embracing Guyomar, just before he expired. The youth had fought with uncommon courage hand to hand with the chief of the enemy, who made his attack in the most desperate manner, and who no sooner saw Zedaria in the hands of his followers, than he ordered them to desist from the combat, which was entirely in his own favour, and rode off in triumph.

This Spanish officer was no other than Don Sebastian, who, being posted with a body of horse within a few miles of the head quarters of Don Lopez, no sooner discovered that the enemy had carried off his adorable Mariana, than he determined to recover her, or die in the attempt. To this end he selected a band of soldiers, whose valour he had often experienced, and proceeded to watch the motions of Caracaros, from one of whose straggling troops he learned the circumstance of Mariana's being sent to Mestees; on which he pursued the detachment with the utmost celerity, overtook and defeated it as above mentioned.

The beautiful Indian was not a little surprised at the sight of Sebastian, who loaded her with caresses, while she expressed her apprehensions for Guyomar's safety with the greatest anxiety. This led her to explain to Sebastian who she really was, and to acquaint him with the reasons which occasioned her to keep her being the daughter of Caracaros a secret. The Spaniard was alarmed at this information; he was conscious he had given her brother his mortal wound, but thought it best for the present to conceal it from her, and use every means in his power to alleviate her sorrow.

An inundation, occasioned by the melting of snow on the high mountains, which is common in that quarter of the globe, prevented Sebastian from returning to the capital the usual road; and, in endeavouring to ford a small river which had been greatly increased by the floods, he was suddenly surrounded by one of the parties which Caracaros had dispatched to harass the enemy. He fought courageously for some minutes; but his horse, receiving a wound from one of the enemy's arrows, in spite of his efforts to prevent him, jumped into the flood, and was carried down the stream with the utmost rapidity. His troops, being pressed by a superior force, were presently broken and put to flight, while Zedaria once more fell into the hands of the Mexicans, to whom she directly made herself known, and desired to be conveyed to her father.

Caracaros, penetrated with the most lively grief for the death of his son, had retired to an unfrequented cave near Mestees, which had frequently afforded him an asylum from his enemies, and which he now pitched upon as the burial place for the lamented youth. The sight of his daughter threw a suffusion of joy over his countenance; he tenderly embraced her, and, after hearing the manner in which she had been treated by Sebastian, suspected she had a partiality in his favour. He was soon confirmed in his conjecture, by her hinting that Sebastian desired nothing more than to put an end to the bloody war which had been so long carried on with the natives; and that, as a proof of his earnest wishes for a happy reconciliation, he had instructed her to acquaint Caracaros that he should esteem the hand of his daughter the greatest honour which could be conferred upon him.

The valiant Indian started at these words, and, darting a look full of resentment at Zedaria, struck into the cave, from whence he instantly returned bearing a bloody robe, which displaying before her: "Behold," said he, "degenerate girl, these fatal stains. This is thy brother's vestment; his blood cries loudly for vengeance on that villain whose praises you have just been so lavish in." Zedaria was filled with horror at these words; she sunk senseless upon the ground, and was conveyed soon after by her attendants to Mestees, where the disturbance of her mind threw her into a disorder from which the most melancholy consequences were apprehended.

Sebastian, after being carried a considerable way down the stream, with difficulty reached the opposite shore, from whence, wandering some time through unfrequented paths, he at length arrived at a village garrisoned by the Spaniards. Here he learned the important news that Don Lopez had resigned his military employments, and that he himself was advanced to the chief command of the Spanish forces. This intelligence greatly relieved the perturbation of his mind, and, after making the necessary dispositions for dislodging the enemy, he sent overtures of a very honourable nature to Caracaros, and repeated the offer he had before made, with respect to his daughter. The inflexible Indian, however, would hearken to no terms of accommodation, and pursued his operations with redoubled vigour. Tired of making war in detail, this intrepid chief encouraged his troops to hazard a general battle. In order to deceive the Spaniards, the natives made a feint of retiring before them. The Europeans pushed close upon their rear, till the Mexicans came between two hills, within a few miles of Mestees, when they suddenly made a stand, and Sebastian found himself flanked by two bodies of his enemies. The action presently became general; but, from Caracaros's having received a shot in his lungs, and the enemy's artillery being admirably served, the Indians became disheartened, and were soon put to flight, notwithstanding their advantageous situation. A great slaughter ensued, and Caracaros, with the shattered remains of his troops, took refuge in Mestees, which was immediately after invested by the victor, and summoned instantly to surrender. The Indian chief, finding his death was at hand, sent for his daughter, who was now in a state of recovery from the malady she had suffered. Zedaria came weeping into his presence; she fell upon her knees, and kissed her father's hand; but he turned himself from her, and, after upbraiding her with betraying her country, sacrificing the Gods of her fathers, and wishing to marry the murderer of her brother, stabbed her to the heart.

This ferocious act of savage patriotism struck all the beholders with horror. A few minutes after Sebastian, to whom the gates had been opened by the people, upon his solemn promise that their lives should be spared, entered the mournful apartment, when Caracaros, observing him petrified with astonishment at the dreadful spectacle, in dying accents addressed him to this purport: 'Christian, my son's revenged;—thou shalt not o'er his grave exult—my daughter owes her death to thee—fare thee well, and know that Caracaros despised thy offers, as he wished not to survive the freedom of his country.' Here death stopped his further utterance, and the attention of the spectators was attracted by Sebastian, who threw himself upon the body of the lifeless Mariana, in an agony of despair; and it was with the utmost difficulty his attendants could separate him from her.

She was interred with great funeral pomp a short time after in the Cathedral Church.

Church at Mexico, by the direction of her lover, who caused a monument to be erected to her memory, containing an inscription, reciting her melancholy story, engraved in letters of gold.

To Mr. John Wesley.

S I R,

I have read your address to the Americans with much surprise and concern. That a man, after a long life devoted to the awful concerns of religion, and of a rigidity of morals strikingly contrasted to the times, should in his old age step forth a champion in political controversy, is a paradox only to be solved by a reflection on the general motives of such compositions. They exhibit a proof, Mr. Wesley, that the most perfect of men have hopes upon earth as well as in the heavens; and indeed you have the moderation and the sincerity not to forbid us to believe so. When you deliver your opinion, you say you may be the better believed because unbiassed, and then express yourself in this unguarded language, "I gain nothing by the Americans, or by the government, and probably never shall." This is not only an invitation to the minister to reward your pious labours, but a thorn in his foot if he overlooks them. Had you said, and positively never will, I should then (as I always have) believed you to be an honest and a pious man, and should have fallen asleep over your Calm Address, till a fit of your enthusiasm had awaked me.

You are surely, Sir, too well acquainted with the nature and workings of human passions, to expect any good to arrive from a calm address to men (as you say the Americans are) under the dominion of enthusiasm. The experience of your whole life has been the influence of enthusiasm over the calm; but your success as a schismatic is a sufficient proof, that, once aroused, neither reason or sober sense can controul it.

I have seen, Mr. Wesley, near a hundred persons, whose consciences or understandings were affected under your ministry, fall into convulsions; see angels and demons by turns, converse alternately with God and the devil; your female devotees imagine themselves the carnal spouses of Christ; and have seen the most learned divines opposing their arguments to these deliriums, with as little effect as Canute speaking to the ocean.

When a chimæra, without a substantial basis, or a visible object, can thus triumph over the reason and the will, and laugh argument to scorn, can it be hoped, Mr. Wesley, that men acting upon the known and established systems of human policy, irritated to enthusiasm in the contention for every thing that is dear, will turn aside to listen to your address? Can it be hoped, that the two-penny pamphlet of a lay methodist preacher will influence the camps of the Americans, or the congresses of New Senators? You certainly have the enthusiasm to believe, that the name of John Wesley is to operate as an exorcism! For how otherwise can you be useful? Every argument that the deepest knowledge of our laws and policy, prostituted to the arbitrary designs of g——, have already been prepalled and exhibited against America. The crown, from the beginning of those disturbances, has employed to no purpose the ablest pens—men practised in all the arts and sophistries of political logic; while you, Mr. Wesley, have been accustomed, from your youth, only to write and to speak on subjects that escape the controul of the understanding; where faith and imagination are the guardians of the will, because the data of the propositions are beyond the evidence of the senses. This is very visible, Sir, in the political specimen before me. It is plain that you have not lived amongst men, nor considered the principles of their laws and political constitutions. You had been much better employed, could you have persevered in your heavenly course, and not, like Lot's wife, have cast a look back upon Sodom.

You begin your pamphlet with these words:

"The grand question which is now debated, (and with warmth enough on both sides) is this, has the English parliament power to tax the American colonies?"

"In order to determine this, let us consider the nature of our colonies. An English colony is, a number of persons to whom the king grants a charter, permitting them to settle in some far country as a corporation, enjoying such powers as the charter grants, to be administered in such a manner as the charter prescribes."

This is as much as to assert, that a set of men living peaceably in England, had obtained a charter to settle for lucrative objects in America, and had migrated on the strength of that charter. But you cannot, Sir, be so totally unacquainted with the history of our church, as to believe your definition to be descriptive of an American colony.

You must, you cannot but know, Sir, that the original settlers of these colonies, fled from Great-Britain to a barren wilderness, to save themselves from religious and civil persecutions, under the odious reign of the Stuarts, or were ejected out of the mother country at the nod of tyrants.

You cannot be ignorant, Sir, that policy, and not friendship, procured those charters, after industry and perseverance in the honourable exiles had made the desert look fair, desirable, and worthy of appropriation. It was not till then that the unnatural mother began to spread her wing over her banished offspring, and to cherish them with her protection. As the staple commodities of the western continent grew into serious objects of commerce, interest and selfishness carried on the work which religion and liberty had begun. New families migrated, commerce flourished, British manufactures improved, and cultivation not only extended itself farther into the desert, but lands were transferred by tenures, from one to another, as in England, at high rates. This flourishing progress of empire was disturbed in the last war by European rivals. And indeed since men have overleapt the bounds set by Providence, and torn from the man of nature his humble possessions, they have ever been, and ever will continue to be, the bones of contention. It was in the last war that Great Britain laid herself under the necessity of defending her wide extended dominion, and of asserting her claim to be the first nation upon earth. The contest was bloody and expensive, but the end was glorious: the enemy prostrate and breathless, empire extended, honour maintained, peace established, and, like the sun rising after a storm, a young and native monarch holding the sceptre and ascending the throne, amidst the acclamations of the freest and happiest people on the globe!

These acclamations are heard no more. They have given place to such murmurs and discontents as are beyond your eloquence to quell. A system of corruption, established and digested early in this reign, has pervaded every rank and order of men, till the spirit of the constitution has fled, and left only the caput mortuum behind. The forms of our free government have outlasted the ends for which they were instituted, and have become a mere mockery of the people for whose benefit they should operate; and in such deplorable æras, an ultimate appeal rests in human nature, in human policy, and in human experience in the many, whose advantages are the ultimate ends of all government; and although men have seldom virtue enough to new model a constitution on an equitable basis, they will always have spirit in the end to overturn a corrupt one. Nor is there that scene of misery which you prognosticate to be expected, from even a total separation of America, or its formation into a republic, if this country forces it by injustice into measures not originally imagined or proposed. Human policy is not only refined into a moderate and equitable science; but that daemon of dissension is buried deep in oblivion and contempt, which under the banners of the cross and of the crescent disgraced for many ages the annals of Europe, and made the fields of cultivation more dreadful than the wilderness.

It is bigotry, it is religious enthusiasm, Mr. Wesley, which has alone, and so often deluged the world in blood. It is when men fight for they know not what; when the object is hid in the clouds, or evaporates in dreams, that they become savages and brutes, and it is when they expect to be fed with manna from Heaven, that they die of hunger in their camps, and give up the enterprize.

But when men with a reasonable dependance on God, and in an honest cause, act upon human principles of justice and success, and in an enlightened age build a form of government on the experience of past ages, avoiding the bad, and improving even on the best, the prospect is not so gloomy as you suggest. You are only a servant, not a prophet of God, and must therefore forgive my want of faith in your augurs.

I will now discuss, in a few words, the doctrine of taxation, which you have misrepresented by the denial of an acknowledged maxim in our government, viz. that every freeman is governed by laws to which he has consented, which you assert to be false.

That great empires cannot make laws in collective bodies, and that many thousands in the freest nations have not the legislative rights of freemen, is true; and that men live in obedience to laws made before their birth, is likewise true. But it does not follow from hence, that the community is less free, if the spirit of its government continues, and operates along with its form; because it is impossible to frame a human society where, where some portion of natural liberty is not sacrificed for the quiet preservation of the rest. And those men who have not industry or capacity to arrive at the attributes of legislative freemen, have nevertheless all the immunities, privileges and protection which the laws afford to the highest, and hold their lives and properties by the same tenures that the monarch holds his head or his throne, viz. the preservation of the political constitution. Whenever these rights are invaded, the government is dissolved, and strength becomes the decider of right.

But upon what tenure do Americans hold their properties as freemen, if, without the wholesome deliberations of their own delegates, who can be singly judges of American interests, they are to be bound by acts of parliament which mutilate and destroy property? of what use are their assemblies, and their popular representatives, if they are only to be the instrument of outward oppression, and not the protectors of inward strength and independence? are not the people of Ireland, oppressed as they are, allowed at least to be the victims of their own corrupt parliament? and although British acts, where Ireland is specified, reach there in abrogation of the common and statute law, yet do they reach to no new impositions of excise or customs, without the votes of the Irish senate.

Why then are the Americans to be less free than Ireland? the reason is plain; because the crown hoped that the murmurs of oppression would die in their passage across the Atlantic; that the Gorgon of corruption might be fed by American spoils with less clamour and less danger than at home; and that if, by a gentle exertion of authority, it could establish a prescriptive right of taxation, the veins of America might be opened at will, to confirm the influence of the throne over the liberties of the people.

The crown has been deceived. The Americans have discovered that the Monarch and the legislature are become one. They have considered an act of the British parliament as only the inhalation of the royal breath, and an equal infringement on British and American rights, which from analogy must ever suffer together. They think they are defending both; and the event will in the end discover who have been the least wise, if not who have been the least just.

And now, Mr. Wesley, I take my leave of you. You have forgot the precept of your master, that God and Mammon cannot be served together.

You have one eye on a pension, and the other upon heaven; one hand stretched out to the King, and the other raised up to God, I pray that the first may reward you, and that the last may forgive you.

AMERICUS.

A Dialogue in the Shades, between the late Lord Chesterfield, and the late Doctor Goldsmith.

L. C. BELIEVE me, Goldsmith, if you had paid a little more court to the Graces, you would not only have passed your life more comfortably, but have reaped infinitely greater advantages from your abilities.

Gold. I am surprized to hear a person of your lordship's good sense speak in this manner; as I lived agreeable to choice, and do not recollect to have once regretted the absence of the graces, I cannot conceive what injury I sustained by the want of them; in a nobleman they may be requisite, but what could an author get by them? they would not enhance his merit with a bookseller, or with the public, as by his writings a judgment is formed of his character.

L. C. But did you never mix with the world? does a man when he commences author entirely abandon society? at such times how contemptible must an awkward sheepish fellow appear, stammering and blushing if he attempts but to open his lips, and seemingly as great a stranger to his own legs and arms as to the company which embarrasses him: for my part I always made the Graces my study, and found them of infinitely greater advantage to me than any other acquisition. How flattering must it have been to my vanity, to think, I could claim the attention of a whole circle, by the elegance of my manner, and the sweetness and propriety of my expression!

Gold. Admit your lordship's position to be strictly just, and that those accomplishments which you have lavished such praises on, are worth attending to, do you suppose them within the reach of every body?

L. C. Certainly, whoever is in earnest in his addresses may depend on being crowned with success.

Gold. What is the meaning then, that Mr. Stanhope your own son, with whom you took so much pains, failed?

L. C. He wanted industry; he was too indolent.

Gold.

Gold. As considerable obstacles, in my opinion, to becoming an adept in the science of good-breeding, as a man can be clogged with; but beside this extreme love of ease, which peculiarly distinguishes men of genius, what leisure, what opportunity, have they to learn politeness? if they cultivate their talents, three parts of their time must be devoted to study.

L. C. I am very glad you have started that objection, as I fancy I can set you right upon that head—you must allow lord Bolingbroke to have been a man of erudition and abilities, and yet his deportment was graceful, and his address captivating to the last degree.

Gold. In that ingenious nobleman, I acknowledge, learning and good breeding were united. But one instance is not sufficient to convert me to your lordship's opinion; then his exalted station furnished him with opportunity which persons of an inferior class are destitute of: fifty to one, had he been born in a more humble sphere he would have been as uncouth as any body else, who had spent most of his life in study; for instance, I have often heard yourself declare, that on your first setting out in the world, you suffered so much from mauvaise honte as almost to determine you to forsake the beau monde: now Sir, if you had as little rank, and as few friends to support you under your diffidence as I had, how would you have become so great a favourite with the Graces.

L. C. Why faith, Goldsmith, I must confess there is a good deal of truth in what you assert. However, it must be allowed, that if the doctrine which I took so much pains to inculcate could be put in execution, it would be of infinite service to mankind.

Gold. I am sorry that I am obliged to differ from your lordship. I think you set out upon wrong principles, but like many others of great wit, as you adopted them out of fondness, you were easily persuaded that they were right, and from the warmth of your imagination never wanted arguments to support your system; you were compleat master of the art of elegant dissipation, and the best caterer of pleasure I ever met with; but surely you cannot maintain that your doctrine rendered men more worthy or more useful members of society: you have furnished the blockhead with arms against the scholar, and advanced positions which your real character contradicted: for do you suppose, that if you had nothing to boast of but the polish of your manners, you would ever have cut the distinguished figure you did? Are you not sensible that every earthly blessing has its alloy; and that to be a genius and a fine gentleman are nearly incompatible? You entertained too high an opinion of the powers of human nature; you supposed her capable of more than she could perform, and therefore in the end found yourself disappointed. In our present state of spiritual existence, pure as we are, and divested of passions, I may speak my thoughts freely. In what degree of competition can any thing either you, Bolingbroke, or Lyttleton wrote, stand with the works of Addison, who you say was awkward; or of Johnson, whom you have ridiculed; or even with mine, the last, the meanest of the muses sons? Surely the least a man of talents can expect, for pleasing and instructing the world, is lenity for those foibles inseparably annexed to the constitution of his temper; but I must beg your lordship's pardon, yonder I see Addison and Virgil in deep conversation, I promised about this time to meet them; they are persons I never stand upon ceremony with, for you know they are both as awkward as myself.

Character of Lady Warren.

LADY Warren, the present wife of Sir George, is the daughter of Sir Cecil Bishop: she was early distinguished in the crystal circle of the court for beauty and wit; and was selected by his majesty upon his marriage with the princess Charlotte of Strelitz, to be one of the maids of honour to his queen. In that most honourable situation she married Sir G. Warren.

It has been disputed, but it cannot certainly be an argument with men and women of sense, whether a marriage of love or fortune serve most to constitute human felicity. Mutual love is the only delicious sweet, which fate has generously dashed into the cup of life—to make the nauseous bitter draught go down. They who possess the golden felicity, slide in smiles through the valley of life, and hang the fairest garlands on the funeral urn of care. But those, who, alas! are bound together with the obligatory knot of Hymen, sigh amidst luxury and grandeur, and envy the wife possessed of the man of her heart.

Such sad examples every age will show,
What Iphigenia was—is * * now.

Account of the Trial of David Roche, Esq; at the Sessions House in the Old Bailey, on Monday, December 11, 1775, for the Murder of Captain Ferguson, at the Cape of Good Hope, on the 4th of September, 1773. (For a Likeness of Mr. Roche, see our Mag. for December.)

AT half after eleven David Roche was brought down from Newgate, and fet to the bar.

Andrew Cairncross was first sworn, and deposed that he was surgeon of the Vansittart East-Indiaman; that the ship left England in May 1773; that the prisoner and the deceased both had commissions in the land service of the East-India company, and were passengers on board the Vansittart; that they had several disagreements while she was on her voyage, and that the prisoner rendered himself so obnoxious to the passengers on board, that he was voted out of the cabin mess; that the vessel touched at the island of Madeira, and that he thought all differences had been amicably adjusted at that time. That on the 4th of September the ship arrived at the Cape of Good Hope; that the deceased and he went on shore, with several of the passengers, at ten in the forenoon; that captain Roche and his wife went ashore in another boat in the afternoon; that the first party lodged at Mr. Chirand's; that they were sitting after tea in a room up stairs, with candles on the table, between six and seven in the evening; that a message was then brought to the deceased, informing him that captain Matthews wanted to speak to him; that he in consequence went down, and in about five minutes after, word was brought that some persons were fighting in the street; that he ran down, and met captain Roche within a few yards of the house; that he was sheathing his sword, and appeared to be making off as fast as he could; that about ten yards distance, he found captain Ferguson lying on the ground, with his sword by him, the end of it broke off; that he had a low pulse, and all the symptoms of a man in the agonies of death; that he was brought into Mr. Chirand's house, and expired immediately; that he afterwards examined the body, and found the deceased had received several wounds, apparently from a small sword, and all on the left * side, except one over his eye, which slanted to the crown of his head; that the wound which caused his death was over the pap of his left breast; that its orifice was an inch wide, and that it was five inches deep; that on probing it he found that the sword had glanced against the third rib, which gave it an oblique direction; that it had passed the intercostal muscles, the mediastinum, the pleura, the pericardium, and wounded the aorta, and entered the left ventricle of the heart. He further said, that when the affair happened, it was so dark that the clearest-sighted person could not see the length of a sword, and that the deceased had a visible defect in one eye, and could not see well with the other. That he heard a reward was offered for the apprehending of Roche, by the fiscal and governor of the place, but that he did not hear he was ever taken in consequence of that offer.

John Moody was next sworn, and deposed, that he went out surgeon's mate of the Vansittart East-Indiaman; that he knew the prisoner and the deceased had ill words, before they touched at the Madeiras; that he saw him make wry faces at the deceased, after they had left the Madeiras; that he heard him frequently declare, he wished to shorten the race of the Fergusons; that on the 2d of September, the night preceding the supposed murder, the prisoner sent for him to come to his cabin to see Mrs. Roche, who was indisposed; that he there entered into a conversation with him respecting his difference with Ferguson; that in it, he said he would chastise him when he came on shore; that he asked if he (the witness) thought Ferguson would accept a challenge if he sent him one; that he expressed an opinion that the deceased was the cause of his quarrel with the other passengers, and declared he did not think Ferguson a coward, but believed, if he challenged him, he'd meet; adding, that if he did not, by God he'd run him through the body; that he said his own sword was not good enough, and borrowed one of Mr. Edgworth, an officer, who was likewise a passenger, and that he (the witness) saw Mr. Edgworth lend the prisoner his sword in the morning. Upon his cross examination, he said he neither told what Roche had said to him, to Ferguson or Cairncross (who were his countrymen and friends) nor to captain Young, nor to colonel Keys, (the superior and officer on board) nor to any other person, previous to the deceased and the prisoner's going on shore; and that he was himself on shore three days; that although the fact was the subject of general conversation, he never mentioned it then either to the governor, fiscal, or other magistrate; that he knew of the affair, and that a reward was publicly offered for the apprehending of Roche, and the only reason he assigned for such an astonishing and reprehensible silence on his part was, that it was no concern of his, and he did not chuse to meddle with it.

Robert Young deposed, that he was captain of the Vanstittart East-Indiaman, and corroborated what Cairncrofs had sworn, as to her leaving England and touching at the Madeiras, and as to the difference between the prisoner and the deceased. He further said, that the prisoner, during the passage, desired him to carry a letter from him to the deceased, asking his pardon for what had passed, and begging him to think no more of it. That the deceased refused to receive it, declaring that Roche had so often asked pardon, and so often offended, that he'd have nothing further to say to him; but when he came to Bombay, would present a memorial of his behaviour to the president and council; that the day before he (the witness) and the passengers landed at the Cape, the prisoner complained to him, "that Ferguson would not speak to him," and declared "that he should speak to him when he came ashore;" that he landed in the forenoon of Saturday September 4, and left orders that the prisoner might have his boat to take him and his wife on shore, when he wanted to go; that in the afternoon he had occasion to go aboard his ship to give some orders; that he met the prisoner and Mrs. Roche just landing; that on his return at night, he was informed that the prisoner had assassinated captain Ferguson; that on the night of the interment of the deceased (about five days after the fact) he waited on the fiscal, and expressed his wonder that the prisoner was not apprehended, declaring that if a proper search was made he thought it impossible for him to lie concealed in so small a town; that the fiscal agreed with him that the prisoner ought to be brought to justice, and wished he was found.

John Partly was next called, but as it appeared, after he had answered a question or two, that his testimony was not likely to touch the main fact, the counsel desisted from farther examining him.

Baron Burland then called upon the prisoner to make his defence, when Mr. Roche said, that he had several instruments to prove his having been tried and acquitted at the Cape, by the most arbitrary government in the world, but that he did not mean to make these instruments the ground of his defence; that what he had done was in virtue of his commission, which made it necessary for him to support his honour. That he had been most barbarously assaulted, had one of his arms dislocated, and had received a violent contusion on his skull; and that he stood acquitted before God of any guilt, as he should prove by his witnesses.

The first witness sworn in support of this defence was James Goodwin, who declared he went out in one ship, and afterwards went on board another (the Sandwich East-Indiaman) that he left that ship in the Bay of Falls, within eighteen miles of the Cape of Good Hope, on the 2d of September; that on the 4th of the same month, as he was walking through the company's garden, he saw a tall man dressed in a light blue coat, pursuing and assaulting another man, who was shorter, and dressed in red, and knocked him down; that he gave him more than one blow ere he fell; that the little man, when he was on the ground, cried out, "Don't strike when I'm down, but let me get up and have satisfaction;" that when he got up, the tall man drew his sword, and took his cane in his left hand, and that he fought with both cane and sword till he fell. Upon his cross examination this witness said it was rather dusk than dark when he saw what he had sworn to, and that he stood at seven yards distance while it happened; that the prisoner neither turned at the first or second blow, but after he fell spoke the words as above. That he had not mentioned what he saw to any person; that he heard the affair spoken of at the punch-house at the Cape; and that the reason of his now giving his evidence was, that about three weeks since he heard a person read in the public papers an account of captain Roche's being in Newgate for the affair which he had seen; that he therefore went to the prison, and told him what he knew. He was very closely interrogated by serjeant Davy who came into court soon after the trial began.

Gustavus M'Gusty deposed, that he kept the books of the Sandwich East-Indiaman; it was true, Goodwin, the preceding witness, had left the ship in the Bay of Falls on the 2d of September, and that he interceded with the captain to forgive him for so doing; that he gained ed a promise of pardon for him, and in consequence he returned on board, either the 5th or 6th of the same month.

Captain Roche's counsel declined calling any more witnesses, as they confessed they had no more who could speak to the principal fact. Baron Burland then fully explained to the jury the nature of the commission under the authority of which the prisoner was tried, they were sworn, and the court sat; he afterwards proceeded to sum up the evidence, which he repeated with great accuracy; and then observed, that the sole object of the jury's consideration was, whether the prisoner had, with malice afore-thought, and from a pre-conceived grudge, gone on shore to murder the deceased; and this he said they were to collect from the evidence, if they credited all that had been sworn on the part of the prosecution; Moody's testimony in particular, led to the idea of previous malice, but then there was something so extraordinary, nay, so incredible, in the circumstance of his being acquainted with the prisoner's resolution to chastise Ferguson, as he called it, and his not informing any one person in the ship of it, or on shore, where he was three days, after the fact was notorious; that he left it to the jury to put that value on his testimony, which they might think it merited. Captain Young's evidence likewise, if construed to a particular sense, would prove the malice; for he had sworn that the prisoner told him, that when he came on shore, captain Ferguson should speak to him; but (the baron observed) it would be hard to take only the worst interpretation of these words; by speaking, the prisoner might mean to come to an eclairsissement, and hear what he had to say. That captain Roche fought the deceased, and that the deceased died in consequence of the wounds he received from the prisoner, was a fact fully established and agreed to; the only doubt was, whether the prisoner had murdered the deceased; that the testimony of Goodwin, if believed, clearly acquitted the prisoner of any such crime; that Goodwin swore positively, but that there was an evident contradiction in his evidence, and that of Cairncrofs, as to the possibility of the transaction, the latter wearing it was so dark, that the clearest sighted man could not see the length of a sword, and the former deposing that he stood at seven yards distance, and not only saw it fully, but also that it was light enough for him to distinguish the colour of the clothes of the deceased and the prisoner; these observations, and several others, which naturally arose from the evidence, fell from the baron, who advised the jury to consider the whole case maturely; and (after informing them that the present special commission, like an admiralty commission, made it necessary that their verdict should either wholly acquit or condemn; for that the verdict of manslaughter could not be received, as the commission was limited for the trial of David Roche, who stood charged with murder;) he told them that if they thought the malice not evident, it was always right to construe the case mitiori sensu, and to let the doubt turn in favour of the accused.—Just as the jury were going out of court the baron called them back, to observe to them that he had omitted one material observation, which was, that Goodwin had sworn the deceased had violently assaulted the prisoner ere he drew his sword; if this was true, it clearly removed the idea of malice propense.

The jury staid about three quarters of an hour, and then returned with the verdict of Not Guilty.

The counsel for the prosecution were, Mr. serjeant Davy, Mr. Cox, Mr. Macdonald, and a young barrister.—For the prisoner, Mr. Lucas, Mr. Davenport, and Mr. Howarth.

Histories of the Tete-a-Tete annexed: or Memoirs of the Shaftesbury Nabob and Miss Kelly.

A City wit has generally been considered as one of the most extraordinary beings existing; but a nabob has (nominally) been allowed to arise to a conceit. Our present hero has sufficiently proved this latter observation, and whether we consider his being the cause of the disfranchisement of the borough of Shoreham, or Punch's exhibition at Shaftesbury, we must allow him to be a man of intrigue as well as humour.

The Shaftesbury nabob started from behind a merchant's counting house, where he gleaned the rudiments of commerce, and meeting with a favourable opportunity, set out as a writer in the East India company's service. Here his adroitness in traffic soon advanced his fortune, and his address and assiduities recommended him to lord Clive, and the other sons of rapine, who shared the spoils of the fleeced Asiatics. A few years made him the proprietor of at least two hundred thousand pounds. About five years since he returned from Asia, fraught with the spoils of his generous pursuits.

pursuits. It were almost needless to say that he shone a meteor of the first magnitude; the elegance of his house, and the splendor of his equipage could scarce be surpassed. Genteel in his person, and easy in his address, he soon gained admittance into the best companies—but there was one thing wanting, a seat in parliament, so essential (according to lord Chesterfield) for giving a man influence in this country. A vacancy offering in a venal borough, he no sooner learnt the news, than he set out post to offer himself a candidate. He had, however, a very formidable opponent, in a brother nabob, who was more penurious than our hero; and as it was a rule in this borough, for the constituents to put up their votes to the best bidder, Shaftesbury soon defeated his adversary.

The constitution of these electors was founded upon a very uncommon principle. Under the sanction of religion, they perjured themselves and sold their country. The president of this association, whose christian name is well known, was a most artful designing smuggler, who under the guise of ruliicity and ignorance, constantly disposed of the voters consciences to his great emolument. Upon this occasion he surpassed all his former manoeuvres; for he not only obtained a larger sum from the candidate than had ever before been proposed, but having the cash deposited in a friend's hands, he decamped with it for the continent, and left the remainder of the constituents to console themselves with the reflection that they had sold their birth right for a mess of pottage, which they had lost between the cup and the lip. The election having the appearance of the most venal influence, the house of Commons took particular cognizance of it: after various examinations of numerous witnesses, they at length disfranchised the borough and its constituents.

A more recent similar transaction has made full as much noise, and brought Shaftesbury Punch into great disrepute. Our hero, and another nabob, were upon this occasion joint candidates. They thought to evade the acts against bribery and corruption by a stroke of wit and pleasantry, in the character of Punch, who administered the golden baits in a ludicrous manner. But well conceived as the thought might be, it excited an inquiry, which caused the returned candidates to lose their seats.

These are some of the exploits of the Shaftesbury nabob in some of his parliamentary pursuits, which, instead of giving him the least mortification, only excited his risible muscles, even during the time that matters were under consideration. He might, indeed, be stiled the laughing philosopher, as he considers all objects, except the gain or loss of a fortune, beneath his serious consideration. He never distinguished himself, whilst in the house, for his oratory, considering his seat of no other utility than as it gave him consequence.

It cannot be supposed that he was entirely divested of Asiatic luxury, which he had imbibed early in life: on the contrary, he manifested it upon almost every occasion; in his repasts, in his amusements, and even in his retirement. But there were no objects which attracted so forcibly his attention as the ladies; to them he was particularly assiduous, not only to please but to be pleased. The parties he made for them were always so elegant and refined, that though they were not so much talked of as Fêtes champêtres and regattas, they frequently in miniature surpassed them both, especially when any favourite lady was to do the honours of the entertainment.

A certain lady upon the ton, who is more celebrated for her repartee than her chastity, being asked her sentiments of the nabobs in general, said, she thought they would make excellent lovers, but dreadful husbands, as they appeared to be either very generous friends, or very rigid tyrants. The nabob hearing of this lady's opinion, presented her with a very beautiful set of Dresden china, upon which was represented Nero kneeling to his mistress, signifying that the fair sex could ever convert the greatest tyrants into the most abject slaves. Her ladyship was so well pleased, either with the thought or the porcelain, that she admitted our hero amongst her humble admirers, and seemed to entertain a strong partiality for him.

Shaftesbury's connexions with the ladies were not confined to those of superior rank, he would sometimes condescend to visit incog. the nunneries about St. James's, and chat away an hour with a sprightly female, whose time he requited very generously. But in these exploits he never exceeded the bounds of prudence, as he was convinced of the danger of such connections.

Indeed, he has formed an alliance with a young lady who ingrosses all his amorous ideas, and has made him discontinue his visits to these professed disciples of the Cyprian queen, who, to a man of any sentiment or reflection, are disgusting instead of inticing. The lady in whose favour he has formed this predilection is named Kelly. He first saw her at Shaftesbury, during the late general election; and although he was at that time deeply immersed in the business of borough hunting, he was so attracted by her elegant figure, innocent air, and enchanting beauty, that he frequently relaxed from pursuits of a more serious nature, to have the pleasure of her conversation. For, although she was only the daughter of an inn-keeper, she had received a genteel education, which she afterwards much improved. These charms and accomplishments were too forcible for the nabob to withstand. He threw out many lures to induce Miss Kelly to listen to his proposals. The young gentlewoman was accompanied by an aunt, who had been very conversant with the world, and genteel life; she was too watchful a guardian to let her niece listen to any proposals which she judged dishonourable. In fine, all his endeavours, for the present, proved ineffectual, and Miss Kelly returned from Shaftesbury as immaculate as she arrived. Some months after the election, passing upon the western road, he put up at her father's, where he staid some days, and renewed the acquaintance. Miss Kelly's aunt was now absent, which afforded him an opportunity of pressing his suit with more vehemence. The brilliancy of his equipage, added to his own engaging appearance, and above all a settlement, which he proposed, were too many temptations for Miss Kelly to withstand, when compared with her present humble sphere of a bar-maid. Our heroine had a female cousin, whom she consulted upon this occasion, and her advice tended much to influence her resolutions, her kinswoman thinking to live with her as a companion, and avoid the drudgery of her present station. She accordingly agreed to elope with our hero, dressed in man's apparel: but her father gaining some intimation of her design, pursued Miss Kelly and brought her back. The nabob having gained her consent, resolved to let no stone remain unturned to gain possession of his dear Miss Kelly. He employed emissaries to watch for opportunities to evade her father's vigilance, and they were authorized to offer very considerable bribes to the servants for their assistance in the enterprise. At length a favourable moment arrived, and she was conducted to apartments provided for her in the New Buildings. He no sooner heard the happy tidings of her being safely lodged in town, than he immediately waited upon the enchantress, and met with a very gracious reception.

As it is necessary secrecy should be observed to avoid her father's researches, who, having a very tender regard for her, is resolved, if possible, to recover his daughter, she has changed her name, and has hitherto eluded his discovery. Although the nabob indulges her in every reasonable gratification in private, as her frequent appearance in public might be attended with disagreeable consequences, she seldom appears abroad in any parade; and when she goes to the play, it is in an obscure part of the upper boxes. This, indeed, infringes upon that expected splendor which, in a great degree induced her to yield to our hero's importunities. However, as he treats her in every respect with the greatest politeness and generosity, her time glides very agreeably away, and her pleasurable situation is still farther heightened by her having a sincere and sympathetic regard for her admirer.

Observations on the General Nature and Principles of Wines, with short Strictures on Opium, Tobacco, and Tea. By Sir Edward Barry, Bart. F. R. S.

WINE can only be made by the fermentation of some particular vegetables, whose juices are either naturally disposed to run into this peculiar intestine motion, or by art are rendered capable of acquiring it. But, whenever they are so far altered by it, as to give by distillation an ardent spirit, they constitute a true vinous liquor, or wine. This vinous production, however various, in colour, taste, and many other qualities, always retains this permanent distinguishing characteristic; and this ardent spirit, when perfectly rectified, universally contains the same principles and qualities, from whatever fermented vegetable juices it is produced.

Though various vegetable juices are, from their own nature, or by a previous preparation may be made capable of acquiring such a degree of fermentation as to become perfectly vinous; yet I shall principally confine my observations to those wines which are produced from the fruit of the vitis.

The first property necessary in the grapes, for the production of wine, is a sufficient maturity: The juices of austere and unripe grapes will but weakly and slowly ferment; but those of ripe grapes will excite a more warm and strong fermentation.

A proper consistence, in the expressed juices, juices, is likewise necessary. When they are too thin, the succeeding fermentation will be weak, the wine less spirituous and apt to degenerate into an acetous liquor; when their consistence is too viscid, the fermentation will be imperfect, and the wine will be apt soon to acquire a rancid putrescent disposition.

A proper degree of heat is likewise necessary to promote the fermentation: That which is between sixty and seventy degrees in Farenheit's thermometer, is, by experiment, found to be best suited to it: The duration of it likewise varies, according to the climate, strength, and consistence of the expressed juices: It is strong, and ceases sooner in hot than in cold climates; a south wind promotes, and a north wind retards, its progress.

When the expressed juices of the grapes, have acquired a proper preparation, they are received into wooden vessels, generally made of oak; in which the fermentation is carried on through its different stages, until it is finished, and the wine is made.

As this process is exactly and beautifully described by the learned Dr. Boerhaave, I shall only here mention such parts of it as chiefly refer to this subject, and are necessary to illustrate the observations deduced from it.

In the first stage of fermentation, there is a various agitation, attenuation, and intimate mixture, of the different parts of the fermenting materials; this is succeeded by a gradual collection of spumous crust on the surface of them, which, while it continues, is called the flower, and is in its own nature a most powerful ferment, to excite and increase this motion in all other vinous liquors.

In the second stage, the fermenting materials are separated into three distinct parts; the spumous crust, the subsiding lees (which are commonly called the mother of the wine) and the intermediate vinous liquor.

In the third stage, the intestine motion becomes more equal and weak; the spumous crust is gradually wasted and absorbed; and, when that is entirely consumed, and the vinous liquor remains quiet on the subsiding lees, the fermentation is then completely finished.

Though several curious changes and productions attend this operation, yet no one is more remarkable than that active, elastic, deleterious spirit, which is perpetually exploded through the open cavity in the superior part of the cask, which, if received with its collected strength into the nostrils of the strongest animal, would be immediately fatal: If received in a less quantity by a man, he becomes apoplectic; and, if still in a lesser quantity, an idiotism or palsy succeeds this shock of the nervous system. Among many instances of the effects of this active gas or spirit, a remarkable one is mentioned in the philosophical transactions, of a person receiving this vapour from fermenting sugar, which immediately suppressed, for some time, his respiration, and, though he recovered, was the remaining part of his life affected with an incurable asthma. On this account, such, who are engaged in these operations, are liable to many disorders of this kind, unless the place is sufficiently large, and the windows kept open for the free admission of the air.

Hence may be explained the various bad effects, which often succeed the drinking of wines in a state of fermentation; for, if this elastic gas or spirit is so powerful, in its full, collected force, on the olfactory nerves, it must, when acting on the nerves of the stomach, though in a less degree, and when received into the circulating fluids, greatly affect the nervous system. On this account the Champagne wines which, when well made, deserve a superior place among the fragrant, light, generous wines; when freely used, in a fermenting state, seldom fail at length to bring on tremors and spasms in the nerves, and rheumatic pains in the joints.

Hence likewise may be explained, why new recent wines, cyder, and most of the domestic made wines, which quickly ferment in the stomach, and create this elastic spirit, are more apt to intoxicate and affect the head for a short time, than stronger wines: And why ripe and acid fruits, which remain long indigested, are apt to bring on violent spasms in the stomach and bowels, and, more frequently in warm climates, the Colica Pictonum, with its paralytic consequences.

This fermentation may occasionally require to be excited or suppressed. Among the various ferments, the spumous parts of fermenting wines, or the subsiding lees, are reckoned most effectual in exciting it; and afterwards racking off the defæcated wines into fresh casks, impregnated with the vapour of sulphur, will most powerfully restrain its progress. These are variously adapted to the state and nature of the wines. In general, whatever warms and attenuates will promote a more complete fermentation in vinous juices, which are too viscid; and, in those which are too thin and weak, whatever whatever gives them a greater consistence.

It is evident, from experiments, that this fermentation will neither regularly begin, or proceed, under a degree of heat less than thirty six, in Fahrenheit's thermometer; and, what is more remarkable, it will neither begin, nor proceed, when the fermenting materials are exposed to a degree of heat exceeding that of ninety. In the former case, the heat necessary to excite this motion is deficient; in the latter, the active principles of fermentation are soon dissipated, and the materials acquire such a viscosity as to become incapable of it.

Hence it is evident, that a certain degree of fermentation is required to change the vegetable juices of grapes into a perfect vinous state; and that, when this is either deficient or exceeds its proper limits, the wine will not acquire its genuine qualities, but be more apt to degenerate into a diseased state.

All recent wines, after the fermentation has ceased, ought to be kept on their lees for a certain time; which greatly contributes to increase their strength and flavour. Whenever this first fermentation has been deficient, they will retain a more rich and sweet taste than is natural to them in a recent true vinous state; and, unless a farther fermentation is promoted by their lying longer on their own lees, they will never attain their genuine strength and flavour, but run into repeated and ineffectual fermentations, and soon degenerate into a liquor of an acetous kind.

Hence appears the reason, why wines of the light and austere kind, which have been imperfectly fermented, are so much improved by being exported on their lees, and agitated on the sea, as they thereby acquire a repeated and stronger fermentation: While those wines are of the same growth, but which have passed through a sufficient complete fermentation, or have been prepared in a more favourable season, have been equally injured by it: For all wines of this class, by a fermentation too great, or too long continued, certainly degenerate into a weak sort of vinegar; while the stronger wines not only require, but will safely bear, a stronger, and often a repeated fermentation, and are more apt to degenerate from a defect, than an excess, of fermentation, into a vapid, roapy, and, at length, a putrescent, state.

Some eminent chemical writers have considered putrefaction as the last process of fermentation: But Boerhaave, who first reduced this art to a regular and a rational system, disapproves, with his usual candour and judgment, this confusion of two operations, which are very different, in respect of their original materials, their progress, and the effects produced from them: For all animal stagnating fluids are the immediate objects of putrefaction, and run spontaneously into it; neither, by any art, can they be rendered capable of a true fermentation: But vegetable, succulent, bodies, which are compressed in such a manner as not to be able to receive the free admission of the air through them, will, in that state, be susceptible of putrefaction; as is evident in recent hay, when heaped up before it has been sufficiently dried; for the heat attending it will gradually advance, until it breaks out into a flame; whereas the heat, which is necessary to the fermentation of vegetable juices, and to advance them to a vinous state, does not much exceed that of a healthy man; and therefore all succulent vegetable bodies will, in that compressed state, become susceptible of putrefaction, and incapable of acquiring a true fermentation: The effects likewise produced from the putrefaction and fermentation of vegetables are very different. By the former, the saline and oily parts are rendered volatile, foetid, and alkaline; by the latter, when justly promoted, they are of a contrary nature, and quite opposite to putrefaction: But, if vegetable juices, imperfectly fermented, remain long stagnating on their lees, the liquor will soon become viscid, and degenerate into a vapid and putrescent state. These observations will hereafter be absolutely necessary to illustrate the rules, which the antients frequently directed in the preparation of their wines, to prevent the acor and vappa, the principal diseases to which their different wines were most liable.

Wine, by these rules properly made and prepared, possesses many peculiar qualities, and different from any other natural or artificial production. When taken in a just proportion, it surprisingly strengthens and excites the spirits; and, in an increasing quantity, gives a quick succession of agreeable ideas, banishes grief and fear, and exalts the latent virtues or vices of the mind: But, when too far increased, disturbs and weakens all the functions of the mind and body; ends at length in ebriety, insensibility, and all appearances of a temporary apoplexy: These are qualities peculiar to wine; for all other narcotics operate in a different manner.

Opium and tobacco possess some qualities similar to those of spirituous liquors. The Turks, who, by the precept of their Alcoran, are denied the use of wine, have recourse to the former, and often use it to animate them before they engage in battle: While the laborious poor man, who cannot easily purchase wine, and is unacquainted with Opium, finds the same relief from the use of tobacco: They both greatly animate and strengthen the spirits for some time, neither will they intoxicate those who have been accustomed to them. They both agree in another particular with spirituous liquors, in being, in some measure, necessary to such who have been accustomed to them; and when long continued, and in a large quantity, they enervate and weaken all the functions of the body and mind.

Tea seems to bear some analogy to them. Kempfer, an eminent physician of credit and candour, who resided for some time at Japan, and who has given the description of this plant, the manner of its culture, preparation, and qualities, observes, that a narcotic quality prevails so much in the infusion of it, while recent, that the inhabitants are cautious in using it, until it has been gathered two years, and its force more moderated; and, perhaps, the prevailing, and otherwise unaccountable, fondness of this liquor is owing to this latent charm which it possesses, but in a milder degree than in other narcotics: For, though from its sensible qualities, light astringency, grateful taste and flavour, it may justly be ranked among the nervous stomachics; yet other plants, which more eminently possess these qualities, and have been often recommended, and substituted to supply its place, have never so universally prevailed: Neither can this prejudice depend only on its taste: For that of tobacco, though at first universally disagreeable, is at length preferred, by its votaries, to any other of the most grateful kind.

Different narcotics produce different effects, in particular constitutions: Some, which in their natural state, prove poisonous, may be so corrected as to become salutary and powerful alteratives: Others have a peculiar influence on the mind, by removing anxiety and pain, and substituting agreeable sensations: Hence only can be explained the prevailing use of spirituous liquors, tobacco, and tea; the duties on which never fail to bring such extraordinary and constant revenues to the crown: But the abuse of them evidently injures the constitution and the real equal strength of the animal spirits.

An Anecdote.

IN 1661, some months after cardinal Mazarin's death, there happened an affair, the parallel of which is not to be met with in history; and what is not less strange, all the historians seem to have been ignorant of it. There was sent with the utmost secrecy to the castle of the island of St. Margaret, on the coast of Provence, a prisoner unknown, of a stature above the ordinary size, young, and of a most noble and beautiful appearance. This prisoner wore upon the road a mask, of which the lower part had steel springs, contrived so that he could eat without taking it off. Orders were given that if he shewed any inclination to discover himself he should be immediately killed. He remained in this island till St. Mars, governor of Pignerol, an officer of great trust, being made governor of the Bastile in the year 1690, went and brought him from the Isle of St. Margaret to the Bastile, observing always to keep his face masked. The marquis of Louvois went to see him in the island before his removal, where he spoke to him standing, and apparently with great respect. This stranger, being carried to the Bastile, had the best accommodation which that castle could afford: nothing which he desired was refused him. His strongest passion was for linen of extraordinary fineness, and for lace. His table was always served in the most elegant manner, and the governor seldom sat down in his presence. An old physician of the Bastile, who had often attended this remarkable person in his disorders, declared that he had never seen his face, though he had often examined his tongue and other parts of his body: The physician said he was finely shaped, his complexion somewhat brown, his voice agreeable and engaging. He never complained of his condition, nor gave the least hint who he was. A famous surgeon, who was son-in-law of this physician, attested the truth of this narrative, which has also often been confirmed by Bernaville, who succeeded St. Mars. This unknown person died in 1704, and was buried in the night, in the parish of St. Paul. What increases the wonder is, that at the time when he was sent to the island of St. Margaret, no considerable person disappeared in Europe.

Recipes for restoring fallen, and taking off superfluous Hair.

S I R,

IN answer to a letter for advice how to restore the growth of hair fallen off through fevers, the following mixtures may be of service.

Take of Hungary water, and spirits of honey, of each half an ounce; of bears suet one ounce; of oil of Rhodium, to scent it withal, eight drops. Anoint the naked part with this composition twice a day.

Or the following.

Take of the best honey, and butter of auranges, of each half an ounce; of bears suet one ounce; of balsam of Peru two drachms; oil of nutmegs, and oil of mace, by expression, of each half a drachm—for the same purpose, to be used night and morning the same way.

Sometimes also the improper use of depilatories has prevented the future growth of the hair, in which case, and all other cases of baldness, where the hair is again desired, either of the two recipes above are the best and safest that can be made use of.

But sometimes, on the other hand, hair grows in some places too plentifully, where it appears uncomely; in such cases, in order to take it off, it may be commodiously and safely effected by means of that drug called rufma, and about two thirds of its quantity of quick-lime, reduced into a soft paste with water; or, in defect of rufma, the like quantity of orpiment may be boiled with quick-lime and water to a paste for the same purpose. Either of these pastes being smeared upon the part, and suffered to lie on for a minute or two, and not longer, lest they should hurt the skin, will so affect the hair, that it may be readily stroaked off with the hand; after which the part should be well washed with warm water. Thus I have done more than required; but think I can never do enough for the fair sex; to an excellent one of which I was beholden, under God, for my being here at present, ever since 1704.

From Sir,

Your obliged humble servant,

JOHN COOK.

Letter of the late Mr. Sterne to a Witty Widow.

WHEN a man's brains are as dry as a squeezed orange, and he feels he has no more conceit in him than a mallet, 'tis in vain to think of sitting down and writing a letter to a lady of your wit, unless in the honest John-Trot January, 1776.

style of yours of the 15th instant came safe to hand, &c. which by the bye looks like a letter of business; and you know very well, from the first letter I had the honour to write to you, I am a man of no business at all. This vile plight I found my genius in, was the reason I have told Mr. ———, I will not write to you till the next post—hoping by that time to get some small recruit, at least of vivacity, if not wit, to set out with;—but upon second thoughts, thinking a bad letter in season—to be better than a good one, out of it—this scrawl is the consequence, which if you will burn the moment you get it—I promise to send you a fine set essay in the style of your female epistolizers, cut and trimmed at all points.—God defend me from such, who never yet knew what it was to say or write one premeditated word in my whole life—for this reason I send it you with pleasure, because wrote with the careless irregularity of an easy heart.—Who told you that Garrick wrote the medley for Beard?—'Twas wrote in his house, however, and before I left town.—I deny it—I was not lost two days before I left town.—I was lost all the time I was there, and never found till I got to this Shandy castle of mine.—Next winter I intend to sojourn among you with more decorum, and will neither be lost or found any where.

Now I wish to God, I was at your elbow.—I have just finished one volume of Shandy, and I want to read it to some one who I know can taste and relish humour—this by the way, is a little impudent in me—for I take the thing for granted, which their high mightinesses the world have yet to determine—but I mean no such thing—I could wish only to have your opinion—shall I, in truth, give you mine?—I dare not—but I will; provided you keep it to yourself—know, then, that I think there is more laughable humour,—with equal degree of Cervantic satire—if not more than in the last—but we are bad judges of the merit of our children.

I will take care you shall never wish me but well, for I am, madam, with great esteem and truth, your most obliged

L. STERNE.

P. S. I have wrote this so vilely and so precipitately, I fear you must carry it to a decypherer—I beg you'll do me the honour to write—otherwise you draw me in, instead of Mr. ——— drawing you into a scrape—for I should sorrow to have a taste of so agreeable a correspondent—and no more. Adieu.

Character of the late Henry Sheares, Esq; from the Hibernian Chronicle, printed in Cork by Mr. William Flynn.

SIR,

YOUR last paper brought me the melancholy account. We have lost, and the world has lost, Mr. Sheares. He is gone for ever from among us. I never held a pen on a more melancholy occasion, being neither able to remember his life and virtues, without veneration, nor to mention his name, but with tears. The city of Cork has had its chief ornament torn from it; his wife hath lost the husband who adored her; his children, numerous and inexperienced, the wing that covered them; his friends, a gentleman of noble endowments and liberal affections; the whole community a man, from whose pen they received both profit and pleasure, instruction and entertainment. As a husband, a father, a friend, and a citizen, he might be esteemed a most perfect model of imitation. No relation did he abuse, or was he capable of abusing. His life was not only free from faults, that invite censure, but filled with actions, that deserve praise. In him youth was a preparation for manhood, manhood for age, and age for immortality. In times that nearly touched the extremes of corruption or barbarity, at an age when licentiousness is scarcely deemed a vice, this enlightened character exhibited an uncommon example of assiduity in the cultivation of his talents; of moderation and refinement in the choice of his pleasures. Accordingly the labours of his youth blossomed in the honours of his age. From parliament, where his distinguished abilities might have raised him to the highest posts of power or profit, he chose to retire with a moderate requital of his services; thinking the tumults of ambition, the disquietudes that attend, and the disappointments that cross it, to be well exchanged for the endearments of love, the enjoyments of friendship, the discharge of humane and social duties, the pursuits of industry, and the nobler pleasures, that result from the improvements of reason, and the exercises of religion. In public, he was followed and admired, in private respected and beloved. His understanding and virtues built and ensured him an esteem and authority, which no station could command, no rank could procure. On the few, whose hearts he had tried, he bestowed an unlimited confidence and affection. To the rest of mankind, particularly them who needed it most, he imparted a share of the blessings, which Heaven had poured profusely upon him. He was always endeavouring to relieve the distresses of the indigent, to redress the injuries of the oppressed. The charitable institutions, which do honour to the city of Cork, particularly the Society for the relief of persons imprisoned for small debts, are principally indebted to his inventive humanity for their rise, and to his activity for their continuance. He saw into the human heart, but with the meekness of a christian, not the moroseness of a cynic. His contempt for the vices of the world did not extinguish his pity for their sufferings. When he wrote, instruction was incessantly flowing from his pen. To dissipate the clouds of vice, to check the wanderings of error, to enlighten the darkness of ignorance, to animate the slow, to refresh the faint, and to confirm the persevering, in the tasks of virtue and benevolence, was the perpetual employment and delight of a mind, intent on the glory and perfection of its species. For this he was eminently qualified, not less by the excellence of his heart, than by the superiority of his understanding. The essays, with which he obliged the public, through your paper, bespoke him the generous friend of mankind, the steady assertor and advocate of virtue, the ingenious reasoner, and the liberal religionist. It would be presumption in an individual to decide on his merits, compared with other writers of this class. Yet in my opinion no moralist, not even Mr. Addison, has excelled him in this species of composition. To the purity of his style, and the correctness of his judgment, our great countryman seems to have added, a stronger expression, and a richer fancy. I will not enter into a detail of his other excellent qualities. Let it be sufficient to say, that he is now bringing to perfection, that mind in heaven, which he cultivated for the honour of God, and the advantage of his fellow-creatures, on earth. A. A.

BUT to the new test, as by act of parliament, which see in our Magazine for October, p. 605.

And the act concludes, "That the officer of the court of King's Bench, justices of the peace, and magistrates of cities and towns corporate, shall yearly, within within twenty one days after the 1st day of December, return to the clerk of the privy council of this kingdom, or his deputy, a true and perfect list, under his or their hand, of every such papist as shall, in the course of the preceding year, have taken and subscribed such oath, in which list, the quality, condition, title, and place of abode of such papist shall be specified."

The Test Examined.

Such is the matter contained in the test. Let it now be weighed in the scales of the sanctuary, of reason, and of common sense, by way of query and answer. The querist shall take care to leave no material objection unmoved: It is hoped the respondent on his side, will afford such evidence on the matter, as would determine any honest impartial juror in our courts, to bring in a verdict on a trial for life or property; I presume nothing more is required here to make the oath conscientious and safe to be taken by any catholic christian in Ireland, unless we suffer ourselves to be led away by high-flying metaphysicians, from the plain road of common sense and moral evidence, into those airy regions, where nothing but metaphysical or essential truth is allowed to be sworn to; as I am utterly unacquainted with those other worlds, I cannot pretend to say how the doctors in those regions make it out, that such oaths are justifiable. But as a citizen of this world, I am clear in my opinion, that to take an oath upon a metaphysical certainty, for example, to call God to witness in a solemn manner, that two and two make four, would be rather profane than commendable.

Queries on the First Article of the Oath.

Quer. Can a Roman catholic, in conscience, abjure the interests of his religion, which he steadfastly believes to be true and holy?

Answer. He cannot abjure his religion, or its real interests.

Quer. If he swears, that he will keep out the popish pretender, to the utmost of his power, and will support the succession of a protestant king and government; is not this an abjuration of the real interests of the Roman catholic religion?

Answer. No.—Because it is not to the religion, but to the personage of the protestant king he swears allegiance; in like manner, it is the personage and not the religion, of the pretender he abjures: And surely he can do this with as safe conscience as the Roman catholics of Canada lately did, under the spiritual direction of their pious and learned bishop, establish bec; and as the Roman catholic of what- fia did, to the protestant king will ad- and as the primitive christian right, their respective pagan princes. to.

that those catholic christians sworn obgiance to the protestant religion, id paganism, would be a gross absurdity.
The new test, now in question, express-no approbation of the principles, measures, or motives of the revolution; neither does it contain an abjuration of any point of Roman catholic faith. Could such doctrine be discovered in it, then indeed a christian conscience should be justly alarmed, and might be allowed to make such a wise, meek, and humble answer as the apostles did, when the Jews forbade them to proclaim their faith in Christ, It is better to obey God than man. It is, indeed, the duty of a Roman catholic to promote the real interests of his religion in a lawful and prudential manner, not by such ways and means as blind zeal and furious bigotry may suggest, which have often drawn tears from the eyes of the tender-hearted mother church, and deeply wounded the cause of true religion. The prudence of a serpent, and the meekness of a dove, is what gospel recommends. To this divine counsel the primitive christians conformed their deportment. Many are apt to fancy, that a popish king would make the Roman catholic religion flourish. In this notion, they may be as carnal and as worldly as the Jews were, who wished to see the sceptre restored to Judah, an event, which the eternal and almighty wisdom would not bring about. He judged it more expedient for their real happiness, to leave them under the christian yoke, in order to wean their hearts from earthly things, and to fix them upon the kingdom of God. All things, says the apostle, will co-operate unto good, for those who are really virtuous. Every change of government, every accident in life, will turn out well to those who fear God and honour the king, whom Providence has placed over them.

The Roman catholics of Canada are, perhaps, as happy, if not more so, under the auspicious reign of King George the third, than their catholic brethren in France and Spain, under Lewis and Charles. A catholic king, from the corruption of his heart, may turn out, in the course of his reign, a tyrant to his people, a disgrace to his religion, and a source of national plagues, sent by heaven to punish their crimes. Quidquid delirant reges, placuntur Achivi. The misdeeds of kings

They do this with an easy conscience, notwithstanding the many instances of persons fully convicted by evidence, whose undoubted innocence afterwards appeared : Because, in social or civil life it is not upon a metaphysical, but a moral certainty, that safety of conscience depends. It is not a metaphysical, or essential truth, that Lewis XV. is king of France, but it is most certain that he is ; nor is it essentially true that he has a right to the throne of France, superior to any other, but it is an undeniable truth, he has, according to the established constitution of France. In like manner, it is most certain, it is as certain as moral evidence can make it, that George III. has a superior right to the sovereignty of these realms.

But in the name of wonder, why should the Roman Catholics of Ireland, or the subjects of any state whatsoever, require to be indulged in a quiet suspension of belief, on those points, I mean the rights of princes ? Surely, when they are once fixed and established by the supreme irrefragable authority of the state, they are no longer disputable, obscure or abstruse, unless we have a mind to bring pyrrhonism into fashion, and to make it a rule of conscience. No king, no independant state in the world would tolerate such pyrrhonian casuists ; their cases of conscience, whether manuscript or printed, would instantly be committed to the flames, by the hands of the common hangman. For how can we reasonably suspend our belief of a thing, when we have positive and clear arguments to make it appear a certainty to us ?

Every independant state upon earth must have a right inherent in itself, to erect a supreme tribunal : This tribunal is the ultimate judge, next to God himself, of temporal right in that state, unless each pretended wiseman would erect a tribunal in his own breast ; in that case, he would appear ridiculous if this question was put him, Who made you a judge ? The uncontrollable voice of this supreme tribunal is law to us, whilst it is able to support its own existence. This maxim ever will stand an invariable rule, let whatsoever revolution happen in the state ; consequently it is the only one to hold by ; whilst I stick to it, I can never err in my judgment of the sovereign's rights. When the supreme tribunal holds forth the king to me with all the ensigns of royalty about him, it is then my duty as a subject, to reverence him who bears the sword, for conscience sake, Paul, Rom. 13. I then can boldly affirm he has a right to wear the crown. I can also with equal certainty affirm, that whosoever the supreme tribunal excludes from the sovereignty, he ought not to wear the crown : because the ought to have, as well as the actual possession of the crown can be determined only by the same supreme authority. If any foreign prince should afterwards come in, by conquest, and all the powers of the state, either not being able or not being willing to make force against him, should acquiesce in him ; I still have the same invariable rule above mentioned for my direction, the rule of primitive christianity, the rule of common sense. If this be not such a certainty as a man may safely swear his belief upon, nothing appertaining to social or civil life can be made the matter of an oath. I shall now sum up the argument which is grounded on this undeniable truth, that Great-Britain is in itself an independant state, as it is able to make laws, to enforce the execution of those laws, and to support its own existence.

The constitutional tribunal of the British state, is the sole foundation, under God, of temporal power, and civil jurisdiction within these realms ; therefore, those to whom the same tribunal gives power, are rightfully appointed ; those also whom it excludes, are rightfully excluded. By it, George the III. is established ; by it, the pope and every other foreign prince and state is excluded. Consequently nor the pope, nor any other foreign prince, state, or potentate whatsoever, hath, or ought to have, any temporal power, or civil, jurisdiction within these realms.

I should be glad to know how those scrupulous Roman catholics would have judged upon the point of right, or the words ought to have, had they been in Judæa when the sceptre of Judah found itself in the hands of a Roman emperor ? Would they have said, that the royal race of Judah had a right to it, in the Augustan age ? Our blessed Saviour did not think so. The right had been providentially transferred. No Jewish king ought to wear the crown of Judah when Augustus and Tiberius wore it : No pretender ought to wear the British crown, whilst George wears it by the supreme authority of the British state, and the sanction of divine providence, by which kings reign. George only is the scriptural king, because he bears the sword : George is the king in conscience, as he is held forth to me in that light by the national tribunal, which in the eyes of all good subjects, is God's representative upon earth in temporals, (Be every soul subject to the higher powers for conscience sake.—Rom, 13.) let the religious creed of those powers be what it may, when they ordain nothing contrary to the law, or to the revealed word of God, whether written or handed down by tradition.

Now, where shall we find in scripture or tradition, that any foreign prince, state, or potentate whatsoever, ought to have temporal power, or civil jurisdiction within these realms? It is the belief of the state, that no other power upon earth, ought to have civil jurisdiction here; it ought to be also the belief of every rational subject: And thus, every good subject may safely swear to that belief.

Quer. To abjure the pretender's right, or, in other words, to swear that he ought not to have any civil jurisdiction within these realms, is the same thing as to assert upon oath, that the being a Roman catholic is a just disqualification for not enjoying hereditary right; whereas James the second was deprived of his crown, because he was a papist, and because he attempted to re-establish popery. His popish heirs are also excluded, whilst, at the same time, the crown continues to be hereditary in the protestant branch of the Stuart family. Now, what protestant in his senses could believe a Roman catholic to be sincere in taking an oath which contains such an assertion?

Answer. In the first place, no such assertion appears in the test.

Secondly, The supreme authority of the British state, from its inherent powers which it holds immediately from God, claims a right to alter the succession of the crown, and to make such laws as to their wisdom may seem most expedient for the peace and safety of the British dominions. Those legislative powers are answerable to none but God, for the laws they make.—Laws made in angry times may seem unjust to those who temporally suffer by them: Yet they may be, and often are, the just decrees of the supreme law-giver, who punished the sins of the fathers upon the children of the third and fourth generation.

The lord saith unto his people—"My thoughts are not your thoughts, my ways are not your ways."—The state, which is God's vicegerent upon earth in temporals, speaks in the same style to all its subjects, whose duty it is to submit to the higher powers—for conscience sake, even when they are rigorously treated. They have no right to erect themselves against the laws established. Parliament is the supposed guardian of their rights and liberties. The same supreme powers of the state, which in this and the last century judged those disqualifying acts passed against papists to be just, wise, and necessary, may reverse them another day, when they shall think it just, wise, and necessary so to do. But let future events be left to the supreme wisdom and justice of divine providence, which reacheth strongly from end to end, and disposeth all things sweetly. He will continue to watch over his church, to conduct it in the paths of evangelical prudence, sanctity, and meekness; and, oh! may he, by his gracious inspirations, prevent all its members, under whatsoever earthly government they live, from saying, doing or counselling any thing contrary to these great virtues, on which unshaken pillars, stronger than brass, the catholic doctrine of christianity shall stand, as it hath stood hitherto, firm, secure, and immutable, like its divine author, amidst the revolutions, wrecks, and ruins of states and empires, to the very end of the world.

In short, the state, from its supreme powers, can alter the succession of the crown, as Blackstone remarks. But, though I may, with a safe conscience, abjure the king whom the state abjures, I cannot abjure the religion which our state abjures: Because God commands me to adhere to the religion, but he no where commands me to adhere to the king whom our state abjures. On the contrary, he enjoins obedience to the state king.

Finally, This objection will carry no weight, unless the author can fairly prove, that the British state has no inherent right to alter the succession of the crown; and that the being a Roman catholic renders an act of disqualification necessarily unjust.—The former, he must allow, is far beyond the reach of his logical powers: It is even asserted as an undoubted truth, by the opposers of the test in the Hibernian Magazine, that the British state has a right to alter the succession of the crown*.

As to the latter; be it once for all known to him, and to all those of his way of thinking, that the being a papist may happen to be a very just disqualification for not enjoying hereditary right.

The salus populi, which is the supreme law, may absolutely require such an act of disqualification in a kingdom where the protestant religion is by law established.

N O T E.

* See Walker's Magazine for October, 1775.

ed. In that case, the said act of disqualification becomes supremely just.

Nay, I shall further insist, that as it is not deemed to be unjust in any state to disqualify or disherit the innocent son of a rebel convicted of high-treason, so neither can it be reasonably said to be an act of injustice in the British state, to disqualify suspected papists, who abet and maintain certain darling doctrines, which are evidently obnoxious to the state, and which, from their dangerous tendency, may, one time or other, blow up a rebellion, shake its very foundation, and involve again three kingdoms in an ocean of blood.

In such apprehensions, is it not highly just and reasonable, that the British state should require from all papists an abjuration of such doctrines? And, on the other hand, if papists will not abjure them, why should not the state hold them disqualified? I shall not indeed any longer contend for the justice of such disqualifying acts, when once the papists have abjured those obnoxious opinions.—Should the scourge be still held over us, after such a solemn testimony of our allegiance and loyalty, our rulers, on the great day of assizes, may stand indicted for flagrant oppression and most iniquitous partiality: And then, the supreme tribunal, at the bar of which St. Paul threatened Felix with the judgment to come, will see justice done to every individual. Ipsi viderint.—At their peril be it.

Quer. Is it not one of the tenets of the Roman catholic faith, that the pope ought to have temporal power, in some degree, within these realms? and if the pope ought to have such power, how can a Roman catholic swear that he believes the pope ought not to have any temporal power or civil jurisdiction, directly or indirectly, within these realms?

Answer. It is not by any means a tenet of the Roman catholic religion, that his holiness is invested by right divine with such power.

Catholic faith does not extend the powers of his holiness beyond the spiritual sphere, in these dominions, and, consequently, we may safely believe he ought not to have any temporal power here: and if we may believe so, we may with equal safety of conscience swear, that we believe so.

We catholics strictly profess indeed his holiness's antient, his divine right and title to spiritual supremacy, and we ought to be ready at any time to seal this faith, not only with a forfeiture of our goods and chattels, but also with the last drop of our blood; but we openly declare at the same time, that we are not bound down by any religious tenet, to support him or any other catholic state or potentate upon earth, in any temporal pretensions against our civil constitution, let its established religion be what it may.

The British state, absolutely independent of all other earthly states, whilst it is able to stand by itself, and holding its temporalities and rights of jurisdiction immediately from God, surely, it must have an equal right at least with France, Spain, Portugal, and other catholic states, to exclude the pope, &c. from any temporal power, directly or indirectly, in its subject realms, with a feremptory ought not to have, in its public edicts. For, why should not Great Britain be as jealous of its rights, as all other earthly states are? as the pope himself is, in his own ecclesiastical territories? and why should not the catholic subjects of Great Britain assert and maintain her civil rights upon oath, and as strenuously every way, as the subjects of other states support and defend those of their respective sovereigns?

I may then very reasonably conclude, that as the opinion of the pope's indirect or deposing power is by no means an article of the catholic faith, it may be safely abjured, and ought to be abjured, when once it is declared to be offensive to the state whose subjects we are.

Nor can we think but his holiness is too piously employed in his immense spiritual province, and too tenderly careful of all his spiritual children, to countenance the abetting or maintaining of such mere opinions as might endanger their peace and liberties, and draw down upon them the frowns, the jealousy, the distrust, and perhaps the scourge of the kings of the earth. Unsupported by any such maxims, he and his successors in the apostolic see, as well as all his fellow labourers in the vine-yard of the lord, ever will be able, under the promised guardianship of the divine spirit, to withstand the most violent efforts of all earthly powers, whilst they act in the capacity of spiritual fathers, like lambs amongst wolves, pursuant to the style of their mission.

A plain and circumstantial Account of the Transactions between Captain Roche and Lieutenant Ferguson. (Concluded from our Mag. for December, p. 706.)

BEFORE we proceed any farther, it is necessary to observe, that the friends of Mr. Ferguson have very industriously triously represented captain Roche to have waited for Mr. Ferguson at the corner of the street, and killed him on the spot; to have stabbed the deceased, not only without giving him time to draw his sword; but also that captain Roche had repeated those stabs in so cowardly and bloody a manner, as to have run his sword through the back of the deceased, as he lay on his face on the ground.— This report, with many others of the like nature, we hope we are able to confute.* They have been propagated with every degree of aggravation through both the Indies, France, Ireland, England, and also Scotland. To the charge in question, we beg leave to insert the following affidavit of E. Nelson, second senior surgeon of the honourable the Dutch company's hospital at the Cape, who was sent to examine the body, by command of the provincial fiscal, on the requisition of Mr. Oliff Marthini Bergh, provincial fiscal.

DECLARE I, the undersigned second senior surgeon of the honourable the company's hospital here, on the 4th day of this month, September, 1773. At seven o'clock in the evening, being called to the house of Mr. Abraham Chiron, found there, lying on a bed, the dead body of captain John Ferguson, of the military, belonging to the English ship Vanstittart, lying in this harbour, having a wound in the left side of the breast, above the pap, near the foreside of the sternum (or breast bone). Having opened the body the next morning, in the presence of a committee of the honourable the court of justice, Messrs. Otto Luder Hemy, and Tobias Christian Rennekamp, and having, by strict observation, found that the wound passed over the upper round of the third rib, with the loss of a fragment splinter, through the membrana plura in the pericardium, at the place, where the ateria magna mounts upwards out of the basis of the left side of the heart, wounding of which, the bag of the heart was filled with thick congealed blood, which wound stopped in the auricula cordes (hearts ears.)

Declare that the same wound was mortal. A slight wound in the tender part of the belly at the left side; a wound passing in the thigh above the knee, and several small wounds over the hands and fingers.

In confirmation of the truth of which, I have signed with my usual hand writing.

GERHARD VAN YSSELDYK.

It is humbly hoped that this affidavit will acquit captain Roche of every cowardly and assassinating stab; if it does not, all we can say there is no evidence, but God's, that invalidate the testimony of false accusers. When Mr. Ferguson fell, captain Roche, as by this time many of the other passengers, who had professed themselves the eternal enemies of captain Roche, were about him, thought proper to retreat for his own safety; for he had every reason to imagine that those who could encourage an assassination, would also be ready to complete it; he therefore prudently sheathed his sword, and, in the utmost agony, lest he had taken away the life of a man, retired to his own lodgings at Mr. Vanderpoel's.

The world is not to be acquainted that captain Roche was declared to have fled and screened himself from justice by the darkness of the night, and taken up his abode among the Hottentots, the natives of the country; nay, even fled beyond the Table Mountains (so called), where he continued several days before he was apprehended; and that the Dutch laws of impaling alive had been rigorously inflicted on him.

One part of this story, that of his taking shelter among the Hottentots, is confuted by the affidavit of Mr. Vanderpoel, at whose house he then lodged; and the other as to the impaling alive, we appeal to the right hon. the members of the privy council, and Mr. Akerman, the keeper of Newgate, the one having committed, and the other having now got him in custody.

By that affidavit every aspersion regarding Mr. Roche's flight to the Table mountains, being four hundred miles distant, or elsewhere, is totally invalidated. Whoever has any knowledge of the policy of the Cape of Good Hope, need not be informed that a flight is impossible, and that no one can pass, in or out of this town without a proper certificate, duly granted, and his name and business therein certified. 'Tis impossible likewise even to travel without these passes, and the Dutch are extremely careful to whom they grant them. Their policy, though severe, is esteemed the best in the universe; the people sleep here all night with their doors open; and if a six-pence was dropped in the street, it would be found the next day. The laws are rigid, the people are honest. In England we find the reverse of all this. We shall only add here, that if captain Roche had laboured under the least degree of suspicion of having premeditatedly murdered or assassinated lieutenant Ferguson, he would have felt a sacrifice to laws the most rigorous, but the best calculated to keep people sober, honest, and in brotherly love with each other; their laws require blood for blood, even in mar slaughter; and he would have been tried, convicted, and executed, (and in a manner, that must make the soul of a British subject tremble) the same day. Guilt there never finds a protector, the executive sword of justice is outstretched with unremitting vengeance; whilst the lenient, the soul-saving hand of mercy, here snatches from sublunary punishment, and too often leaves the convict to the determined laws of heaven.

Thus much is due to their good policy and morals, but the warmest acknowledgments are due also from captain Roche, for their civility, politeness, and humanity. He received every hospitality a foreigner had a right to expect, and every friendly service the traveller and the distressed could wish. He was amenable to their laws, and their justice acquitted him, not with the common discharges from a court of equity, but an approbation of conduct.

We come now to a very material and interesting part of this unfortunate transaction. Our newspapers, our magazines, and publications of all kinds, have resounded, in publicly advancing, that captain Roche sent in for Mr. Ferguson under a fictitious name, and upon Ferguson's coming out, then stabbed him, &c. Transcendently infamous and horrid as this charge is, the bitterest and severest prosecutors of Mr. Roche, don't attempt to say, or even hint it. The affidavit of that unwearied prevaricating gentleman, Mr. Grant, goes so far, as to say, that "he overheard Mr. Chiron, at whose house they lodged, tell Ferguson, that there was an officer without, desired to speak with him; and I think, he added, that he sent no name, or would not mention his name, or used words which expressed his ignorance of the name, and left captain Ferguson and me in equal ignorance. Captain Ferguson went out of the room, and I, conceiving some suspicion, followed him. I looked for him in the passage, and from the outer door, but not seeing him, returned into the hall next the street; I met him coming out of that room, with his bat and sword on, and his CANE in his hand."

Be pleased, reader, now to attend to the affidavit of Mr. Chiron himself, who swears at the requisition of Mr. Oloff Marthini Bergh, provincial fiscal; that about six o'clock in the evening, a slave boy, called Jacob, of Mr. Petrus Johannes de Wit's, came to the attestant's house, and said, there was an English officer in the street, who who wanted to speak with a captain Matthews, whereupon the attestant hearing that the person would not come into the house, went and asked the gentlemen, who were sitting there, "if there was one of the company whose name was Matthews, adding, there was an officer without, who wanted to speak with that gentleman, but would not come in; when one of the English gentlemen, named Ferguson, rose and went out of the gallery, which the attestant seeing, rose likewise and went into the hall; but that the aforementioned lieutenant Ferguson, in the mean time, with his sword by his side, and a cane in his hand, came out of the room, and went a very quick step out of the house, to the other side of the street, near the little garden; where an English officer, short of stature, and dressed in a red coat, was walking, when the aforementioned captain Ferguson walked quickly on, and turning round the corner of the hospital wall, lost sight of them."

We hope this is sufficient to convince the impartial world, that the name of Matthews was enquired for without any thinking, and not mentioning of a name, or that Mr. Chiron used words that expressed his ignorance of the name. Strange and infamous prevarications! The reader will be pleased to remember, that on captain Roche's walking on his way home with the slave Jephtha, and then, accidentally near the house where Ferguson lodged, that another slave boy, upon seeing captain Roche, immediately ran into the house. This is the assertion of captain Roche, but mind, it is the affidavit of Chiron likewise; for he swears, that a boy did come into his house, that this slave boy was named Jacob, and the slave of Johannis de Wit. Observe also, that the time corresponds to a moment, and that Chiron swears, the boy enquired for a Matthews, then in the house. In the name of every thing divine and human, what business, what right had Ferguson to answer to the name of Matthews? why did not any one else in the company answer to that name? was it consistent in him (Ferguson) to answer to the name of Matthews? or is there a shadow shadow of insinuation by Mr. Chiron the messenger, that Ferguson was called out? Shame, shame, be on the head of that prevaricator Grant! The truth is, that captain Roche had been previously described to, and the slave hired for the purpose of giving information to Ferguson of captain Roche's arrival, and to send word in to Ferguson, when captain Roche was at hand, that an English officer wanted to speak with a captain Matthews. Here was the deep scheme of the assassination, and we hope, by the following affidavits, to unravel it to the full satisfaction of every candid reader.

"On the 18th day of August, 1773, personally appeared Phildah M'Kennon, late a passenger to India, in the ship Vansittart, and made oath, that while the said ship was at the Cape of Good Hope, he heard the following conversation between Mr. Worthy, the chief officer, and Mr. Carncross, the surgeon of the said ship, and captain Young, viz. Mr. Worthy said he wished Roche was apprehended, Mr. Carncross hoped he might not, saying, what would they do if they took him, that for himself, he would give six hundred dollars before any harm should come to captain Roche. Mr. Worthy being warm in the debate, Mr. Carncross said, O fie, Mr. Worthy, you would do your best to defend yourself if you was used as lieutenant Ferguson used captain Roche. The doctor then grew angry, and stamped his foot on the deck and went away; Captain Young said he was very sorry for both sides, that he blamed captain Ferguson as much as the other; that among the boats crew, who came off after the decease of lieutenant Ferguson, he heard that lieutenant Ferguson had sent a black boy to see if captain Roche was in the street, which boy seeing captain Roche, told lieutenant Ferguson, he was coming that way, on which lieutenant Ferguson ran out with his cane in his hand, and his sword on, and knocked captain Roche down with his cane; that on Mr. Roche's recovery, he desired lieutenant Ferguson to use him as a gentleman, and draw his sword, which he did, after which captain Roche had wounded him in the thigh, and then desired him to forbear, which he would not, and soon after fell, when captain Roche went away. And further he saith not. Sworn to, before me,

This affidavit, though varying in the report, confirms generally that captain Roche was beset. It is happy, indeed, for this unfortunate gentleman, that ignorance clouded the imagination of villainy, else they might have been infamous enough to have asserted that captain Roche assumed the name of Matthews, and wanted to speak with Ferguson; but the extent of their charge, is an enquiry for a Matthews, and Ferguson's answering to the name, confirms particularly, that that name, Matthews, was the signal for the assassination. If any thing is wanting to give strength to what we know, and what the public have not the least doubt of, we shall subjoin the following affidavit:

"On the 24th day of August, in the year of our Lord, 1774, personally appeared, George Watt of Infantry, private, late a passenger on board the East India ship Vansittart, and made oath, that he recollects a variety of circumstances which escaped his memory, when he made a former deposition before John Watson, Esq; and particularly, that lieutenant Ferguson's servant named Alexander, did, a day or two after his master's decease, inform this deponent, that his said master, lieutenant Ferguson, gave him directions to watch the moment captain Roche came on shore, and acquainted him he did not intend to fight till the evening, that he should not give him so much advantage as he imagined, as he had the character of a good swordsmen; but he would by another stratagem, which Alexander gave this deponent to understand, was, that his master intended to discharge a pistol, as he would not give captain Roche the advantage of a sword.—Further, Alexander informed this deponent, he had, at that time some things of his master's, which his said master desired him to keep if he was killed, but that he said he was not apprehensive of it, as perhaps he should dispatch Roche sooner than he was aware of.

We presume, that the general report confirmed by the affidavit of M'Kennon, and the oath of Ferguson's servant, that his master gave him directions to watch the motions of Capt. Roche; and saying to his servant, he did not intend to fight till evening, with the expression, that Ferguson made use of "another stratagem," and his intention to discharge a pistol, as he would not give Capt. Roche the advantage of a sword, demonstrates that Captain Roche was actually beset.

If the reader is not yet satisfied of that point, we beg leave to refer him to the affidavit of Grant himself, whose unguarded deposition, acknowledges that (deposition of Charles Grant, as given to the Dutch fiscal at the Cape, September, 1773.)

“About six o'clock in the evening, of the fourth of September, several ladies and gentlemen, passengers of the Vansittart Indiaman, who were lodgers at Mr. Chiron's house, and myself among the number, returning to that house from the companies garden, were met by Colonel Cay, another passenger of the same ship, and Mr. Sturges the purser, who, after some discourse, proceeded from towards the garden, as we did to our lodgings; at the door of the said house, Captain Ferguson, Mr. Brodie, myself, and another gentleman, who I think was Mr. Pemberton, standing together; whilst the ladies were entering, Captain Ferguson told us laughingly, that Mr. Sturges with whom we had just parted, had whispered to him, that he had seen Captain Roche (also a passenger of the Vansittart) on shore. Mr. Sturges added, that he believed the Captain (meaning Roche) was a little disguised. We all treated this information with contempt and disdain; and I observed to Captain Ferguson, that he should be provided with a better stick, than the one he held in his hand, pointing to it, he replied shaking it, that it was a very good one, in which Mr. Brodie concurred, holding it to me to feel the weight of it. All this passed more in pleasantry than in seriousness, for I did not myself, nor I believe did any other gentleman present, nor any gentleman belonging to the Vansittart imagine that Capt. Roche would call upon Capt. Ferguson, or that if he did, Capt. Ferguson should answer him with any other weapon than a cane.”

Mr. Grant here acknowledges, that upon Mr. Sturges's whispering to Ferguson, that he had seen Roche, and that he believed him to be a little disguised, Mr. Sturges immediately left them; and here we beg leave to ask for what purpose did he leave them, but to see if Capt. Roche was still walking where he had been, and was near at hand? The pistols, the whisper, the shaking of the cane by them all, and every other attending circumstance, which the impartial reader may draw, too plainly proves that Capt. Roche was way-laid, and a design to murder him was concerted and determined on by the whole association. —We could bring proof upon proof to justify us in this assertion, were they not too voluminous, it is sufficient, that their own acknowledgments condemn them, and justify Captain Roche in his defence.

We judged it proper to be a little particular in this point, as the report is of two years standing, that Capt. Roche sent in under a borrowed name, and in the dark stabbed Ferguson. Was not the affidavit of Chiron so very positive, Grant might have twisted the message to another purpose; he might (and from the general rancour of his heart, and the blackness of his mind, he undoubtedly would) have sworn, that the message was, “a Capt. Matthews wanted to speak with Lieut. Ferguson;” which would have been of the most dangerous tendency, if not fatal, to Capt. Roche; but an All-wise God, who protects the innocent and confounds the guilty, whose providence is over all his works, prevented their diabolical machinations, and frustrated the evil of their intentions. His omniscience foresaw the depending fate of his creature, and his omnipotence protected him in the hour of danger: may his more glorious attribute of mercy, in the day of judgment, draw a veil over the human frailties of Lieut. Ferguson, and may he have expiated his offences by his sublunary punishment.

By the affidavit of Mr. Vanderpoel, it may be seen, that Captain Roche, immediately after the falling of Ferguson, repaired to his lodgings. He had not been there an hour before six of the fiscal officers entered the house with drawn sabres, and as usual at the Cape, attended by a number of maffiffs of a ferocious breed, who are taught, if their masters are attacked, to seize the offender, and if not prevented, tear him to death. On their entry, they demanded Capt. Roche; and Mr. Vanderpoel, who had been informed of the affair by his slave Jephtha, immediately told the officers, “Give my compliments to the fiscal, and tell him I will wait on him immediately.” The meaning of which is, that a denial of an accused person in these cases, is no less than a confiscation of life and goods; and, that willing to save Capt. Roche from the rigour of a dungeon, he generously waited on the fiscal, and with another gentleman of great eminence, became security for Capt. Roche's appearance. An act of the highest friendship, as the escape of Capt. Roche would have been attended with the same penalty, viz. confiscation of life and goods. Be pleased to observe, that the motives of Mr. Vanderpoel were, a thorough conviction of Capt. Roche's innocence; for for as the Dutch slave, Jephtha, understood not a word of English, nor Capt. Roche a syllable of Dutch, it was impossible to deceive Mr. Vanderpoel in the account; when, therefore, he found their two stories so exactly correspond, he wished to save Capt. Roche from the horrors of a dungeon, while the fiscal's men guarded the house till his return. Before the fiscal he pledged his life and property for a stranger; an act of humanity that was the sole direction of heaven.

Proceedings before the supreme court of judicature at the Case of Good Hope.

To give all the evidence against Capt. Roche that ever was given, we shall in the first place insert the deposition of Charles Grant, made to the Dutch fiscal; which the reader will plainly perceive is a malicious and slanderous narrative, and that the depositions contradict themselves; and though given with all possible malice, are sufficient to acquit Capt. Roche, and confirm several things we have advanced.

Depositions of Mr. Charles Grant, before the Dutch Fiscal, between the 5th and 12th of Sept. 1773.—For the first Part of Mr. Grant's Narrative, see p. 28.

"We joined the ladies and drank tea, when I was about to rise from table, I overheard Mr. Chiron, telling Lieut. Ferguson, that there was an officer without who desired to speak with him; and I think he added, that he sent no name, or would not mention his name, or used words which expressed his own ignorance of the name, and left Lieut. Ferguson and me in equal ignorance. Capt. Ferguson went out of the room, and I conceiving some suspicion, followed him. I looked for him into the passage, and from the outer door, but not seeing him, returned to go in the hall next the street; I met him coming out of that room with his hat and sword on, and his cane in his hand. I said to him with some earnestness, holding my hand to his breast, You are going out, or, Are you going out? or words to that purpose, which indicated curiosity, and a desire to enter into conversation with him: He passed me without reply, and it was then so dusky, or dark, that I could not distinguish the lines of his countenance, but he seemed by his gestures to be very composed. I followed with my eye, without seeing any other person, except a boy, who run after him until he turned short round the angle of the wall, which was one side opposite to the companies garden, the angular point of this wall hid him from me, but instantly after I heard a clashing as of a stick, against a sword, with several blustering threatening exclamations, such as "G—d damn you," or, "Damn you, you scoundrel, I'll teach you," from a voice which I knew to be Capt. Roche's: I ran forward, and saw Lieut. Ferguson and Capt. Roche engaged together, the former, as striking the latter with a cane, and he, (the latter) one instant very near Lieut. Ferguson, and again further off from him, as if endeavouring to catch his weapon to strike him over the head, and to push at him:—Lieut. Ferguson rather gained ground, the other seemed to keep further off from him, and to send forth an inarticulate sound, somewhat resembling that which one makes when suddenly immersed in water. At that juncture he called to me, who stood within a few yards of them, being, just as I came out of the house, without either sword, cane, or hat, "Mr. Grant, are you a man, and will see me used in this manner?"

It struck me that this appeal was made without any expectation of an answer; but I could not help saying with surprise, "yes," for I had seen nothing that had a tendency to foul play on the part of Capt. Ferguson; the other had the higher ground, and although he had retreated a few steps, seemed the most busy of the two. Capt. Ferguson appeared to me as still using of a cane, and as more deliberate in his motions than Capt. Roche; immediately, as I think, after using these words to me, he called to Lieut. Ferguson, "Draw, damn you, draw!" I then saw Lieut. Ferguson, with a ceremony which I felt unsuitable to the time, first throw back his right hand behind the line of his shoulder, next applying it to his left side, and make with it the motion of drawing his sword; but the darkness prevented me from seeing the blade distinctly. He advanced nearer to Capt. Roche, and bent forward, being short sighted, as if to distinguish clearly the position of his antagonist's body or his sword. The next instant I saw them in a kind of struggle, not holding each other, but at a sword's length, and as if a sword had been fastened between them; Lieut. Ferguson remained a few moments in that position, his right hand as if holding his sword to Captain Roche, but without pushing, and himself without lunging, or hardly any action that I could perceive, except several circular wavings* with his left hand, as if feeling for his adversaries sword: he had been entirely silent from the beginning, which though I stopt not to consider then, had the effect of throwing me into greater uncertainty and suspense, but his posture and inaction at this juncture were altogether unaccountable to me; his situation presented to my mind precisely that feeling which one has in dreams, of making ineffectual efforts to shun danger or annoy an enemy. From this momentary fascination he was disengaged by recoiling confusedly a few steps. I went close up to him, and saw no more of Capt. Roche. Mr. Chiron and the rest of the gentlemen came to us at the same instant: Lieut. Ferguson reeled—I imagined he was stunned by a blow on the head, and stretched out my hands to support him—that moment he fell on his back at full length—I conceived that too to be only a temporary deprivation of sense; for not having once heard the clashing of two swords against each other, nor seen any mutual thrusts exchanged, it did not at first occur to me that his life might be in danger; but on carrying him to Mr. Chiron's house we found, that among other wounds, he had received a mortal one on the left breast, and that he was in agony. From the time of his fall he uttered only some convulsive sobs, and a few minutes after he was brought in he expired.

The whole affair passed in much less time than I take to relate; I think it could scarcely have taken up above a minute and a half, and its suddenness, its total irregularity, my absence or rather darkness of the evening, and my own agitation, may have prevented me from seeing or remarking every circumstance accurately; above all, the shocking catastrophe took such entire possession of my thoughts, that some things which I might otherwise have remembered, may have been driven from them beyond the possibility of recal. In what I have related, however, I have admitted none of the conjectures which my knowledge of the different characters of the men, of past transactions, and my reflections upon the present have led me to form.

Sworn before me at Bombay, this 11th of May, 1774. D. DRAPER.

(A true copy)

JAMES TON, Not. Pub.

Let this narrative be compared with Mr. Chiron's affidavit, and the infamous prevarication will be easily seen; it confirms also Ferguson's striking with a cane, the nature of the wounds, and many other things which the reader's penetration may readily suggest. As Mr. Grant's is the only evidence on the part of the prosecution, we beg leave to lay before the public, what affidavits may be necessary on the part of Capt. Roche.

To prove that Capt. Roche was attacked and beset in the manner we have asserted, the slave Jeptha, who though but 11 years of age, at the request of Capt. Roche was examined, and declared,

“That the said David Roche, who was known to him by the description of the short English officer, came to lodge at his master's house, and that a short time after his landing, he was desirous to take a walk to see the Cape; and that he, Jeptha, was ordered by his master to accompany the officer, who had his usual sword on his side, but no cane.

“That the said short English Captain, walking by Mr. Chiron's house, that he, Jeptha, from his own cord, went and sat down upon Mr. Chiron's steps, and that a young lad, slave to the old counsellor Mr. Petrus Johannes de Wit, named Jacob, came out of the house, and seeing Capt. Roche walking, he asked Jeptha who that short gentleman was, and that he, Jeptha, answered that it was an English gentleman who lodged at his master's. That thereupon the said Jacob immediately returned to the house of the said Mr. Chiron, and soon after a tall English gentleman, dressed in a light blue coat, and a cane and sword in his hand, came out of that house, and went to the corner of the hospital wall, where he found the short English officer, after whom he walked round the corner, and he, Jeptha, followed them. That he saw the said tall English gentleman, who came out of the house of the said Chiron, strike the short English gentleman with the cane over his head, and several other places; whereupon the said Captain Roche, recoiling back to avoid the blows, fell down; and that two persons unknown to him, Jeptha, came up and lifted him from the ground, and thereupon the said Capt. Roche grasped hold of the tall Englishman's cane, and held the same fast; but in this, as well as in what hereafter follows, the said Jeptha varied. But it is to be observed, that the first said that the tall Englishman first drew his sword, and then again, that the short Englishman drew his, but finally, he positively declared, that while the short officer held the cane of the tall Englishman, the tall one, whilst he held the cane with his left hand, drew his sword with his right hand, but could not get it clear out of the scabbard; and that that thereupon the short officer said to the tall one, draw your sword, and that the short and tall gentlemen let go the cane, each having drawn their swords out of their scabbard, and immediately fell to each other, which he, Jephtha, by reason of its being rather dark, could not see so well, but that he heard the clashing of their swords, and that he also saw the tall Englishman fall to the ground, whereupon he, Jephtha, was so terrified, that he run from thence home to his master.

That immediately after this, the attestant heard very loud talking from that side, without understanding the same; and heard likewise, as if some person was struck with a cane, that thereupon the attestant went to the corner of his pavement, next to the bench that is there, and that he then saw the English Captain, who lodged with the attestant, strike the short officer some blows with his cane; likewise that the short officer moved his hands as if he struck the Capt. who lodged with the attestant, without perceiving, as it began to be dark, that he had a cane, or any other weapon in his hand.

That the attestant, with a design to separate these two Englishmen, going two or three steps from his pavement, he then heard the clashing of side arms, but without seeing them, ran quickly into his house, and told the English gentlemen who were sitting in the gallery, gentlemen, come out, there are two Englishmen a fighting together; when some of them, without knowing who they were, or how many, rose quickly and went with the attestant without on the pavement.

That the attestant going with the above-mentioned gentlemen to the corner of the hospital wall, the short officer passed by them running, who, to the attestant's thinking, was busy in putting his side arms into the scabbard, or made some motions like it with his body and arms, and went along the little garden (and ran away) without being able to declare positively whether the aforementioned short officer, had a common sword, or any other weapon by his side, or not.

That the attestant going further with the before-mentioned gentlemen, found the aforementioned Captain Ferguson, lying stretched out on the ground and speechless; wherefore he lifted the said Capt. from the ground, and brought him into the house, and, laying him on a cot, died some time that very evening.

To produce here the numberless affidavits we have in possession, authorized by the proper hand and seal of the court of judicature, would be swelling this pamphlet to volumes, we shall only add that every necessary witness was examined, and Capt. Roche most honourably acquitted. That the Dutch governor, and the fiscal, truly sensible of his innocence, and conscious that a party was raised against him, and that he was in extreme danger of his life, gave him the strongest recommendations to the French army, where he might have been as honourably accommodated as in his other situation. That upon Capt. Roche's refusing to enter into a foreign service, and expressing his resolution to spend his days in the service of his king and country, the governor and fiscal provided him a passage to Bombay in a French ship, where he went with the utmost expedition, in the face of his former enemies, and of many more, whom the shameful stories of Adam Ferguson, Grant, Brodie, &c. had very unjustly made so.

There he had to encounter party upon party, and those who have any knowledge of human nature, will not be surprized at it; they know that the first impressions on the heart, are generally the strongest, and that prejudices of every kind, if at all, are with great difficulty eradicated.

After captain Roche had received the fullest justification of his conduct at the Cape, he soon after, by the direction of the governor and fiscal, went on board a French Indiaman, L'Ambition, and proceeded directly to his destination at Bombay, where soon after his arrival, (Mr. Grant, Brodie, and Ferguson's brother, with many others who had been either enticed into, or threatened with ruin in case they refused to become of that party, had previously arrived) they lodged a second information before the governor and council of Bombay, upon which information, the following warrant was granted for captain Roche's apprehension.

The Honourable William Hornby, Esq; President and Governor of Bombay and its Dependancies, &c. his Majesty's Justices for the Town and Island of Bombay.

To Mr. William Arden, Sheriff of Bombay, greeting.

To the Marshall or Constable of the said Town and County.

WHEREAS information hath been lodged with us his majesty's justices, against David Roche, late a passenger on board the Vansittart Indiaman, on her voyage from England bound to the East Indies, that he, the said David Roche, did

did murder and slay at the Dutch settlements near the Cape of Good Hope, John Ferguson, also a passenger on board the said ship Vanfittart, while the ship lay at the Cape of Good Hope. These therefore are to will and require you Mr. William Arden, sheriff of this town and island, to apprehend and keep in safe custody the body of the said David Roche, in order that he may be sent to England by the first ship, to answer the said offence, and for your so doing, this shall be unto you a sufficient warrant, as well as to all others whom it may concern. Dated in Bombay, this third day of August, 1774.

(Signed) WILLIAM HORNBY, P. E. WRENCH, D. DRAPER, B. FLETCHER, JOHN WATSON, W. TAYLOR, and ROBERT GARDEN.

Sometime after captain Roche had been taken into custody, and kept in prison, the governor and council proceeded to examine the witnesses pro and con with regard to the supposed murder (the nature of which the reader is already acquainted with) captain Roche, after having made his defence in a very masterly and copious manner, concluded it as follows, and then in very learned and sensible arguments, which are here quoted, urged his discharge and reasons for bail.

"I cannot conclude without observing to you, honourable Sir and gentlemen, what I conceive must be obvious to every candid and unprejudiced person, that from the remarkable circumstances acknowledged and confessed by Mr. Grant in his narrative and depositions, the law will deem him a principal abettor; and an accessary to the fact; and from Mr. Grant's answer to my address, during the conflict, he evidently was so: for his conduct through the whole of it is very extraordinary, he declares he was close at Ferguson's back, and saw him turn the corner, was at the commencement to the end of the conflict; saw Ferguson came me before he drew his sword; saw us engaged with swords drawn; and, notwithstanding Mr. Grant coolly waits the event, without attempting either to prevent the bad consequences, or to call assistance, which is clear was in his power to do; and he certainly had sufficient reason to have expected it might have arrived in time to have been effectual, from the distance they were from the house at the time. Instead of which, Mr. Grant remains on the spot a spectator (not in my behalf I am sure) and refuses to interfere, although confessedly addressed by me to interfere. From whom then could Mr. Grant have reason to fear, though unarmed (for his hat could have been of no service but to prevent his catching cold); from me he certainly had none, nor could he from captain Ferguson, whose great accomplishments he so much extols. How then can this part of Mr. Grant's behaviour be accounted for otherwise than by his having abetted, persuaded and encouraged capt. Ferguson to make so base an assault, to which he must have been privy, and hoped for an event, in his friend's behalf, far different than it turned out. If Mr. Grant is possessed of those nice feelings, he seems so desirous the world should suppose him to be, I believe no man, as himself expresses it, will envy him his feelings on so fatal an event, in which he most evidently has borne so large a share.

"Having thus far addressed myself to you, gentlemen, I doubt not a favourable opinion from your candour and impartiality, and that it will be a means of removing the strong popular prejudices subsisting against me. I now proceed, honourable Sir and gentlemen, to require my discharge; or, at any rate, bail; and I hope my unprecedented case, and uneasy situation, will sufficiently plead my excuse, for endeavouring to prevail in obtaining my liberty; and to lay before you such reasons as occur to me in support thereof; from a confidence in your justice, honour and humanity, to give every such plea the most mature deliberation. In support of my plea for my discharge, it is what the law distinguishes by the title of a foreign plea: I must therefore use it on this occasion, and except to the jurisdiction: the fact, as alleged against me, being not only without the jurisdiction of the honourable East India company's charter, but without any British jurisdiction whatever, unless such is granted by his majesty's special commission for the trial thereof; and before such commission is sued out by way of appeal by the next heir, according to the established forms of law. I humbly conceive either arrest or commitment must be illegal. And this, honourable Sir, and gentlemen, brings me to consider and represent to you the nature of a warrant.

"Warrants may be granted in extraordinary cases by his majesty's privy council, or secretaries of state, but ordinarily by justices of the peace, which they may do in any cases where they have a jurisdiction over the offence, in order to compel the person accused to appear before before them: for it would be absurd to give them power to examine the offender, unless they had also a power to compel him to attend, and submit to such examination. And this extends to all treasons, felonies, and breaches of the peace, and to all such offences as by statute they have power to punish." (Vide Blackstone, vol. 4, fol. 290.)

With respect to murder committed in combat (in a country not within the British empire,) the law I humbly presume runs thus: Suppose two British subjects fight a duel (in France for instance) the one falls, and the survivor returns to England; at the suit of the deceased, the king, by virtue of his prerogative, may issue a commission to the lord high constable, to try the survivor as a murderer. And he is also invested with a discretionary right, either to grant or refuse such commission, as I am informed is recorded of Queen Elizabeth, on application being made for a commission to try Sir Francis Drake for the death of a man he had illegally condemned abroad; but the queen, by advice of the officers of state, refused to grant it on consideration of his great services. Charles the Second, on an application made by the friends of a man slain by a British subject, granted such a commission.

How hard then, honourable Sir and gentlemen, must my case appear; arrested and committed for a fact alledged and acknowledged in the warrant against me, to have been perpetrated out of the king's dominions, and that you, gentlemen, cannot try me here, as it is out of your jurisdiction: and this warrant granted against me, without any application from the heir at law, or relation of the deceased, whose death I am charged with, without any coroners inquest to found the indictment on, without even the surgeon's affidavit to prove the deceased died of the wounds, or even the binding over the malicious informers to prosecute, who if I must be sent to England, undoubtedly they should also, to be present at my trial, if I am to be tried there. And this leads me to consider, that the trying me at any rate, being vested in his majesty's discretion, who can determine if he will grant such commission; and should he be graciously pleased so to do, is it not reasonable to suppose the right of the subject will be equally considered, and the commission to try me be sent to India, where I have my living witnesses residing; and where, if at liberty, or admitted to bail, or at any rate, I may have the advantage of pursuing my just rights as a British subject, of preparing for a future trial, and examining my witnesses on the spot. If such commission, as very probably may be the case, should issue to try me here, and which so evidently comes nearest the point of maintaining the right of the subject, how much would the sending me to Europe add to my unavoidable perplexities, by the additional expences, troubles, and vexations I shall be compelled to undergo. Justice, candour, and humanity plead so strongly for your due consideration on the above points, that it is almost unnecessary to urge it as an individual.

Having thus finished my pleas in respect to my discharge, I perceive they may most of them be equally urged as to the granting me bail; I therefore shall only subjoin to what I have already set forth, that I am possessed of sundry affidavits in my favour, and doubt not to be able to procure more. The whole of my charge has been already considered under that jurisdiction, which had an undoubted right to enquire into it, and whose laws are so remarkably severe on such occasions. I was the whole time, while the proceedings were going on, a prisoner on parole to the Dutch fiscal at the Cape; and Mr. Vanderpoel, at whose house I lodged, was security for my person to the fiscal, to be delivered to him whenever he should require it; I pursued his advice in not embarking again on board the Vanstuart, and went on board a French ship laying at the Cape, with his knowledge and acquiescence, and even the French captain made enquiry of the governor if he should admit me on board, and was given to understand he might do so.

All which is not difficult to be enquired into, and a very little time will confirm it. I made the best of my way to Bombay, the place of my destination, and at last arrived there after various misfortunes and disappointments. Conscious of my innocence, I had no dread, but voluntarily came to claim my inherent rights under a British flag, being sensible I had never acted so as to endanger a forfeiture of them; and you, gentlemen, must be sensible I have neither broke the peace, or committed any one act since my arrival under your jurisdiction to give offence.

I have only to add, that as I mean no offence, but only to urge those reasonable pleas in my behalf, which my situation and unprecedented case appears to require, I hope therefore none will be taken, but every candid allowance made, where to your judgments I may appear to have been mistaken.

In answer to this, captain Roche received the following letter,

To Captain David Roche.

S I R,

THE letter you addressed to the honourable William Hornby, Esq; &c. his majesty's justices for the town and island of Bombay, was yesterday laid before them, wherein you reply to the narrative of Mr. Charles Grant, and urged fundry pleas for your being released from the restraint you are at present under, or at least to be admitted to bail.

In reply to this letter, I have the commands of those to whom it was addressed, to acquaint you, that you were committed to safe custody for the killing of captain John Ferguson, because they esteemed it their duty so to do; and they still think they are not authorized by law, either to release you, or to admit you to bail; you will accordingly be held in restraint till the sailing of the first ship for England, when you will be sent on board her, at which time an authentic copy of this letter, with copies of all the other papers and depositions relative to this unhappy affair will be transmitted to the honourable the court of directors.

I am further commanded to acquaint you, that the interrogatories you enclosed in a former letter, which you desired might be administered to major Robert Haffard, and another person at Broach, have been transmitted thither for that purpose; and, that your restraint may be attended with no disadvantage to your defence, they will give orders for the examinations to be taken of any other persons you may desire to produce on your behalf, on your delivering a list of their names, and the questions you want to put to them.

Due enquiry will also be made at the Cape of Good Hope, of whomsoever you may point out that can say any thing in your favour, relative to the affair in question.

I am, Sir,

Your most humble servant,
Bombay Castle, GEORGE SKIPP.
August 31st. 1774.

We need not acquaint our readers with the sufferings Capt. Roche has gone through during his imprisonment. He is now in England, and blessed with a good conscience, and the company of a tender, affectionate, affable, and sensible lady, he waits with patience and fortitude, an event which will prove of the utmost consequence to him, to every individual, and the liberties of this country. When under examination before the privy council, he made the following short defence.

My Lords,

"Your lordships have heard the evidence against me, which is incompetent in law: I submit it to your lordships, whether, in the character of an officer, or a man, I could submit to the treatment of Lieut. Ferguson without drawing my sword. Your lordships are convinced I was knocked down and assaulted previous to my drawing; and Mr. Ferguson fought with both sword and cane. That after having been knock'd down, I called out to my assailer to draw, that I even called to his friend to take him away. What could I do more to establish my character as an officer, or as a man of humanity? After this, my lords, self defence will justify me in the eyes of God and man, that as a private gentleman, much more an officer, I could do no less than I have done. Your lordships will see the necessity of defending myself when an inevitable attack, premeditated and consulted, was made upon my life, and the variety of affidavits transmitted to the court of directors, in confirmation of it, and of the whole proceedings will prove this matter to your lordships fuller satisfaction.

To the Account of the Trial of Mrs. Rudd, in our last Magazine, we now add the Speech of Mr. Justice Aston, and his Charge to the Jury.

A Little before nine o'clock the lord-mayor, judges, and aldermen being assembled, the prisoner was called to the bar, and the business was opened by Mr. Justice Aston in the following elegant speech:

"Margaret Caroline Rudd, at the last September session, upon your being brought to the bar to plead to several indictments found against you for forgery, it was insisted upon by your counsel, that in point of law you ought not to be put upon your trial at all, as you have confessed yourself to be an accomplice before the justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex, and had been by them admitted as an evidence for the crown, against your companions in guilt, Robert and Daniel Perreau. The ground of that claim was founded upon the supposed merit of the discovery you had made: that being admitted to give evidence as an accomplice, and having performed your engagement to the public, by being examined before the grand jury, and being ready to have given evidence upon the trial, if called upon, you was intitled to pardon: or not to have been prosecuted, that you might have time to appear elsewhere; that the constant practice in regard to accomplices becoming the king's evidence was, that they should not be prosecuted for the offence they had confessed, or such like offences: that a contrary conduct would be a breach of faith with you, and would discourage the future discovery of criminals, if after such disclosures, they were, nevertheless, to undergo prosecutions for their offences. To this it was answered, that the discovery meant by law or practice to intitle an accomplice to favour, must be a full, ample, and true discovery; and that it would never discourage the making such discoveries, if criminals, offering themselves as witnesses, were made to understand, that to intitle themselves to mercy or favour, they are to make a full discovery of all the offences about which they were questioned, and of all their accomplices in guilt. And it was farther insisted, that you had not made a fair disclosure, at the time of your examination, of all you knew relative to the forgeries which had been committed and published; but that you stood charged by the grand jury with several other forgeries which you had denied the knowledge of. Upon the debate of this matter before the bench of gaol delivery, the judges present, not all concurring in one opinion, and it being judged a point of great weight and importance, in the criminal law, fit to be fully considered, and finally settled, how far, under what circumstances, and in what manner, an accomplice, received as a witness, ought to be intitled to favour and mercy; the farther consideration of the matter was then deferred, in order that the opinion of all the judges might be taken upon the point of law.

“ Eleven of the judges have accordingly met, the lord chief justice of the common pleas being absent through indisposition; and have maturely and deliberately considered of the matter, under all the circumstances; and it falls to my share to deliver, in your presence, to the public, the substance of their reasons upon the occasion, that the ground of their resolves may be rightly understood. All the judges were of opinion, that in cases not within any statute, an accomplice, who fully discloses the joint guilt of himself and of his companions, and truly answers all questions, that are put to him, and is admitted by justices of the peace as a witness against his companions, and who, when called upon, does give evidence accordingly, and appears under all the circumstances of the case to have acted a fair and an ingenuous part, and to have made a full and true information, ought not to be prosecuted for his own guilt so disclosed by him, nor perhaps for any other offence of the same kind, which he may accidentally, and without any bad design, have omitted in his confession; but he cannot by law plead this in bar to any indictment against him, nor avail himself of it upon his trial; for it is merely an equitable claim to the mercy of the crown, from the magistrates express or implied promise of an indemnity, upon certain conditions that have been performed; it can only come before the court by way of application to put off the trial, in order to give the prisoner time to apply elsewhere. Nine of the eleven judges were of opinion, that all the circumstances relative to a prisoner's claim of indemnity, in such a case, not only may, but OUGHT to be laid before the court, to enable them to exercise their discretion, whether upon the grounds before them, the trial should be put off, and consequently have intimation given that the prisoner ought not to be prosecuted; for the discretionary power exercised by the justices of the peace in admitting accomplices to be witnesses, founded in practice only, cannot controul the authority of the court of gaol delivery, and exempt at all events the accomplice from being prosecuted. Upon every motion made, upon collateral equitable grounds, the court will see and examine into the whole truth, and consequently ought to be informed of all the circumstances affecting the case.

“ The affidavit of the justices, therefore, must in this case be necessarily taken into consideration, to see upon what ground they admit the prisoner as a witness. For if the court looked no farther than the prisoner's own information, in the present case, they could not have learnt from thence that she had ever been considered as an accomplice at all; and as such had been admitted as a witness against the Perreaus in either of the prosecutions. Upon their affidavit it appears that the public faith was not engaged but conditionally, and that there was an express admonition given to the prisoner, not to conceal any part of the truth.

"The same nine judges also were of opinion, that if the matter stood singly upon the two informations of the prisoner, compared with the indictments against her, that she ought to have been tried upon all or any of them; for from the prisoner's information, she is no accomplice; she has not confessed herself guilty of any offence at all. By their representation the share she has had in these transactions is perfectly innocent; but she exhibits a charge against Robert and Daniel Perreau, the one soliciting her to imitate the hand of William Adair, from a paper he produces; the other forcing her to do the act of forgery; under the threat and fear of death. Her two informations are contradictory; and every indictment that is preferred against her proceeds upon a falsification of the accounts she has given; for the answers to the justices interrogation, that she did not know of any other forgeries; so she does not confess, make any discovery, or become a witness concerning these offences; and if she has suppressed the truth, and not made a full and fair disclosure, she forfeits all equitable claim to favour and mercy. But if she has told the truth, and the whole truth, she cannot be convicted. On the other hand, taking the affidavit of the justices, and all the case into consideration, if she is guilty of the charge contained in the indictments preferred by Sir Thomas Frankland, the judges are of opinion, as her informations before the justices have no relation to these charges, they can in no light be applied to mitigate her offences.

"Upon the whole, whether the prisoner is guilty or not guilty is a fact still to be tried by a jury upon legal evidence only, without prejudice to the prisoner from any thing which has been insisted upon in point of law by her counsel to exempt her from any trial at all; for it would be hard indeed upon the subject, who has a right to advice and assistance of counsel in all matters and points of law that may arise upon his case, if the eventual decision of the court against the points of law insisted upon in his behalf, should prejudice the subsequent trial of the facts, which is ultimately to be governed by the rule of evidence, and to be decided by the verdict of the jury. I hope and trust, the facts will be tried without the least attention to, or even a remembrance of, any one matter or thing whatever, which has either made its appearance in print, or been the subject of common conversation. I shall only add, that an accomplice, who desires that his trial may be put off, that he may apply for mercy under all the most regular pretensions before laid down, confesses the guilt; but, under the circumstances of this case, if the prisoner confesses these indictments, she has no promise of mercy, and no claim to favour for the reasons aforesaid. The judges, therefore, are of opinion that the trial ought to proceed; and I have authority to say, that the lord chief justice of the common pleas concurs in that opinion."

After the trial, the judge proceeded to sum up the evidence.

Gentlemen of the Jury,

This has been a very tedious trial, and if therefore I should happen to omit any thing material, I trust that such as have notes will be so good as to assist me, and set me right. I shall say nothing of the general weight and tendency of the evidence; that, I am satisfied, from the attention you seemed to pay to this business in the course of the whole trial you are already sufficient masters of. The two points for you to consider, is, first, to decide whether the evidence has been sufficient to satisfy you that it was the prisoner forged the name "William Adair," to the bond, with which the prisoner now stands immediately charged;—the second is, whether she has been proved guilty of the publication of the same bond, Mrs. Perreau has sworn that such a bond was tendered, and delivered to her husband; Sir Thomas Frankland has sworn to the receiving of it;—therefore, if no bias may be supposed to operate on the witness, in the hope and expectation that the conviction of the prisoner may be the means of proving her husband's innocence, and on that proof of saving his life, there can be little doubt that the proof of publication is complete. This supposed bias and eventual interest does not, as I observed before, prevent her competency; it only goes to the credit of her evidence—The credit of an evidence, however doubtful, may nevertheless be supported and well sustained by corroborating circumstances. Such I take Cassidy's evidence, as far as it goes. He swears to a number of particulars, confirmatory of Mrs. Perreau's testimony, tho' they do not reach to an actual tendering or publication. If, therefore, you shall think the testimony of Mrs. Perreau, strengthened by the circumstances deposed by Cassidy, amount to a publication, then you will find the prisoner guilty, because the publication of a forged bond, knowing it to be forged, is equally criminal nal with the forging of it. On the other hand, if you think that Mrs. Perreau's evidence, considering the relation she now stands in, does not deserve credit, and that the circumstances sworn by Cassidy to support it, do not, taken together, amount to a publication, you will acquit her. As to the forgery, there is but one witness to that. Moody tells you, that the letters produced are of the same hand writing as the prisoner used to write, when she disguised or wrote what he calls a feigned hand.—He has entered into several reasons why he knew that hand; he says the name "William Adair," signed to the bond, is, he believes, the hand writing of the witness. If you are satisfied that this is a sufficient proof of the forgery, you will likewise find her guilty on that count. I must inform you on this head, that when a criminal is charged with any offence, it is incumbent on him to bring proof sufficient to contradict the matters urged against him, unless the charge be of such a nature as to require no defence. The prisoner has produced no evidence of any kind whatever, but what observations she made herself on the characters of the persons who have appeared against her. Mrs. Perreau, as to her credit; Sir Thomas Frankland, on the disgraceful evidence he has given; and Moody, from his contradiction, and the infamy of his character; all this, gentlemen, you will weigh in your own minds; and judge how far such a defence ought to determine you in your verdict. As to Christian Hart's evidence, and that of her husband, I must confess it is of a most extraordinary nature: it is flatly contradicted by Mr. Bayley and Isabel Wright. Though it does not immediately affect either of the questions now stated, if the truth could be attained, it would go a great way in establishing or overthrowing every thing that has been sworn here this day; but that from its nature being impossible, you must adhere solely to the points before alluded to, and decide accordingly. All I have to add is, that if any doubt should arise relative to the credit of one part of the evidence, or the sufficiency of the other, is to recommend to you to lean to the side of mercy.

The Generous Mussulman. A Moral Tale.

THE witty author of the Rehearsal has, in the character of prince Prettyman, exhibited a conflict between love and honour in a very laughable light; but when we have sufficiently indulged the mirth excited by his facetious grace of Buckingham, we must allow that the conflict which he has, with so much archness ridiculed, is not always ridiculous.

The conflicts between love and honour have afforded the fairest opportunities for the epic, elegiac, and dramatic poets to exert their respective talents, in the descriptive, tender, and pathetic style. On these hinges some of the finest parts of the heroic poem, and of the drama turn, and the noblest strokes of pathos in both have been produced by the distresses of lovers strongly agitated by opposite passions, by their military ardors, and by their amorous sensations; by their thirst for glory, and by their attachments to the fair, powerfully assaulted by the calls of honour and the stimulations of love, they have long remained in a state of suspense, like Hercules, between pleasure and virtue, and have at last found the charms of ambition too attractive to be resisted. Of this complexion was the principal person in the following old British tale; who, though passionately in love with the bright mistress of his affections, felt himself overcome by the superior brilliancy of a crusade, and left her (though not without the greatest reluctance) to gather laurels in the Holy Land: laurels which he hoped to lay at her feet on his return; and indeed it is highly probable, that by the hopes of his appearing on his return with redoubled lustre in her eyes, he was doubly animated to distinguish himself in the tented field against the enemies of Christ.

In the train of Richard the First, when he was seized with a passion to fight against the infidels, was a youth well born, well educated, and well connected; who by discovering the same ardor for the religious war which was carrying on in Palestine, recommended himself not a little to that martial monarch's attention, especially as in a contest, which occasioned much faction and dissension in the christian camp, and retarded all its operations, he was one of his most zealous adherents.

When Pierce Bagot (that was the youth's name) first felt the military passions, its impression was faint, because it was opposed by another which had long predominated in his breast. This passion was love, and those who read the subsequent character of the lady to whom he was tenderly attached, will not wonder at the struggles which he endured on her account; they will rather wonder, it may be, at his being able to leave her, breathing the spirit of a romantic knight-errant, more than the "deliberate valour" of a christian hero.

Among

Among all the ladies who appeared at Richard's court, Sybilla Scroope, the daughter of a gentleman of fortune, but not distinguished by any royal favours, was not the least noticed by every accurate judge of female beauty; with features elegantly arranged, and not lifeless, for her complexion was vermillioned with the glow of health, and her eyes were replete with expression, she had a sweetness of disposition which rendered her face additionally alluring. Her stature approached to the majestic, and her form was without a blemish. Her charms, however, were not confined to her person, she was as amiable within as she was outwardly attractive: for while "grace was in all her steps," goodness was visible in her every look; so that, upon the whole, she was generally allowed to have few superiors (riches and rank out of the question) among the most celebrated females of the age.

With this prepossessing fair one, Pierce Bagot found himself enamoured the first time he saw her at her father's house, at a distance from London, who one day received him, when he was very awkwardly distressed upon a journey, in the most hospitable manner; and as he found that his company proved agreeable to his generous entertainer, he was induced to stay longer with him than he had designed. It is not easy to say whether Mr. Scroope or his guest was most pleased; but as no man had more discernment with regard to personal merit than the former, and as the character of the latter would have borne the strictest examination, nobody who knew them both, shewed any surprize at their being mutually happy in each other's society.

In the appearance and behaviour of Mr. Scroope there was nothing striking, but every thing that was respectable. In the deportment of young Bagot there was a considerable share of intrinsic worth, and a no small one of external ornament. A more handsome Briton never appeared in the royal apartments; but with the polite accomplishments he had none of the polished vices of a courtier; and it was indeed a virtue (though pushed to an extreme) which made him relinquish the blessings of a peaceful life at home, to involve himself in the miseries of a romantic war in "regions far remote."

There was something in the very sound of a religious war which operated powerfully upon Pierce's mind, (often employed in religious speculations) and the frequent repetition of it at last silenced all the objections which love raised in opposition to honour. When his king, and the first men in the nation gave up the sweets of tranquility, and harnessed themselves for the field of Mars, without shrinking at the dangers to which they would be, probably, exposed in the pursuits of religious glory, could he, without being chargeable with a shameful inactivity, slumber out his days on a couch of down? Such a thought—so degrading a thought, was not to be admitted: he, therefore, determined to acquaint his dear Sybilla with the call which he had to brandish his sword against the Pagans.

He found her sitting in an arbour in her father's garden with Tasso's Jerusalem in her hand, having just read the description of Erminia when her lover appeared: and she looked, at that moment, in his eyes, so much handsomer than ever, that his resolution was staggered, and he felt the tender making a violent opposition to the heroic in his agitated bosom.

At the sight of her Pierce, Sybilla laid down her book, and rose, arrayed in smiles, to meet him: her smiles he returned, but as she fancied he did not advance towards her with his usual alacrity, she could not help asking him whether something had not happened to make him uneasy.

"Nothing, my dearest Sybilla, but the thoughts of being separated from thee."

"Why should such thoughts disturb my Pierce, said she, as our relations on both sides approve of our mutual attachment? Secure of their approbation what can hinder our union? What can divide us?"

"I know not how to tell you, my dearest Sybilla, what may—and what I believe—must divide us—but for the present only—what must retard, but what will not, I hope, prevent our union.—What think you of my going with our gracious monarch in his expedition to the Holy Land? Can you—"

Here he was obliged to stop—for poor Sybilla, at the bare apprehension of her lover's being engaged in that expedition, was on the point of fainting away. He recovered her, however, before her senses were totally vanished, and intreated her not to be so deeply affected by the word which he had just uttered.—"Can you not reconcile yourself, continued he, to my temporary absence from you; as that absence may be instrumental to my return to you covered with glory, and doubly worthy of your regard?"

"It is impossible for you to make yourself more worthy of my esteem, replied she, and as for glory, what addition can you gain to your reputation by an an unnecessary exertion of your courage? When your own country is attacked, your courage will then indeed be required; and though I should tremble for your safety, upon your quitting me for the camp, I would be the last person to dissuade you from appearing armed in your country's defence. But why should you fly to a distant spot, unprovoked by any national quarrel, and risk your precious life warring against a people who have not merited your particular resentment."

"The Saracens, my dearest angel, replied he, against whom I am going to draw the sword of justice, are the general enemies of Christendom. The war we wage against them is the war of religion. It is surely the duty of every good christian to chastize those who set up the Koran, every where as the standard of perfection. To oppose these daring unbelievers is to be engaged in the best cause to be conceived; and I shall not deem my life thrown away, I shall deem it nobly sacrificed in defence of that code which points out the certain path to salvation."

Sybilla was silenced by the pious conclusion of her enthusiastic lover's speech, but she was not convinced by it, that there was an indispensable necessity for his defending the code of christianity in arms against the votaries of Mahomet. She said nothing—she sighed—she wept—The tears trickling down her pallid cheeks (for the roses deserted them as soon as she heard her lover's military designs) instantaneously drove out of his mind all those ideas which the crusade had infused into it, and others, excited by love, took possession of it. Gazing at the beautiful object before him, doubly beautiful in consequence of her unhappy situation, he kissed the pearly drops of sorrow as they fell, and requested her, with an earnestness peculiarly adapted to the occasion, to be calm, to be cheerful, assuring her, that though his honour was at stake, he would remain at home in peace and indolence, while some of his bravest countrymen, with their king at their head, were employed abroad in the most heroic manner, if she commanded his stay.

The moment the last words were articulated, he wished however to recall them, having heated his imagination while he delivered them, with the subject which occasioned them. Yet as he had concluded his speech with an assurance which prohibited the gratification of his martial desires, he resolved to act agreeably to it, if his dear Sybilla's tender passion militated too strongly against his departure from England, to permit her to reflect upon it without the most painful sensations.—To his great satisfaction Sybilla, after a pause, during which she seemed totally inattentive to all sublimary affairs, replied, with a firm and spirited tone, "No, Pierce, never shall you say that your attachment to me prevented you from pursuing what you call the paths of honour. Sincerely as I love you, (and I am not ashamed to own it) I cannot think of your doing any thing which will, in your opinion, bring a slur upon your reputation upon my account. Go then: go to Palestine; follow your king to the holy land, and may victory crown the standard of Christ wherever it is carried."

The tenderness which was mixed with the spirit in this speech, and the looks with which it was accompanied, shook the young hero's soul; and the tumult in his bosom between love and honour was severe beyond expression. Melted by the former, and seized by the latter alternately, he for some time hung over the amiable mistress of his heart, uncertain how to act, in the agony of irresolution. At last, however, love yielded—honour was victorious. Breaking from her abruptly (for he was afraid to trust himself with her any longer) he hastily said, "Farewell." Sybilla faintly replied, "Heaven, wherever you go, preserve you."

After this severe conflict was over, Bagot made preparations for his voyage in the cause of religion; and when he was on board the ship destined for his conveyance from England, dispatched a letter to Sybilla, in which he most earnestly conjured her to take care of her health during his absence from her; and in the most solemn terms declared, that as nothing but the regard that he felt for his honour had prompted him to leave her before the celebration of their nuptials, he should return with new pleasure to make her his own by the most endearing ties, whether the troops of the confederated christians were successful, or whether they were defeated: concluding with the warmest prayers for her safety, and the firmest declarations of never-ceasing love.

Sybilla read her Pierce's letter with a variety of emotions: emotions easily to be conceived by those who have ever been in love. Just when she had finished the perusal of it, her father appeared; and as she was weeping over it, he naturally enquired quired into the cause of her tears. For some moments she could only weep. When she could speak, she said, "Read this letter, Sir, (holding it to him) and then wonder at my tears if you can."

Mr. Scroope, on reading the letter, started with surprize, not having suspected young Bagot's having any design to embark as an adventurer against the infidels, as he had not heard of it from any of his acquaintance, not even from his daughter, (who did not indeed truly believe he would carry it into execution till his letter arrived) and not being himself seized with the crusading spirit, gave him the appellation of a hot-headed young man; and told her, that as he had shewn so little consideration for her, when he was on the point of marrying her, she ought to forget there was such a man in the world.

Sybilla was ready to think with her father, that her lover had left her with too much precipitance, but she could not drive him from her memory: he had twined himself so strongly round her heart, that she could not disengage him from it. She loved him fondly in spite of his desertion, (a desertion which she could not approve, though she tried to consider it in the most favourable light) and was urged by her love to an action not to be defended by prudence, however it might have been forgiven by pity. She determined to follow her deserter, but without acquainting any living creature with her intentions, except a female servant, whose faithful attachment to her had merited the utmost confidence.

From her father she was particularly careful to conceal her intentions, well knowing that he would have opposed them with violence; and it was most probable, forcibly secure her under his own eye (if she persisted) to frustrate so romantic a resolution.

Having regulated all her affairs with the greatest circumspection, and met with no obstruction to her designs, she embarked on board a Venetian vessel, and sailed with a fair wind for the port to which the ship which contained her lover was bound, but was conveyed to a very different one, by having been removed to a Turkish vessel in a state of captivity.

It was the lot of Sybilla to be sold to a Saracen for a slave; but it was her fortune to fall into the hands of a man, who though a Mahometan, and piously devoted to the worship of the Mosque, conducted himself, in his moral character, with an exemplariness which would put many a consistory to the blush. Nominally a Turk, he was virtually a christian, for his life was a daily comment upon the purest precepts by which the New Testament is remarkably distinguished from all compositions.

Abudah was a man abounding in wealth and goodness; of a very charitable disposition, but no friend to ostentation. Happening to be at the place where Sybilla landed, he was so much struck by the decency, simplicity, and innocence of her appearance, that he immediately purchased her without making the least objection to the sum demanded for her.

Abudah had many female slaves, but none of them affected him in the same way as Sybilla. He was middle aged, but healthy and robust; he was also of an amorous constitution, but moved to such a degree by the history his now fair captive gave him of her life, than he refrained from asking any unchaste compliances from her: he even assured her, that if she should at any time see again the man who had won her heart, she should that moment be free; adding, that he would himself do all in his power to promote their union.

Sybilla's heart overflowed with gratitude at a behaviour so unexpected, in a man belonging to a nation to which she had (governed too much by local prejudices) affixed the epithet of barbarous.—It would be happy for us Englishmen if there were never any cruelties committed in England of which a Turk would be ashamed.

As Abudah was of a pacific temper, and averse to the bustle of a public life, he generally resided at a distance from any populous city or town, that he might enjoy the sweets of tranquility with the fewest interruptions. Soon after he had brought his new captive to his rural apartments, he had reason to believe that he should not long remain in a state of undisturbed repose. The flames of war began to spread towards his peaceful habitation; but he could not think of relinquishing a spot which he loved, till his residence in it became more than disagreeable—till it became absolutely dangerous.

Sybilla had great reason to be satisfied with the treatment which she met with from the generous Abudah, yet she reflected on him for whose sake she had thrown herself out of her father's protection, with a train of painful ideas sufficient to exclude that valuable blessing, mental composure. By her painful reflections her health was so much impaired, that that her life was supposed to be in a precarious condition. Abudah, while she was in a declining way, acted like a friend, a father, and a physician: he not only administered all the consolation he could to her mind, but having a no inconsiderable share of medical sagacity, he gave her some restoratives, which though they operated slowly, had evidently a good effect upon her constitution. To forward the efficacy of the medicines which he prescribed, with equal humanity and skill, he indulged her with little excursions, and often walked with her himself to see the pleasantest spots in the neighbourhood, that she might at once be amused with the surrounding views, and benefited by the circumambient air.

While they were in one of their evening excursions, during which they had wandered farther than they had intended at their first setting out, Sybilla started on a sudden at the appearance of a man lying upon the ground, in armour, one of his arms resting upon his shield, without any signs of life. Abudah, and his amiable companion, both imagined that he had been thrown from an unruly horse; after having been hurried from the field of battle before the engagement began, (as no wounds appeared) and left in that inanimate situation. Upon her nearer approach she screamed, and would have fainted, had not Abudah supported her with his friendly arm. As soon as she recovered, he of course asked her why she had been so much terrified. Instead of replying, she ran towards the apparent corse, and leaning over it, with streaming eyes exclaimed, "O my dearest lover, by what most hapless event camest thou into this melancholy condition?—O heavens!—he stirs—he breathes—he is not—my Pierce is not dead—assist me, my kind protector, continued she, turning to Abudah, who was deeply touched with compassion at the sight before him—assist me in restoring him to life."

Abudah, truly sympathizing with her, gave her all the assistance in his power; and their joint applications were so successful, that the heroic youth soon discovered not only the most favourable signs of life, but at the same time the repossession of his faculties.

It is extremely difficult to express the mingled surprize and joy which Bagot felt when he found himself restored to his senses: when he found that he was greatly indebted for the recovery of them to his dear Sybilla. Words could not immediately convey his feeling either to her or the generous Mussulman, who had joined his friendly aid to hers; but the moment he could articulate, he poured out his soul in the most grateful acknowledgments to them both.

Abudah, upon this occasion appeared in a light highly to his advantage. With a mind unwarped by any religious or political prejudices, he considered the military hero before him as a man who stood in need of his humanity; not as a man who had no pretensions to the exercise of it, because his creed was different, because he did not believe in the doctrines of the prophet of Mecca:

By Abudah's kind attendance, and salutary application, Bagot soon recovered from the bruises he had received from the unruliness of his steed, which had indeed carried him from the field of battle before he had an opportunity to signalize his courage; by him he was entertained with the utmost hospitality, and by him he was loaded with presents at his departure with his Sybilla, after having, in compliance with her most earnest intreaties, abandoned his military pursuits, in order to convey her to England. On their return to their native country, they were received by their parents with open arms; and with their sincere approbation they were, in a short time, happily united in Hymen's bands.

Memoirs of the Life and Actions of the late Sir Charles Saunders.

MR. Saunders entered early into the royal navy, and was so distinguished by that undoubted judge of naval merit, the late lord Anson, as to be appointed on his recommendation, first lieutenant of his own ship, the Centurion, when he sailed on the expedition to the South Seas in September, 1740. In February following, during their stay at Port St. Julian, on the coast of Patagonia, which was occasioned by an accident that happened to the Tryal's main mast, Mr. Saunders was promoted by the commodore to the command of that sloop, in the room of captain Cheap, removed to the Wager. But captain Saunders lying dangerously ill of a fever on board the Centurion, and it being the opinion of the surgeons, that the removing him on board his own ship in his present condition might hazard his life, Mr. Anson gave an order to Mr. Saumarez, first lieutenant of the Centurion, to act as master and commander of the Tryal during the illness of her captain.

In the passage round Cape Horn, captain Saunders, out of his small complement of 80 men, buried 34; and, arriv-ving at the island of Juan Fernandes soon after the commodore, left any ships of the Squadron should have mistaken the island of Mafa Fuero for that of Fernandes, all its bays and creeks were, by Mr. Anson's orders, more particularly examined by captain Saunders (says Mr. Robins *) "than they ever had been before, or perhaps ever will be again;" though in this last circumstance he is mistaken, as captain Carteret, (see Hawke's worth's voyages) in May, 1767, much more accurately surveyed that island, and has also given a chart of it. It is observable, that the Spaniards taken soon after in a prize by the Centurion were astonished on seeing the Tryal sloop at anchor; that, after all their fatigues, the English could so soon have built such a vessel on the spot; and could scarce believe that such a bauble as that could pass round Cape Horn, when the best ships of Spain were obliged to put back. On September 18, 1741, captain Saunders being dispatched on a cruise off Valparaíso, took a large merchant-man, of 600 tons, bound to that port from Callao. But to balance this success, the Tryal soon after sprung both her masts, and, besides, was so leaky, that, on joining the commodore, he found it necessary to take out her people, and destroy her, and in her stead appointed her prize to be a frigate in his majesty's service, mounting her with 20 guns, manning her with the Tryal's crew, and giving commissions to the captain and other officers accordingly. After scuttling and sinking her, captain Saunders, with his new frigate (called the Tryal-prize) was dispatched on a cruise off the high land of Valparaíso, in company with the Centurion's prize, where, however, they had no success, and so proceeded down the coast to the rendezvous off Nasca, where they joined the commodore, November 2. From that time till the April following captain Saunders kept company with the commodore; but then the whole numbers on board the Squadron not amounting to the complement of a fourth-rate man of war, it was agreed to destroy the Tryal's and other prizes, and to reinforce the Gloucester with the best part of her crew: and accordingly, on April 27, they were towed on shore and scuttled in the harbour of Chequetan.

Soon after the Centurion's arrival at Macao, in China, in November, 1742, captain Saunders took his passage on board a Swedish ship, charged with dispatches from the commodore, and arrived in the Downs in May, 1743. By this means he lost the great emoluments that attended the capture of the Manilla galleon in June following. We have not been able to learn what ship this brave officer commanded (as we can hardly suppose he was unemployed) till March, 1745, when he was made captain of the Sandwich, of 90 guns. Nor had he any opportunity of distinguishing himself till October 14, 1747, when, being commander of the Yarmouth, of 64 guns, in the Squadron of Admiral Hawke, he had a great share in the victory of that day, the Neptune and Monarque, both of 74 guns, striking to him: and though he had 22 men killed and 70 wounded, he gallantly proposed to captains Saumarez and Rodney the pursuing the two ships that escaped, which they in consequence engaged, and probably would have taken, if the death of captain Saumarez (our hero's fellow-lieutenant in the Centurion) had not occasioned his ship to haul her wind, and do no more service. On the trial of captain Fox, of the Kent, for misbehaviour on that day, November 25, our captain was one of the witnesses against him. In April, 1750, he was elected member of parliament for Plymouth, in the room of lord Vere Beauclerk, deceased. In May, 1752, Mr. Saunders sailed as commodore, in the Penzance, of 40 guns, to protect the Newfoundland fishery, with instructions also to look for a supposed island in lat. 49 deg. 40 min. longitude 24 deg. 30 min. from the Lizard, in search of which commodore Rodney (some weeks before) cruized ten days in vain. It is needless to add that commodore Saunders had no better success. In April, 1754, he was appointed treasurer of Greenwich hospital, an office which on his farther promotion he resigned; and in the parliament that met at Westminster May 31, he was returned for Heydon, in Yorkshire, by the interest of his great and constant friend lord Anson. In March, 1755, a war being apprehended, Mr. Saunders was appointed captain of the Prince, a new 90 gun ship; and in June he treated with the utmost magnificence, on board his ship at Spithead, the nobility who came to see the firings of the fleet on the anniversary of the king's accession. This command he resigned in December following, on being appointed comptroller of the navy; and on this occasion his seat in Parliament being vacated, he was re-elected. About the same time he was chosen an elder brother of the Trinity house.

house. In June, 1756, on advices being received of the misconduct of admiral Byng, off Minorca, a large promotion of flag-officers was made purposely to include Mr. Saunders; and he was sent immediately to the Mediterranean as rear admiral of the Blue, with Sir Edward Hawke, to take the command of the fleet; and on admiral Hawke's return to England in January 1757, the sole command devolved on him. In February 1759, Mr. Saunders was appointed vice-admiral of the Blue, and sailed from Spithead on board the Neptune, of 90 guns, February 17, (with general Wolfe on board) as chief naval commander on the expedition to Quebec, the success of which is too well known to need any farther mention. Returning from that glorious conquest, in November, with general Townshend, they were informed, in the chops of the channel, of the Brest squadron being sailed, on which the admiral took the gallant resolution of going to join Sir Edward Hawke, though without orders. But that affair was decided before his arrival. Landing at Corke, he arrived at Dublin, December 15, where going to the play he was saluted by the audience with the highest demonstrations of applause. December 26 he arrived in London. For this great service Mr. Saunders was appointed lieutenant general of the Marines; and on his taking his seat in the house of commons, January 23, 1760, the thanks of the house were given to him by the speaker. May 21, he sailed from St. Helen's, with the Neptune, &c. to take the command in the Mediterranean. On May 26, 1761, he was installed a knight of the bath in Henry VII's chapel; and in the parliament which met November 3, he was re-elected for Heydon. In October, 1762, Sir Charles Saunders was advanced to the rank of vice admiral of the White; and on September 16, 1766, having some time had a seat at the admiralty-board, he was sworn of his majesty's most honourable privy-council, and appointed first lord of the admiralty; but this post he held only about two months. In the funeral procession of the duke of York, November 3, 1767, he was one of the admirals who supported the canopy. In the new parliament which met May 10, 1768, he was again chosen for Heydon. In October 1770, he was appointed admiral of the Blue. In the present parliament, which met November 29, 1774, Sir Charles Saunders was a fourth time chosen for the borough of Heydon; and remarkable it is, and much to his honour, that five hours after his lamented death, which happened at his house in Spring-Garden on December 7, 1775, (of the gout in his stomach,) a just eulogium was paid him in that house by two members * distinguished for their virtues and abilities. His corpse was privately interred in Westminster-abbey on the 12th, near the monument † of General Wolfe, "his brother of the war." To admiral Keppel (who had been lieutenant with him in the Centurion) he has left (we hear) 5000l. and 1200l. per ann. to admiral Sir Hugh Palliser, 5000l. to Timothy Brett, Esq; 5000l. to his nephew, 200l. per ann. to a young lady that lived with him, 400l. per ann. and all his household furniture, except plate and pictures, which are given to his niece, together with the bulk of his fortune.

Short Tales, Fables, and Reflections: Calculated for the Improvement of younger Minds, by promoting the Love of Virtue, a Taste for Knowledge, and an early Acquaintance with the Works of Nature.

Affection to Parents.

AN amiable youth was lamenting, in terms of the sincerest grief, the death of a most affectionate parent. His companion endeavoured to console him by the reflection, that he had always behaved to the deceased with duty, tenderness, and respect. So I thought, replied the youth, whilst my parent was living; but now I recollect, with pain and sorrow, many instances of disobedience and neglect, for which, alas! it is too late to make atonement.

Tenderness to Mothers.

MARK that parent hen! said a father to his beloved son. With what anxious care does she call together her offspring, and cover them with her expanded wings? The kite is hovering in the air, and, disappointed of his prey, may perhaps dart upon the hen herself and bear her off in his talons!

Does not this sight suggest to you the tenderness and affection of your mother? Her watchful care protected you in the helpless period of infancy, when the nourished you with her milk, taught your limbs to move, and your tongue to sip its unformed accents. In childhood she has mourned over your little griefs; has rejoiced in your innocent delights; has administered to you the healing balm in sickness; and has instilled into your mind the love of truth, of virtue, and of wisdom. Oh! cherish every sentiment of respect for such a mother. She merits your warmest gratitude, esteem, and veneration.

Cruelty punished.

A PACK of ravenous fox hounds were half starved in their kennel, to render them more furious and eager in the chase; and were severely lashed every day by a merciless keeper, that they might be disciplined to the strictest observance of his looks and commands. It happened that this petty tyrant entered the kennel without his scourge. The dogs observed his defenceless state; and, instantly flying upon him, at once satiated their hunger and revenge, by tearing him to pieces.

Whilst you pity the unhappy fate of the keeper, lament that in a civilised country such cruelties should be exercised, as to give occasion to it.

The Pert and the Ignorant are prone to Ridicule.

A Gentleman, of a grave deportment, was busily engaged in blowing bubbles of soap and water, and was attentively observing them as they expanded and burst in the sunshine. A pert youth fell into a fit of loud laughter at a sight so strange, and which shewed, as he thought, such folly and insanity.—Be ashamed, young man, said one who passed by, of your rudeness and ignorance. You now behold the greatest philosopher of the age, Sir Isaac Newton, investigating the nature of light and colours by a series of experiments, no less curious than useful, though you deem them childish and insignificant.

Honesty and Generosity.

A POOR man, who was door keeper to a house in Milan, found a purse which contained two hundred crowns. The man who had lost it, informed by a public advertisement, came to the house and, giving sufficient proof that the purse belonged to him, the door keeper restored it. Full of joy and gratitude, the owner offered his benefactor twenty crowns, which he absolutely refused. Ten were then proposed, and afterwards five; but, the door keeper still continuing inexorable, the man threw his purse upon the ground, and in an angry tone cried, 'I have lost nothing, nothing at all, if you thus refuse to accept of a gratuity.' The door keeper then consented to receive five crowns, which he immediately distributed amongst the poor.

Cruelty to Insects.

JACOBUS indulged himself in the cruel entertainment of torturing and killing flies. He tore off their wings and legs, and then watched with pleasure their impotent efforts to escape from him. Sometimes he collected a number of them together, and crushed them at once to death, glorifying, like many a celebrated hero, in the devastation he committed. His brother remonstrated with him, in vain, on this barbarous conduct. He could not persuade him to believe that flies are capable of pain, and have a right, no less than ourselves, to life, liberty, and enjoyment. The signs of agony which, when tormented, they express by the quick and various contortions of their bodies, he neither understood nor would attend to.

Alexis had a microscope; and he defired Jacobus, one day, to examine a most beautiful and surprizing animal. Mark, said he, how it is studded from head to tail with black and silver, and its body all over beset with the most curious bristles! The head contains a pair of lively eyes, incircled with silver hairs; and the trunk consists of two parts, which fold over each other. The whole body is ornamented with plumes and decorations, which surpass all the luxuries of dress, in the courts of the greatest princes. Jacobus was pleased and astonished with what he saw, and impatient to know the name and properties of this wonderful animal, it was withdrawn from the magnifier; and, when offered to his naked eye, proved to be a poor fly which had been the victim of his wanton cruelty.

The folly and odiousness of Affectation.

LUCY, Emilia, and Sophronia, seated on a bank of daisies, near a purling stream, were listening to the music of a neighbouring grove. The sun gilded with his setting beams the western sky, gentle Zephyrs breathed around, and the feathered songsters seemed to vie with each other in the evening notes of gratitude and praise. Delighted with the artless melody of the linnet, the goldfinch, the woodlark, and the thrush, they were all ear, and observed not a peacock, which had strayed from a distant farm, and was approaching them with a majestic pace and expanded plumage. The harmony of the concert was soon interrupted by the loud and harsh cries of this stately bird; which, though chased away by Emilia, continued his vociferations with the confidence that conscious beauty too often inspires. Does this foolish bird, says Lucy, fancy that he is qualified to sing, because he is furnished with a spreading tail, ornamented with the richest colours? I know not, replied Sophronia, whether the peacock be capable of such a reflection; but I hope that you and Emilia will always avoid the display of whatever is inconsistent with your sex, your station, or your character. Shun affectation in all its odious forms; assume no borrowed airs; and be content to please, to shine, or to be useful in the way which nature points out, and which reason approves.

Scepticism condemned.

SOPHRON asserted that he could hear the slightest scratch of a pin, at the distance of ten yards. It is impossible, said Alexis, and immediately appealed to Euphronius, who was walking with them. 'Though I don't believe,' replied Euphronius, 'that Sophron's ears are more acute than yours, yet I disapprove of your hasty decision concerning the impossibility of what you so little understand. You are ignorant of the nature of sound, and of the various means by which it may be increased, or quickened in its progress; and modesty should lead you, in such a case, to suspend your judgment till you have made the proper and necessary inquiries. An opportunity now presents itself, which will afford Sophron the satisfaction he desires. Place your ear at one end of this long rafter of deal timber, and I will scratch the other end with a pin. Alexis obeyed, and distinctly heard the sound; which, being conveyed through the tubes of the wood, was augmented in loudness, as in a speaking trumpet, or the horn of a huntsman.

Scepticism and credulity are equally unfavourable to the acquisition of knowledge. The latter anticipates, and the former precludes all inquiry. One leaves the mind satisfied with error, the other with ignorance.

Gratitude and Piety.

ARTABANES was distinguished with peculiar favour by a wife, powerful, and good prince. A magnificent palace, surrounded with a delightful garden, was provided for his residence. He partook of all the luxuries of his sovereign's table; and was invested with extensive authority; and admitted to the honour of a free intercourse with his gracious master. But Artabanes was insensible of the advantages which he enjoyed; his heart glowed not with gratitude and respect; he avoided the society of his benefactor, and abused his bounty.—I detest such a character, said Alexis, with generous indignation! It is your own picture, which I have drawn, replied Euphronius. The great potentate of heaven and earth has placed you in a world which displays the highest beauty, order, and magnificence; and which abounds with every means of convenience, enjoyment and happiness. He has furnished you with such powers of body and mind as give you dominion over the fishes of the sea, the fowls of the air, and the beasts of the field. And he has invited you to hold communion with him, and to exalt your own nature by the love and imitation of his divine perfections. Yet have your eyes wandered with brutal gaze over the fair creation, unconscious of the mighty hand from which it sprung. You have rioted in the profusion of nature, without one secret emotion of gratitude to the sovereign dispenser of all good. And you have slighted the glorious converse, and forgotten the presence of that omnipotent being, who fills all space, and exists through all eternity.

Courage.

BRASIDAS, a Spartan general who was distinguished for his bravery and generosity, once seized a mouse, and, being bit by it, suffered it to escape: 'There is no animal,' said he, 'so contemptible, but may be safe, if he have courage to defend himself.'

Continuation of certain Remarks on the Popery Laws of this Kingdom, grounded on free constitutional Principles.

EVERY act is to be deemed meritorious or not, as the motives on which the same is founded partake of humanity or otherwise. Thus we are inclined to praise the effect, however trifling the consideration, should the cause that instigates the act be found lovely in itself; on the contrary, should the effect be ever so considerable, and yet proceed from an ungenerous motive, we are too apt to conclude, that from so foul a source nought can issue but an impure stream; its lustre is confined, and the end for which it was intended, to benefit society, becomes altogether defeated;—sad effects of a narrow imagination! How delightful then, how beneficent in a land of liberty must the blessing of toleration be, where the rest of the community is not hurt by the gift, nor the donors themselves prejudiced, and yet a particular sectary made perfectly happy? it is methinks like lighting a candle by the flame of another, which first flame is neither extinguished, but communicates its blessings to all around.

your of the papists ; how far they are consistent with the present times ; and whether they deserve at this day to be stamped with that estimation they have so long insisted on as their claim ; in doing which my intention is not to pourtray religion, or to set up one faith in competition to another, but plainly to determine on the propriety or inconsistency of those laws, which at present are to be considered amongst the number of penal ones in force in this kingdom.—First then, I shall beg leave to consider papists as dissenters from the established religion, in which sense let us see whether they have not been more hardly and illiberally dealt with, than the protestant dissenters. Every one who reads the English history must acknowledge the religious zeal of these last, was as alarming as it was unbecoming, until at length the legislature, to quiet their turbulent disposition, was constrained to impose many severe penalties and disabilities on them, which by a similar indulgence, were afterwards removed ; for no sooner did a proper opportunity offer itself, than an act passed in Wm. and Mary, sect. 2, cap. 18, commonly called the toleration act, whereby all these disabilities were suspended. Let us now see whether popish dissenters have experienced the like lenity, at a time when the pope's power in temporal affairs appears totally to have vanished, especially as their religion, though different from that established, aims not to subvert it. For I presume when I speak in favour of catholic dissenters, it will be generally allowed me, that they boast themselves members of the same holy catholic church, and which is sufficient for me, call themselves christians ; possibly I may be answered thus, was there any prospect that the Roman catholics, consistent with the maxims of their religion, could renounce the pope's supremacy, they might receive the like benefits, since it would not only be absurd but incompatible with the constitution, on the footing it stands at present, that a religion, one of whose tenets is so directly counter to the established happy succession to the crown of these kingdoms, should be entitled to so great a favour at the hands of the legislature ? To which I reply, that such an argument at a time when the pope endeavoured to extend his dominion, and to reduce the crown of Great-Britain to his imperial authority, might be advanced with justice ; but at this day is too nugatory to deserve an answer. Before the reformation, the crown indeed was on a less settled footing ; it hung as if suspended between the extraordinary power of the barons on one part, and the extensive interest of the pope on the other. The succession to the crown of Great-Britain at that time deserved not the name of hereditary. Too much regulated by the temper of the times, it wore the like fanatic and various appearance ; witness the many interruptions to this lineal descent, instanced in the exclusion of the house of York, and in the unprecedented reign of Henry VII. At present however, it is established on true hereditary principles, nor can it be overturned but by a total revolution of the constitution. That the papists acknowledge the pope's jurisdiction I admit, but it is in ecclesiastical not temporal matters, and surely there cannot be a more substantial proof of this, than in the great cheerfulness and willingness lately testified by the papists, to subscribe the test act, glad of an opportunity whereby they can demonstrate their loyalty and fidelity to his majesty and his government, which makes me repeat what I have elsewhere advanced, that the penal laws of any constitution ought to keep pace with the concurrent circumstances of times and dispositions, by them to be either regulated, enforced, or abolished. Before I quit the subject of protestant dissenters, I shall beg leave to offer one other argument, namely, granted that this particular sectary, who styling themselves members of the established church, but who by their tenets manifestly and tortuously pervert the form of a religion, which has acquired the name of perfect at this day, deserved this indulgence at the hands of the legislature ; the papists a fortiori, are entitled to the like, whose aim has not been to pervert or distort the established religion ; but who setting up for themselves a religion in no sense injurious to society, have been early taught to expect salvation by a spiritual adherence to the same ; and here give me leave to mention the words of the ingenious judge Blackstone* on this subject : “ If there shall appear to be a time (and surely it is now arrived) when all fears of a pretender shall have vanished, and the power and influence of the pope shall become feeble, ridiculous, and despicable, not only in England, but in every kingdom of Europe, it probably would not then be amiss to review and soften those rigorous edicts, at least till the civil principles of the Roman catholics called again upon the legislature, to renew them, for (says he) it ought not to be left in the breast of every merciless bigot, to drag down the vengeance of their occasional laws upon inoffensive mistaken subjects, in opposition to the lenient inclinations of the civil magistrate, and the destruction of every principle of toleration and religious liberty." These are the words of a man no less famed for his knowledge and abilities in the law, than his attachment to the constitution,—the best cultivated ground, though sown uniformly with a particular seed, will produce foreign spontaneous blades; it is the lot of humanity that perfection should not inherit sublunary things, and it would be fruitless, nay impossible, to weed out all the different heterogeneous parts that deform the face of nature. A task of difficulty and inutility combined can never reflect any honour on the persons who undertake it. Let us rather, if we are to exercise our laws, look out for worthy objects for their animadversion; but let us not indiscriminately involve a set of persecuted people, in the self same crimes for which their ancestors have been punished; for what at this day can the severe catalogue of laws against papists else signify? Not long since a question was agitated in the senate in favour of papist mortgagees, when the event shewed that however unsuccessful the attempt, the times were not so corrupt, but that there stood forth patrons in support of a measure, as advantageous to the nation in general as interesting to the parties. Many of the nobility, on an occasion of such concern, were forward in promoting a law, which was to grant papists real security in lands for the money, which was to centre in the hands of individuals; an exchange how reasonable, a benefit how devoutly to be wished? The arguments offered by such noble advocates were feeling, because natural, because interesting, amounting to no less an assurance than that this nation must indubitably reap advantages in an especial degree, by the communication of that dormant money, which was suffered to lye unprofitably in the hands of so many wealthy papists. But even here the spirit of persecution seemed to be revived, and the very name of Roman catholics, without the other considerations of times and temper, was sufficient to throw out the bill. It is hard indeed, and in an age that boasts of liberty, unbecoming that the papists should be permitted only to taste the delusive happiness of proffered blessings; but like Tantalus in the fable, be doomed never to come within a certain reach of them; is not this to grant papists the power of taking leases for 31 years, but at the same time to deny them any interest in perpetuity? If papists, from their religion are supposed virtually to renounce that allegiance to his majesty, which every subject is bound in common to observe, I cannot see how want of fixed property can reduce them to a more perfect obedience, unless indeed jealousy from an inexperience of benefits common to society, can be said to create that attachment and fidelity, which content and an equal mind are alone able to bring about: I blush to see the necessity of urging this question so long in a land of liberty; let it not be said that in times of civility and learning, persecution has raised her horrid head, but let it be remembered that the laws of this kingdom, fraught with the most christian liberality, ought ever to be uniform and consistent with themselves. To suppose the pope at this day formidable enough to extend his jurisdiction temporally, and to make this an objection for not relaxing those penal laws, is in effect to suppose a power revived, which with pleasure we may observe has been extinct for some centuries, than which nothing can be more absurd or ridiculous. Let us now observe the unavoidable consequences of this severity. Unlike the tenets of their religion, the papists at best can only be lukewarm politicians; stripped of every valuable privilege that could endear them to this or that government, they at length become adventurers in idea, so that being denied the hope of transmitting to posterity a property of a secure and permanent nature, they naturally attach themselves to that quarter, whence they may expect the liberty they have been so industriously searching after. If liberty be a nominal blessing, adieu to all real political safety; if a real blessing, ought it not to diffuse its lustre generally? that every individual of society may receive one common advantage from it. To speak judicially therefore, there is time enough to put penal laws in force, when a manifest injury has been offered to society; the present popery laws are penal laws in their full extent, all penal laws imply an infringement on the rights of society, the present popery laws wait not for this injury; for they punish before the crime committed, which carries but too clearly an idea of severity and absurdity on the face of it; to set this matter in a clearer light if possible, I will but appeal to the candour and discernment cernment of such as have at any time made the popery laws their study, whether they do not speak the following language: Whereas the Roman catholics are persons who profess popish tenets, and acknowledge the pope as supreme head of the church; and whereas several have many ages ago been convicted of attributing the like dignity to him in temporal matters; and whereas many insurrections have also been set on foot, and rebellions espoused in times of greater barbarity and corruption; therefore the legislature has thought fit for crimes yet in EMBRIO to criminate their posterity, by enforcing such penal laws as must rob them of the like privileges their fellow-subjects at present enjoy.

These I conceive to be the sentiments of the penal laws; how consistent and with what humanity urged must be left to the breast of every impartial man at this day to decide. Having now shown the inexpediency and absurdity of these laws, I will next endeavour to show their futility, which I shall proceed to do, by trying to collect the sense of the legislature at the time of enacting those laws, and the end proposed by them, for all laws, more especially penal ones, are supposed to have some end in view at the time they were enacted. The end, as may be best understood in framing those laws, was to secure the crown of these kingdoms on the most lasting footing, to prevent insurrections, and to suppress any conspiracies against his majesty or his government (if compulsory laws, which are to affect the subject, whether guilty or otherwise, can properly be said to have this end in contemplation) and what is this, I would ask the legislature, but to punish treason? to prevent which our laws have wisely ordered that so great a crime should be deemed capital; I beseech you, therefore, where was the necessity of enacting other laws? since taking the utmost force and front of their offending, it but amounted when committed to treason; hence we may conclude that to punish Roman catholics for crimes they have not committed, and which had they committed a more severe and capital punishment awaits, is as it were to stigmatize a people for professing a faith, which they imbibed with their first milk.

Would it not be absurd in ordinary crimes to divest a man of his goods and chattels, and to entail a corruption on his blood, who never was convicted of the crime of felony? such a proceeding at this day in a country of liberty, I believe, would be heard with the utmost indignation; it is no doubt useful for example and persuasion sake, and the laws have very properly annexed those infamous circumstances of disgrace as infignia to the crime of felony; but who will say that compulsion ever made a better member of society? or that the manners ever received improvement by being circumscribed within ungenerous limits? Possibly a review of the lenient and valuable blessings we enjoy in the administration of justice, derived from a most perfect constitution, may for uniformity sake, recommend the abolition of those popery laws, as differing from the other laws, which apparently partake of the spirit of true freedom, in a stronger and more forcible manner than what I am able to express. By tracing the godlike features of such policy, probably government may be waked from that inactivity, or rather cruel neglect, hitherto paid to the liberties of as loyal subjects as ornament the state; and first the doctrine of Mainprize challenges our admiration in the earliest process in criminal affairs, no person being actually deprived of his liberty, but suffered to appear by his bail, until actually convicted of the crime laid to his charge, unless in cases of treason or felony. Why need I also enumerate the advantages resulting to society from the institution of a grand and petit jury? they are the sure palladiums of every man's liberty, which never can be wrested from him, while they continue to be the measure of the laws; such a delicacy and caution, mixed with tenderness, has been in-wrought in the very being of our constitution, as to challenge all other nations for the like humanity; still, however, it remains to be made more perfect by the annulling those penal laws in force against papists; they are so many irregularities and inequalities, which, while they are permitted to traverse so polished a surface, must retard the generous course of freedom. Every part of this regular machine should be kept in that wished-for order, that, as Horace says, totus teres atque rotundus, it may in the course of its rotation reflect ten thousand graces on the community in general. Like a superior planet, it should be seen in that direction with the sun, that no obscure side may be obverted to any spectator, for let it be remembered, that as in religion, so in politics, he who offends in one point against the dictates of freedom, is guilty of the whole.

An Impartial Review of New-Publications.

I. The Pilgrim: or a Picture of Life. In a Series of Letters, written mostly from London by a Chinese Philosopher, to his Friend at Quang-Tong. Containing Remarks upon the Laws, Customs, and Manners of the English and other Nations: illustrated by a Variety of curious and interesting Anecdotes, and Characters drawn from real Life. 2 Vols.

THE author's remarks are judicious, and some of his characters may be drawn from real life. We hope for the honour of human nature—of our national police, and of those beings called noblemen, some however are drawn far beyond it. There is certainly too much severity in some of his strictures, but the pilgrim's description of the Custom-house officers disposition, and behaviour, is too faithful a picture of many of that class; which we present to our readers.

"Our voyage is happily at an end. We are safe at anchor in a harbour at one of the extremities of the island.—As soon as we entered it, a number of men came into the ship, without asking any permission, and seemed to take possession of it as if it were their own.

"On my demanding of the commander, along with whom I happened to be, who they were; he told me they were men appointed by the government to take care that no part of the commodities brought in the ship should be carried to land, without first paying the taxes imposed upon them for the public service.

"How can these men prevent it?" said I. "They are not sufficient in number to resist the mariners, should they be inclined to take their merchandize on shore."

"That is very true," he answered; "but then it is known, that any force offered to them would be attended with the worst consequences. The offenders would not only lose their merchandize, which would be taken from them by the power of the state, but also suffer an ignominious death, for a violation of laws so necessary to support it."

"And are the governors certain," I returned, "that these men will not connive at what they are appointed to prevent? What means do they use to assure themselves of their fidelity?"

"They oblige them to take an oath," he replied truly, "that they will execute their duty honestly."

"But do they never break that oath?" I continued.

"Daily," said he; "often the very hour after they take it. Nor do those who impose it expect they should do otherwise."

January, 1776.

"Good Heaven!" I exclaimed; "what do I hear? But I must be under some error. Will you, Sir, forgive my troubling you with a question or two more? What is the nature of an oath in this country? What is the opinion conceived of it? With us, an oath is an act of religion, held so sacred, that it is never taken but on the most important occasions, and in the most solemn manner; and a man who should violate it, would not only be cast out of society, he would die of affright; the very terrors of his own conscience would drive him to despair."

"I am sorry to say," he returned, "that the case is different here. Oaths are made here so common, that they have lost all respect; and imposed on such occasions, that it is impossible they should be kept; insomuch, that instead of answering the end for which they are imposed, they only occasion a disbelief of those principles from which they should derive their effect. Matters of religion should never be prostituted to other purposes; nor its obligations opposed to such temptations, as human nature is too seldom able to resist. I have myself taken oaths, which I knew it was impossible for me to keep. But what could I do? I must either take them or quit a business on which I depend for bread." Saying which he left me in evident embarrassment.

I had not time to make any reflections on the words of this unhappy man, when one of those guardians of the law came up to me, and without any preface told me, that if I had any business to do, there was no officer in the ship who would serve me more reasonably than himself.

It is not possible for me to express the horror with which I was struck at the profligacy of this proposal, which I understood too well from the conversation I had just before had with the commander. Looking him steadily in the face, "wretched man!" I replied, "can you think any price equal to so black a crime?"

Such a refusal was so unexpected, that he knew not what to say. He stared at me, for some moments, unable to reply; then turned off, muttering to himself, "the fellow's a fool!"

That he met few such fools, I too plainly saw. During our whole stay, there was a mart held publicly in the ship, every thing bought at which was carried on shore without hindrance from the men sworn to prevent it, and often by themselves; and this I had reason to believe was the true motive for our stopping here."

II. An Historic Epistle from Omiah to the Queen of Otabeite; being his Remarks on the English Nation, with Notes by the Editor.

An ingenious and severe satyr on several persons, classes, and customs in England; but had the author taken a little more time, he might have rendered it more perfect. To remove the possibility of a doubt, that the piece is not entirely Omiah's own production, the satyrift says he hath ordered the original MS. to be left at the printer's (after the manner of Offian's) as an incontestible proof. We subjoin the following lines as a specimen of his abilities.

"Thus, since from error all their conduct springs, [brings.

'Tis pity that his lordship had not carried on his exquisite calculation a little farther: for example, an hundred years, when three hundred thousand seamen would have made a capital figure. III. The improved Culture of the three principal Grasses, Lucerne, Sainfoin, and Burnet, &c. to which are added some Observations on Clover.

Improvements in agriculture make a slow progress among farmers.—They are not for innovations or alterations, however strongly recommended, of which there are too many instances. Our author appears to write from a practical knowledge of his subject, and we wish the farmers to attend to his observations.
He says, that Lucerne, as a green food for horses and other cattle, in summer is superior to every other kind of grass for rich nourishment ; that Sainfoin affords plentiful crops and excellent hay, for the support of cattle in winter, and in one respect is more advantageous than the best meadows ; that Burnet is a most valuable article in the spring for the cattle, and that clover is become so profitable, that the farmers, after long slighting it, cannot pretend to pay their rent without sowing it.

Clouds become possessed of their Electricity, deduced from known Facts and Properties of that Matter, &c.

This essay hath merit, and the following observation we recommend to the attention of our readers. The securest situation for persons overtaken by a thunder storm would not be less than fifteen, or more than twenty feet from the outermost branches of a tree, or rather at that distance between two, if at hand, and about forty from the foundation of a building. And it would be right for them to put the money out of their pockets, and the buckles out of their shoes, and to have no kind of metal about or near then. In houses that have no conductors, persons should during the thunder keep as far from the walls of their rooms as they can, especially from that wall where the chimney is. Thus many lives may be preserved.

V. *Remarks on the principal Acts of the 13th Parliament of Great-Britain. Vol.
1st. particularly on the Acts relating to the Colonies, with a Plan of Reconciliation.*

Many of the remarks are very judicious—the author condemns that part of the act for regulating the government of Massachusetts-Bay, which relate to the sheriff, "who now (he says) may be a needy dependant, and is liable to be dismissed at any time, for no assignable reason, by the servant of the crown, and a council which is only an instrument of the crown. A governor may name his footman to be sheriff, and for life, and no punishment whatever is threatened by the act, either against the negligence or partiality of the sheriff." Our remarker asks "will the Americans here after trust to your professions of wishing to communicate to the colonies, the blefsings of the English constitution? Will they not resent as a mockery, this affixing the name of an officer respectable in England, to a creature so totally dissimilar in America? There is certainly no more resemblance between an English sheriff, and the sheriff appointed by this act, than between a consul commanding the Roman legions, and a consul settling disputes about figs and raisins at Smyrna."

The author acknowledges that by the Quebec-act, the religion of Rome, popery, is established in that province, but contends that by treaties they had a right to this establishment. If he will consult the treaties to which he alludes he will see they will convey no right, but the contrary ; indeed the priests among the Canadians desired such an establishment.

His plan of reconciliation is, when Great Britain raises any given sum by a land-tax, the colonies should raise each a proportionate sum, the mode of levying to be left to the provincial legislatures; the appropriation of it to parliament. Thus the Americans could not be taxed, without our house of commons taxing themselves.

VI. Canterbury Tales of Chaucer, to which are added an Essay upon his Language and Versification; an introductory Discourse, and Notes. 4 Vols.

The editor is well acquainted with his subject; his essay contains many excellent remarks on the state of our antient poetry, and a good defence of our old bard Chaucer as to his metre. He supposes that in his time, many English words were pronounced differently from what they are in the present age both in respect to the number of syllables, and the feet on which the accents are placed; and the great number of verses sounding complete, even to our ears, which is to be found in the least corrected copies of his works, authorises us to conclude that he was not ignorant of the laws of metre, and intended to observe the same laws in the many other verses which now seem to us irregular.

VII. An Abridgement of Penal Statutes. By William Addington, Esq; one of the Magistrates presiding at the Public Office in Bow-street.

A judicious abridgement, and well timed also, for the instruction of the wine vault keepers, apothecaries, bricklayers, &c. newly made justices and conservators of the peace.

VIII. Thirty-six Discourses on practical Subjects. By the late Rev. Benjamin Ibbot, D. D. &c. 2 Vols.

These sermons class with the rational and judicious, and were well received by the public when they first appeared; six occasional sermons were published by the author himself, the others by his friend Dr. Samuel Clarke after his death, for the benefit of his widow. A short account of his life and writings is now prefixed, by which we learn that he was born in the year 1680; at the age of fifteen years was entered at Clare-hall in Cambridge, appointed by archbishop Tennyson to be his chaplain in 1707, made chaplain in ordinary to the king in 1716, was installed a prebendary in Westminster in 1724, and died April 5, 1725, in the 45th year of his age.

IX. A short State of the Reasons for a late Resignation. To which are added, occasional Observations, and a Letter to the Right Rev. the Bishop of Norwich. By John Jebb, A. M.

Mr. Jebb, after a serious and diligent enquiry, saw the forms by which he was required to officiate in the church, and the doctrine of the trinity on which the church liturgy was obviously founded, to be (in his judgment) unscriptural; he therefore could no longer officiate with self satisfaction, and like a conscientious man resigned his church preferments. His reasons are strong and conclusive.

X. Four Discourses on the Duty of a Christian Minister, &c. by Francis Blackburne, Archdeacon of Cleveland.

This learned and reverend author, in the preface, offers several very pertinent and forcible arguments in favour of those clergymen of the church of England who continue to perform the duties of their profession, and to excuse their compliance with forms, which they dislike, and in some particulars think to be not warranted by scripture. These discourses are excellent, and the fourth "on the original principles of the first protestants" particularly merits the public attention.

XI. Observations on the Abuse of Medicine. By Thomas Withers, M. D.

The observations are in general just; but neither altogether new nor methodical; many abuses of medicine, and improper treatment of diseases still remain to be pointed out.

XII. Strictures on the Gout, with practical Advice to the gouty People of Great-Britain. By Samuel Wood, a recovered Arthritic.

This author thinks his knowledge of the gout is greatly superior to all who have as yet written upon it. He says much about it in a crude manner, and at last recommends some pills of his own making, as very cheap and salutary to all gouty patients; but we assure them from his own authority they must not expect immediate relief even from Mr. Wood's efficacious advice and pills—"all attempts to obtain a sudden cure are dangerous and contrary to the operation of nature."

The Americans will say, this author has not given a true state of the argument; however, the writer is more candid and perspicuous than many who have preceded him.

Account of the Proceedings of the American Colonists, since the passing the Boston Port-Bill. (Continued from our Magazine for December, p. 756.)

AFFAIRS respecting America continue to wear a most unpromising appearance. It is now the declared design of government to employ the whole national force, in case the obduracy of the confederated provinces is not to be overcome by the terms held forth by administration, in order to compel them to acknowledge the supremacy of the British legislature, and to extort their submission.

Though the advices we receive from that continent are not, as things are now circumstanced, much to be relied upon, yet there is reason to fear that a most bloody carnage will be the consequence of this determined resolution. The same enthusiastic spirit that prompted the people to resist, will still animate them to persist in that resistance, till a mitigation of their supposed grievances is obtained. And it may now be very naturally expected, that, seeing no prospect before them of prevailing by any other means, they will refer their cause to the decision of the sword.

The levity with which this reference has been treated, and the readiness with which very many worthy citizens have been induced to encourage government to endeavour at once to crush rebellion in the bud, and to extinguish by one decisive stroke, that turbulent spirit of opposition to acts of the British parliament, which has long been observable throughout America, must in a great measure be owing to the facility with which they have been made to believe these colonists are to be reduced. But though this is thought an easy task in the closet, it may meet with many mortifying obstructions in the field. The nature of the contest, and the locality where it is to be maintained, are serious considerations, and, when placed in the balance against the advantages arising from the resources of government, must be allowed their due weight. A variety of contingencies may occur to defeat the best concerted plans of reduction before they can be carried into execution at 3000 miles distance. It is wished, therefore, and believed, by many, that, when the blow is ready to be struck, such propositions will be made to the assemblies legally chosen of the respective provinces, that they in prudence cannot reject.

In the mean time, every method will be taken to convince them of the superiority of the British arms, and to make them sensible of the vanity of contending against so formidable a power. General Howe, who succeeded General Gage in the command of the army stationed at Boston, has already begun to exercise his authority with some degree of rigour. He has issued out proclamations, forbidding any communication by water between the inhabitants of the town and the people of the country, and he has cut off all intercourse by land. Every person detected in the attempt to desert the town, without his special permission, or who may be re-taken after having escaped, shall be liable to military execution, and treated as traitors; and all masters of vessels failing under the immediate orders of Admiral Graves are forbidden to receive any person whatever on board, without an order signed by the General's own hand, under the penalty of imprisonment, and such other punishment as may be adjudged. This proclamation is dated Oct. 28, 1775.

By another proclamation, dated the same day, persons having leave to depart by water or otherwise, carrying with them more than five pounds in specie, are made liable to the forfeiture of the whole sum discovered, and to such other fine and imprisonment as may be adjudged; the informer to be entitled to one half.

By a third proclamation, of the same date, his excellency recommends it to the inhabitants immediately to associate themselves, to be formed in companies, under proper officers, in order to be employed within the precincts of the town, for the preservation of good government.—This association was to be opened on the 30th of October, and to continue for four days, that no one might plead ignorance. The volunteers capable of service were to be properly armed, and to have the same allowance of fuel and provisions as the regular troops.

These proclamations were accompanied by the form of an association, to which the associators were expected to subscribe. The following is a true copy:

"An Association, proposed to the loyal Citizens, agreeable to the Proclamation issued by his Excellency the Hon. Major-General William Howe, Commander in Chief of his Majesty's Forces, &c.

"WE, his majesty's loyal subjects of the town of Boston, being sensible of the duty incumbent on us "to do every thing in our power to support order and good government, as well as to contribute our aid to the internal security of the town," now take this opportunity to profess our firm allegiance to his majesty, and entire obedience to his government and laws. From a disposition to continue quiet and obedient subjects, we have generally neglected the use of arms, while those of different characters and sentiments have been diligently endeavouring to improve themselves in that art. Upon these principles we have remained in, or fled to, this town; neither do we wish or design to leave it.

"We consider it as our strongest duty to contribute our aid in promoting the peace, order, and security of the town; and are willing to be employed to these good purposes in the ways and means suited to our capacities. To that end, we cheerfully accept the offers of his excellency, and now voluntarily associate, for the purposes mentioned in his proclamation; hereby promising, "That such of us as he shall think proper, or able, to perform the duties therein required, will be formed into companies, as therein mentioned; and will to the utmost of our power faithfully perform those services, and punctually discharge the trust reposed in us. And that such as are not able to go through those duties will freely contribute our proportions, according to our abilities, to raise a sum of money for promoting this salutary purpose, to be applied to the use of those who are able, in such manner as the General, or those he may appoint, may think proper."

It should seem, by this association, that a test was intended to be held forth by which the loyal might be distinguished from the disobedient; but that all should be made to contribute towards the defence of the town.

But could we rely upon other advices, published under the sanction of General Washington's name, commander in chief of the provincial army before Boston, orders of a more alarming nature to the Americans have been issued, and in part carried into execution by his majesty's ships of war. It must be observed, however, that this news is not authenticated by Gen. Washington, but transmitted to the deputy-governor of Rhode-Island, as a piece of intelligence which he had just received at the head quarters at Cambridge. The intelligence is as follows:

"Falmouth, Monday, Oct. 16, 1775.

"The Canceaux ship of sixteen guns commanded by captain Mowat, a large ship, schooner, and a sloop, armed, anchored before the town the 17th instant. At three o'clock, P. M. they weighed and came up, and anchored within gun-shot, and immediately capt. Mowat sent a letter on shore to this town, giving them two hours to move their families out, as he had orders to fire the town. The town immediately chose a committee of three gentlemen, and sent them on board to know the reason of the town's being to be set on fire. He returned for answer, that his orders were to set on fire all the sea-port towns between Boston and Halifax, and that he expected New-York was then burnt to ashes. He farther said, that, when he received orders from the admiral, he desired that he might shew some favour to the town of Falmouth, which the admiral granted (I suppose as captain Mowat was under particular obligations to some gentlemen in Falmouth, for civilities shewn him when in captivity among them), and which favour was, to spare the town till nine o'clock on Wednesday morning, in case we should send him off eight small arms, which the town immediately did.

"Wednesday morning, being the 18th, the committee went on board of captain Mowat again, in order to save the town; he said, he would save the town till he heard from the admiral, in case we would send off four carriage guns, deliver up all our small arms, ammunition, &c. and send four gentlemen of the town as hostages; which the town would not do. About half past nine in the morning he began to fire from the four armed vessels, and in five minutes set fire to several houses. He continued firing after dark the same day, which destroyed the largest part of the town. He farther informed the committee, that he should proceed to Portsmouth, and destroy that place also. The foregoing is as near the facts as I am able to remember. Witnes my hand

PEARSON JONES."

We forbear to reason upon this fact, till it is better authenticated; only this we may be permitted to remark, that it either cannot be true, or the reasons for this severe order are concealed.

The news from Quebec, circulated through the same channel, was at first thought suspicious. By a letter, said to be written by an officer of the New-York forces, the important fortress of St. John's, the key to Montreal, surrendered to the provincials on the 2d of November. The garrison is said to consist of 600 men, 500 regulars, and the rest Canadian volunteers, among whom were persons of the first distinction, who are all said to have surrendered prisoners of war. But though the articles of capitulation are added to this anonymous officer's letter, many were willing to suspend their belief till more authentically informed. The following intelligence, however, was not questioned.

Extract of a Letter from Gen. Montgomery, dated Camp before St. John's, October 20, 1775.

"I have the pleasure to acquaint you with the surrender of Chamblee to major Brown and major Livingston, which last headed about 300 Canadians. We had not above 50 of our troops. Indeed it was the plan of the Canadians, who carried down the artillery past the fort of St. John's in batteaus. I send you the colours of the 7th regiment, and a list of stores taken. Major Brown assures me that we have gotten six tons of powder, which, with the blessing of God, will finish our business here. Major Brown offered his service upon this occasion. Upon this and all other occasions I have found him active and intelligent.

"The enemy's schooner is sunk; they have not been anxious to save, else they might easily have protracted her fate. I must now think, unless some unlucky accident befalls us, we shall accomplish our business here, as I shall fall to work in earnest on this side of the water. The troops are in high spirits. Col. Warner has had a little brush with a party from Montreal. The enemy retired with the loss of five prisoners, and some killed; some of the prisoners (Canadians) are dangerous enemies, and must be taken care of, La Mouche one of them. The Caghnawagas have desired 100 men from us. I have complied with their request, and am glad to find they put so much confidence in us, and are so much afraid of Mr. Carleton; not that I think they had any thing to apprehend. He has too much business on his hands already to wish to make more enemies.

"I shall endeavour, by means of the Chamblee garrison, to obtain better treatment for Allen and the other prisoners, as well Canadians as our troops.

"I shall send off the prisoners as soon as possible; possible; their number of women and quantity of baggage is astonishing.

"The commanding officer at St. John's has been so polite as to let our batteaus pass to the head of the Rapids, in order to take in the baggage of the Chamblee garrison. He behaved very genteelly to lieutenant Lockwood, of Waterbury's, who went in with the request from major Stopford.

"The major is a man of family in Ireland.

"Major Brown has brought the colours of the 7th regiment, which I have the honour to transmit to you."

This news was the more unexpected, as, just before its arrival, the London Gazette had assured the public, that, by the last advices from Quebec, which were of the 26th of October, Gen. Carleton who was then at Montreal, had formed a considerable corps of Canadians and English, and, with lieutenant-col. Maccleane, who commanded another party, was preparing to proceed to the relief of St. John's, which for some time had been invested by the rebels, without their being able to make any impression upon it; and that there was the greatest probability that the country would be soon cleared of those invaders, whose force was considerably diminished by sickness and desertion, and in great want of necessary supplies.

As general Carleton's letter is six days later than the surrender of Chamblee, it has been matter of surprise to many that the Gazette should conceal it. The duke of Manchester, it is said, took notice of the suppression of it, in the house of lords, and was very severe upon administration as intentionally concurring to deceive the public. He was answered by lord Suffolk, who said administration could communicate no advices but what were received in the proper channel; other advices might be true, or they might be false; and, as they were doubtful, it would have been very improper to have inserted them in the London Gazette, whose authority stood hitherto unimpeached.

The Gazette in question was published Saturday, Dec. 16; and in that Gazette it is said, "There are no advices from Boston later than the 12th of October, when gen. Gage left it invested as before by the rebel army, which, however, had attempted nothing since the affair of Bunker's Hill." If there were no advices later than the 12th, it might be asked, by what channel the proclamations published by general Howe, which are dated Oct. 23, could be received? But questions of this kind are of small importance, facts will speak for themselves, and cannot long be concealed, whatever arts may be made use of to suppress them.

From Virginia, it may be remarked, the letters in the Gazette are of a much later date, the earl of Dunmore's letter is of the 22d of October, from on board the ship William, off Norfolk; in which letter his lordship acquaints the secretary of state, that on the 15th of that month he had landed, with a party of between 70 and 80 men, in the neighbourhood of the town of Norfolk, and destroyed 17 pieces of ordnance, and brought off two more, which had been carried away from that town by the rebels, and concealed in the country; that on the 17th he had landed again, at about eight miles from the town, and marched between two and three miles into the country, where about 200 strikers were collected to oppose him, but who fled into the woods upon the appearance of the party, leaving behind them some small arms and ammunition, which his lordship had carried off; that on the 19th he had again landed; and destroyed ten guns, and brought off six, at the distance of two miles from the coast; and on the 20th brought off six more; and on the 21st, the day before his lordship's letter is dated, he had landed again, and brought off ten guns, two colours, about sixty small arms, and a great quantity of ball of different sizes; and his lordship imagines there are not any military stores remaining in the possession of the rebels in that part of the province. In these several landings his lordship made seven prisoners, among whom is one Robinson, a deputy to the provincial convention; and one Mathews, a captain of the minute men.

The Gazette of the 23d confirms what we have said before, that facts of importance cannot be long concealed; the surrender of St. John's and Chamblee are both authenticated in the following articles, dated Whitehall, Dec. 23.

"This morning Brook Watson, Esq; arrived at lord George Germain's office from Quebec, with dispatches from major-general Carleton, dated Montreal, the 5th of November, containing intelligence, that general Carleton, not being able to collect a force that might be depended upon for the relief of St. John's, the rebels had taken advantage of the defection of the lower class of Canadians to press forward their enterprise; and that the forts of Chamblee and St. John, upon Richlieu river, the latter of which had stopped the progress of the rebels for above two months, had surrendered, and the garrisons were made prisoners upon capitulation.

"By a letter from lieutenant-gov. Cramahe, dated Quebec, Nov. 9, it appears, that a party of rebels, under the command of one Arnold, had invaded the province by the way of the river Chaudiere; and that part of them were actually arrived, and had taken post at Point Levi, opposite to Quebec."

The advices from South-Carolina are of an earlier date than those from the more northerly provinces; the latest are of Sept. 30, previous to which his excellency governor Campbell had retired on board the Tamar man of war lying in Rebellion-road; from whence the provincial committee, in a message signed Henry Laurens, chairman, entreat his Excellency to return to Charles-Town, the usual residence of their governors, assuring him at the same time, that, whilst, agreeable to his repeated and solemn declarations, his excellency took no active part against the good people of the province in the present arduous struggle for the preservation of their civil liberties, all possible respect should be shewn both to his person and character, &c. To this message he returned for answer :

"Tamar, Rebellion-road, Sept. 30, 1775.

"Sir, I have received a message, signed by you, from a set of people who stile themselves a general committee. The presumption of such an address, from a body assembled by no legal authority, and whom I must consider as in actual and open rebellion against their sovereign, can only be equalled by the outrages which obliged me to take refuge on board the king's ship in this harbour. It deserves no answer, nor should I have given it any, but to mark the hardness with which you have advanced, that I could so far forget my duty to my sovereign and my country as to promise I would take no active part in bringing the subvertors of our glorious constitution, and the real liberties of the people, to a sense of their duty. The unmanly arts that have already been used to prejudice me in the general opinion, may still be employed by that committee. But I never will return to Charles-Town till I can support the king's authority, and protect his faithful and loyal subjects. Whenever the people of this province will put it in my power to render them essential service, I will, with pleasure, embrace the opportunity, and think it a very happy one. I am, Sir, your most humble servant,

WILLIAM CAMPBELL.

"To Henry Laurens, Esq;

Since these altercations, a discovery has been made of a considerable quantity of arms and ammunition concealed about the palace, which has greatly exasperated the people.

It may, perhaps, be necessary, for the better understanding the prevailing system of government throughout the provinces, just to mention, that, besides the usual assemblies, every province has its congress; and every congress its council of safety, consisting of thirteen discreet persons, chosen from among its own members; this council is entrusted with the executive power, during the recess of the congress; so that whatever relates to peace or war, to the defence of the colony, and the good government of the same, is within the limits of their commission; by them a committee of safety is appointed for the good government of every district; but the council superintends the whole. In consequence of this power, the council of South-Carolina deputed the hon. William Henry Drayton to explain to the back settlers the reason of the present commotions, they being much dissatisfied with the measures now in agitation.

The back settlers, if we mistake not, are generally composed of German or foreign emigrants, who on leaving their country have portions of land allotted to them contiguous to the land on which their countrymen are already settled, by which in some sort they may be considered as a distinct people.

Being made to understand, that it was the rights of free-born subjects that were contended for, it is said, they readily acquiesced, and voluntarily offered their assistance in support of the rights of mankind.

It should seem, by a petition presented to the council of safety for South-Carolina, that they had it in contemplation to fortify Charles-Town, and by sinking ships in the channel to choke up the bar, and thereby render the town inaccessible to large ships; but this measure, being judged premature, has been postponed.

A plan likewise of attacking the regulars at Boston by means of a floating battery is also said to have miscarried, and many of the provincials perished.

A report has been propagated, and pretty generally believed, that the generals Washington and Lee had disagreed, and that to reconcile the difference, and restore harmony in the provincial army, Dr. Franklin and other delegates had suddenly quitted Philadelphia, and appeared at the head quarters at Cambridge. This gave rise to another report, that the congress had divided, and that the more moderate part had retired. But it now appears that this committee from the general congress was charged with business of another kind. The troops were voted by the general congress but for a limited time, and that time being nearly expired, it was necessary to renew it; in order to which, the opinion of the generals was thought necessary, as well to ascertain the number of troops to be voted, as to make proper provision for their subsistence.

The inhabitants of Newbern in North-Carolina set the example to gen. Howe of forming an association of loyalists, by disarming all those who had refused to sign the association of that province, and by seizing and applying their arms to the use of the common cause.

The like severity was practised in Dutchess County, in the province of New-York; and judge Smith, having committed one of the persons employed in that service, was by the populace tarred and feathered, as was likewise Coen Smith for something of the like kind: both these gentlemen were conveyed six miles out of town.

A transport ship from Boston for New-York having by stress of weather been forced on shore in Cranberry-inlet, the captain, passengers, and soldiers, on board, were seized and made prisoners by the provincials; but no advantages of moment have been obtained by them in this quarter. They boast of their bravery at Hampton, in Virginia; but in that province, if the Gazette of London may be credited, the tables have been turned against them.

November 23.

THIS day the house resolved itself into a committee on the petition of the house of general assembly of the province of Nova-Scotia, and, after some time spent therein, came to the following resolutions:

'That when an act or order shall be passed by the general assembly of the province of Nova-

Nova-

Nova-Scotia, conformable to the foregoing resolutions, (of Monday) and his majesty shall have given his approbation to such act or acts, all duties, taxes, or assessments, upon any goods imported into the said province, and which have been imposed and levied within the said province by any act or acts now in force, ought to cease, and that, so long as the act or acts of assembly, for granting to his majesty the said poundage duty, shall continue in force, no other duties ought to be imposed or levied by act of parliament within the said province, except such duties only as it may be expedient to continue to levy, or to impose for the regulation of commerce; the net proceeds of the duties last mentioned to be carried to the account of the said province.

‘That it will be advisable to admit a direct importation into Nova-Scotia, by his majesty’s subjects, in ships and vessels qualified by law, of all wines, oranges, lemons, currants, and raisins, of any foreign country whatsoever, provided the same be imported directly from the place of their growth and produce, and that the same be not imported into any other port or place, except Halifax.’

Gov. Johnstone spoke warmly against the resolutions, and for an amendment.

The amendment proposed to be made to the first resolution by Mr. Burke was in the following words:

‘That, when the exigencies of the state may require any further supplies from Nova-Scotia, requisitions shall be made in the usual manner formerly practised in North America, whereby the said provinces may have an opportunity of shewing their duty and attachment to their sovereign, and their sense of the cause for which such requisition was made, by which means only his majesty can be made acquainted with the true sense of his people in that distant country.’

The question being at length put on the amendment, it passed in the negative without a division.

The resolutions were then agreed to, and ordered to be reported.

Nov. 27.] This day Mr. Alderman Oliver made the following motion in the house of commons, ‘That an humble address be presented to his majesty, requesting that his majesty should be graciously pleased to impart to the house, who were the original authors and advisers of the following measures, before they were proposed by parliament: The taxing America without consent of its assemblies; for the purpose of raising a revenue; for the extending the jurisdiction of the courts of admiralty and vice admiralty; for taking away the charter of the province of Massachusetts-bay; for restraining the American fishery; for exempting murderers from trial in America; for transporting accused colonists to England to be tried for offences committed in America, and more especially for establishing popery and despotism in Canada.’ This motion was seconded by the lord mayor, and produced a debate, when the previous question being put,

that the question be now put, the house divided,

The main question being put, the house divided,

In the course of the debate on Mr. alderman Oliver’s motion, Mr. Wilkes made the following speech:

Mr. Speaker,

‘The address to his majesty, which the honourable gentleman has moved this day, is so essentially different from all other late addresses to the throne, that I own it meets with my hearty concurrence. I think it, Sir, of the utmost consequence to know the original authors and advisers of this pernicious and calamitous war, which has already deluged with blood a part of America, and spread horror and devastation through the whole northern continent. When so many provinces of the empire are lost, and the rest actually engaged in a cruel, civil war, we ought not to sit down in a criminal supineness. It becomes our duty, as the grand inquest of the nation, to find out and punish the delinquents, by whose fatal counsels such evils have been brought upon this convulsed, and almost ruined state. We owe it to the people at large, and several of us have it in express charge from our constituents.

‘We are, I fear, Sir, on the eve of an eternal, political separation from the western world, unless a very speedy reconciliation should take place. If the present motion meets with success, I am sure it will do more towards a sincere, lasting, and hearty union with America, than all the captious and fallacious proposals of administration. The Americans will then believe we indeed desire a reconciliation with them, and they will at length begin to have confidence in our counsels, when they see the vengeance of parliament fall on the authors of our common calamities. The principles of violence and injustice, which have hitherto prevailed, they will see, if the house is really in earnest to treat, yield to equity and moderation, a negotiation on fair, equal, and just terms may ensue, and a general tranquility be re-established in an empire, which is now shaken to its very foundations.

‘I really think, Sir, this is almost the only method now left of extricating ourselves with honour and dignity from our present alarming difficulties. You have voted fleets and armies, and your forces figure greatly in the expensive estimates on your table. But the minister knows very well they are not equal to the mad project of subjugating the vast continent of America, nor do I believe the whole strength of this kingdom adequate to such an attempt. After a very bloody campaign you have conquered only one hill of less than a mile’s circumference, for you were suffered to land as friends in the only sea-port town which you possess. Would the noble lord, whom his majesty has so lately raised to one of the highest civil offices, if he were sent on a military service there, would he venture, even at the head of the whole British cavalry, to advance ten miles into the country? He would not, I am persuaded,

persuaded, be so rash as to make the attempt. And is any minister weak enough to flatter himself with the conquest of all North America? The Americans will dispute every inch of territory with you, a train of most unfortunate events will probably ensue, and the power of recruiting, perhaps subsisting, your forces, at such a distance, be lost. After an unavailing struggle of a very few years, when the ruined merchant and manufacturer besiege your doors, you will perhaps think of naming ambassadors to the general congress, instead of your present wild and expensive job; and farce, of thirty commissioners with a salary of four thousand pounds each, to cry peace; when there is no peace.

‘Yes, Sir, I think peace absolutely necessary between Great Britain and America; and therefore I approve the present motion, as holding out the olive branch. The Americans are rapidly increasing in population, and in the knowledge of all the useful arts of life, even in the fashionable art of murdering our own species. The late worthy governor of Pennsylvania declared, at the bar of the other house, that the province now grew more corn than was sufficient for the supply of its inhabitants; that they perfectly understood the art of making gunpowder, and had effected it; that mills, and other instruments for saltpetre, had been erected with success; that the art of casting cannon had been carried to great perfection, as well as that of fabricating small arms; and that they were expert in ship building beyond the Europeans. He declared, likewise, that single province had actually enrolled 20,000 men, and had four thousand minute men ready on the first notice of any real danger. The authentic accounts of the preparations for the forming, training, and disciplining troops, in the Massachusetts-Bay, and in Virginia, are equally formidable; nor are they inconsiderable in the other united provinces. Every idea of force, therefore, on our side, must appear insatiation.

‘All wise legislators, Sir, have calculated the strength of a nation from the number of its inhabitants, the laborious, strong, and active. The population, in most parts of America, is doubled in the course of nineteen or twenty years, while that of this island is known rather to have decreased since the year 1692. The emigrations of late, from the three kingdoms, have been amazing and alarming. Our own people have fled in multitudes from a government, under which they starved. It appears, from the nicest calculations, that many more of our fellow subjects have left this kingdom, for America,—never to return,—than, I believe, administration has hitherto sent in their pay, both of our fleets and armies, never to return; in any considerable proportion, I mean, of the force sent. The Americans, Sir, are a religious people. With much ardour and success they follow the first great command of Heaven, ‘Be fruitful and multiply.’ While they are fervent in these devout exercises, while the men continue enterprising and healthy, the women kind and prolific, all your attempts to subdue them by force will be ridiculous and unavailing, and be regarded by them with scorn and abhorrence. They are daily strengthening, and, if you lose the present moment of reconciliation, to which this motion tends, you lose all. America may now be reclaimed or regained, but cannot be subdued.

‘Gentlemen, Sir, do not seem to have considered the astonishing disadvantages, under which we engage in this contest against the combined powers of America; not only from the distance and natural strength of the country; but the peculiar and fortunate circumstances of a young, rising empire. The congress, Sir, have not the monstrous load of a debt of above 140 millions, like our parliament, to struggle with, the very interest of which would swallow up all their taxes, nor a numerous and hungry band of useless placemen and pensioners to provide for; nor has luxury yet enervated their minds or bodies. Every shilling they raise will go to the man who fights the battles of his country. They set out like a young heir with a noble landed estate, unincumbered with enormous family debts, while we appear the poor, old, feeble, exhausted, and ruined parent, but exhausted and ruined by our own wickedness, and profligacy.

‘Sir, I daily hear the Americans, who glow with a divine zeal for liberty in all its branches, misrepresented in this house, and the ostensible minister diligent in propagating the most unjust calumnies against them. The noble lord with the blue ribband told us, the liberty of the press was lost throughout America. The noble lord deceives us in this, as in many other things. His intelligence can never be relied upon. The liberty of the press, the bulwark of all our liberties, is lost only in Boston, for his lordship’s ministerial troops govern there only. The press is free at Water-Town, but seven miles distance from Boston; at Philadelphia, Newport, Williamsburgh, and in the rest of North America. I will give the house the demonstration. General Gage’s foolish and contemptible proclamation against Samuel Adams and John Hancock, two worthy gentlemen, and, I dare to add, true patriots, declaring them rebels and traitors, while the generals Washington, Putnam, and Lee, with the naval commanders in arms, remained by him unnoticed, was reprinted in all the American papers. His letters likewise to governor Turnbull and others, in which he most heroically apologised for his inert conduct as necessary for the ‘protection of the army,’ which we were taught to believe would look all opposition into subjection, awe the factious, and give security to the well-affected;’ these letters too were faithfully copied, and I believe all the curious orders he has issued will be found as exact in the Pennsylvania, Water-Town, and other News-papers, as in the Gazette published by his authority at Boston, which is as partial and false as that of Paris.

‘The honourable gentleman, Sir, who spoke last, says ‘the present address is trifling, for we already know the author and adviser of all the late measures against America, that the noble noble lord with the blue ribband will avow them, and has done it.' I wish to hear such a declaration. Will the noble lord avow himself the adviser of only one of the late flagitious measures, that of establishing popery and despotic power in Canada? The father of that monstrous birth I thought had prudently hitherto chosen to remain concealed. He likewise tells us, 'the motion now before us is coupled with nothing, and leads to nothing.' I will tell him what it ought 'to lead to, and be coupled with.' I mean an impeachment, Sir, which I trust will follow, as the next motion of the honourable gentleman who spoke first in this debate. Whoever did advise the measures lately pursued, which have lost half of our empire, I consider as a criminal of so deep a dye, that his head would be a just sacrifice to the honour of England and the peace of America. The word impeachment I hope will strike terror to the ear and heart of a wicked and arbitrary minister, and that the noblest and most important prerogative of this free people, secured to us by our great deliverer, king William, in the act for the further limitation of the crown, and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject, will soon have its full effect, 'that no pardon under the great seal of England be pleadable to an impeachment by the commons in parliament.'

Nov. 30.] This day the house took into consideration the resolutions reported by the committee of the whole house on the memorial of the inhabitants of Nova-Scotia; when Sir George Young moved an amendment, the purport of which was, to fix some certain limitation to the exercise of the proposed requisition, which the house meant to adopt instead of their right of taxation. This produced a debate which ended in a previous question. The numbers on the division were, for Sir George's motion 12, against it 19.

The resolutions were then read, and, after some opposition, agreed to without a division.

Dec. 1.] This day lord North moved for the order of the day, for the second reading of the bill for prohibiting all trade and intercourse with the twelve united colonies which sent delegates to the late continental congress. This produced one of the warmest and most pointed debates which has happened in this house in the course of the present session.

This bill was attacked, with great strength of argument and force of reasoning, by the several gentlemen in the opposition, on the following ground:—That, while in the title it held out much conciliation and pretended concession, by repealing the Boston port, fishery, and general restraining bill, it substituted infinitely a more oppressive and tyrannical bill in their place; that it not only stopped this port, and restrained that particular province, from trading with each other, but prohibited every trade with Great Britain, which the other bills left open; that it made open war, and that of a more cruel and aggravating nature, than even against alien enemies, who were permitted to trade in neutral bottoms; that it held out encouragements of the most iniquitous kind, for it invited the subjects of one part of the same empire to pirate, rob, and pillage the other, and legalised the plunder thus obtained, by dividing the spoils among the plunderers; that, for the first time, it established a precedent for protecting pirates and plunderers in acts of injustice, rapine, and robbery, committed long before the causes for the present bill were so much as pretended to have existed, by pardoning all such atrocious offences, under the shameful, wicked pretence, that the said piracies and robberies were committed for the public service; that the very words of the bill are no less disgraceful to the known justice of the English nation, than to the dignity of this house, where it enacts, that all such acts of violence and oppression shall be deemed legal and just to all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever; and, in all actions brought for the recovery of such plunder, the defendant may plead the general issue, and give this act as sufficient evidence to bar any verdict for the purpose of making reparation in damages; that, while the ostensible minister of this country was day after day assuring parliament, that no revenue from America was to be sought, this bill was a formal declaration of war, in order to compel America to consent to the payment of the revenue thus openly abandoned; and that, while a pretended mock commission for the purpose of establishing peace was to be sent out at a very high and grievous national expence, a war of the most cruel, bloody, and inveterate kind, was to be made with the people intended to be treated with. Much was said likewise to the predilection shewn for the Irish parliament, in preference to that of Great Britain. His majesty, in one case, was advised by his ministers to introduce foreign troops within its immediate jurisdiction without its consent; the act after being objected to was justified, and, to carry the insult to the British parliament still higher, the bill of indemnity, scandalous and disgraceful as it was in the form it passed the house, was thrown out by his majesty's servants in the other house, on the idea, that the measure of hiring foreign troops, without consent of parliament, was perfectly legal and justifiable; while, on the other hand, Ireland was told, that she might have foreign troops to defend her, if she pleased; but not a man, either native or foreigner, was to be introduced into that kingdom, without her consent; and, in case she should consent, the troops, thus introduced, were to be paid by the parliament of Great Britain.

The bill being read a second time, in pursuance of lord North's motion, a motion was made that the said bill be committed for Tuesday next; an amendment was proposed, that, after Tuesday, the word ten might be inserted instead of the word next, and, the question being put in the usual form, the house divided, Ayes 207, Noes 55.

The main question for the commitment of the bill was then put, and the house divided, Ayes, 155, Noes, 24.

Dec. 8.] This day a motion was made for the third reading of the American restraining bill, bill, to which some opposition was made; but, as every argument, which reason or ingenuity could suggest for or against the measure, had been already advanced, the debate was as barren as it was short. At half after six the question being put, it was carried by 112 to 16, when the bill was passed, and ordered to be sent up to the lords.

The History of the present Session of the Irish Parliament (Continued from p. 689.) of our Magazine for Dec.)

Wednesday, Nov. 29.

MR. Hill reported the heads of a bill to amend the laws for the encouragement of the fisheries of this kingdom, and was ordered to carry the same to the lord lieutenant.

Mr. Abraham Grier having presented a petition that he might be heard by his council against certain parts of the heads of a bill, for relief of the creditors of William Howard. The same was ordered.

Mr. Malone presented heads of a bill for levying the old and new duties.

Heads of a bill for levying the appropriated loan duties.

Heads of a bill for levying the new duties on the importation of corn, meal, and flour; and

Heads of a bill for duties to pay the interest on the new Tontine of 175,000l. which were all read, and committed for to-morrow.

The address in answer to his excellency's message, was read first by the speaker, then at the table, and lastly paragraph by paragraph, and agreed to by the house.

It answers the message in every point, assuring his majesty of their readiness to spare the 4000 troops required, and that they did not think it necessary at this juncture to accept the foreign troops in their place.

This address is to be presented to the house, whenever his excellency shall appoint.

Ordered, on the motion of Mr. Foster, that every redundancy of 1000l. of the loan duties shall be laid out in the purchase of loan debentures, when they shall be at or under par.

Thursday, Nov. 30.] The house went into three several committees, and went through three of the money bills, and the report was ordered to be made to-morrow. The remaining money bill, for granting the new Tontine of 175,000l. was not committed; for, as the three other bills took up such a long time in reading, and putting the question on each paragraph, and a debate was expected on the Tontine bill, it was postponed till to-morrow.

Friday, Dec. 1.] The house went to the Castle with their address, in answer to his excellency's message.

The house resolved into a committee on the heads of a bill for borrowing 175,000l. by way of life annuities, when Mr. Barry declared, from the sundry savings of the establishments, and the saving of the 4000 mens pay about to be sent abroad, he was certain so much money need not be borrowed, and therefore moved to reduce the sum to 135,000l. This was opposed by Mr. Maſon, and none else speaking on either side, the question was put, and negatived.

Mr. Malone then left the chair, and the report was ordered to be made to-morrow.

The three money bills, for the old and new duties, the loan duties, and the new duties on the importation of corn, flour and meal, were reported, agreed to, and sent by Mr. Malone to the lord lieutenant.

Heads of a bill to enable the commissioners of the revenue, to take leases and make purchases, for the purpose of rebuilding the custom-house, were presented by Mr. Beresford; and Dr. Clement and Mr. Redmond Morris presented petitions against it; the bill was ordered to be committed on this day ten night, and the petitioners allowed to examine witnesses in their behalf on that day.

Saturday, Dec. 2.] Mr. Preston presented heads of a bill for repairing the road to Navan, in the county of Meath. Committed for Saturday next.

Mr. Malone reported the heads of a bill to raise a sum not exceeding 175,000l. by way of Life Annuities, with full benefit of survivorship, which were read and sent up to his Excellency.—The house then resolved into a committee on the heads of a bill to grant to his Majesty stamp duties on paper, vellum and parchment; after which the house ordered the report to be received on Monday morning.

Mr. Chapman presented heads of a bill to make the Judges commissions Quamdiu se bene gesserint.

Ordered (on the motion of Dr. Clement) that leave be given to bring in a quarterage bill, and that Dr. Clement and Mr. Redmond Morris do prepare the same.

Monday, Dec. 4.] Mr. James Brown presented a petition from the clerks of the crown, praying an increase of allowance on the assizes.—Referred to a committee.

Mr. Malone reported the Stamp bill, which was agreed to by the house, and ordered to the lord lieutenant.

The house in a committee (Mr. Chapman in the chair) went through heads of a bill to make the Judges commissions Quamdiu se bene gesserint, which were agreed to by the house, and sent up to the lord lieutenant.

Dr. Clement presented a petition from a large number of citizens against the removal of the custom-house, which was read and referred.

The house in a committee (Mr. Hill in the Chair) made some progress in heads of a bill to regulate the practice of surgery.

Tuesday, Dec. 5.] The enrollment of Mr. Rigby's patent of Master of the Rolls was ordered to be laid before the house. The Quarterage Bill was presented by Dr. Clement, and the committee sat again on the book-debt bill.

Wednesday, Dec. 6.] The house in a committee, (Mr. Conolly in the chair) went through heads of a bill to explain and amend an act passed passed last Sessions of parliament, for the repair of churches. The same were reported and ordered to be carried by Mr. Conolly to the lord lieutenant.

The House in a committee (Mr. Wood in the chair) went through heads of a bill for the relief of landlords, and to prevent frauds in tenants. The same were reported, and ordered to be re-committed to-morrow.

Mr. Talbot obtained leave to bring in heads of a bill for repairing Athy road.

Mr. Barry Barry reported the heads of a bill to amend the act for preventing the burning of lime, and erecting lime kilns in the city of Dublin, and the liberties thereof, which were ordered to be re-committed on Monday next.

Mr. James Brown presented heads of a bill to repeal part of an act passed last sessions, which limited the allowance to clerks of the crown to ten pounds each assize.

Mr. Foster presented heads of a bill to amend the act for enforcing the laws respecting turnpike roads. Both these heads of a bill to be committed to-morrow.

The house in a committee, Mr. Lloyd in the chair, made a farther progress on the heads of a bill to allow interest on book debts, and are to sit again.

Thursday, Dec. 7.] Mr. Bennet moved, that the petitioners against the lime-kiln bill may be heard by their counsel; granted.

Mr. Neville presented heads of a bill for the more effectually preventing the plundering of ships or vessels which may be wrecked or stranded on the coasts of this kingdom.—Committed for Monday.

Mr. Fortescue presented heads of a bill for compleating the circular road round Dublin; committed for Monday.

The house in a committee, (Mr. Lloyd in the chair) went through heads of a bill for the encouragement of trade, by allowing interest on book debts; to be reported on Monday.

The house in a committee (Mr. Foster in the chair) went through heads of a bill to amend the laws respecting turnpike roads; the same were reported, and sent up to the lord lieutenant.

Friday, Dec. 8.] Mr. Langrishe presented fresh heads of a bill for the relief of the creditors of William Howard.

Mr. Talbot presented heads of a bill for repairing the Athy road.

Mr. Damer presented heads of a bill to continue certain temporary laws.

The house then went into a committee on heads of a bill to enable the commissioners of the revenue to purchase lands and houses, for the purpose of re-building a new custom house.—Mr. Hill in the chair.

Mr. Gorges Lowther said as this bill was to give to commissioners a very great power, and to incur a boundless expence, it was proper the members should have time to consider it.—He therefore moved that the chairman should report some progress, and desire leave to sit again; and then he should move the house, that the bill might be printed.

This motion for postponing the business, was supported by Mr. Redmond Morris, Mr. Ogle, Mr. Graydon, Mr. Ponsonby, and Mr. Chapman; and opposed by Mr. Beresford, Mr. Fortescue, Mr. Langrishe, Colonel Burton, and Mr. Hellen.

The question was put,

Ayes, 35. Teller, Mr. Lowther.

Noes, 52. Teller, Mr. Beresford.

The committee then proceeded, and examined Mr. Joseph Brown, who had been employed by the ballast office committee to superintend the taking away the rock called Standfast Dick, eastward of the custom house. It appeared that between two and three feet of the rock had been quarried, and in many places they had come to a blue clay under it; that fifty men had worked for two summers, and about one third of the rock was taken away.

Mr. Morris moved to amend the second enacting clause, by adding after the words custom house, these words, westward of Temple-lane in the city of Dublin.

The question was put:

Ayes, 33. Teller, Mr. Morris.

Noes, 50. Teller, Mr. Langrishe.

Mr. Chapman moved to add the word necessary, before the word approaches.

Carried nem. con.

Mr. Morris moved to add at the end of the paragraph, Whenever a plan, and estimate of the expence shall be laid before Parliament, and approved of by them.

This passed in the negative without a division.

Mr. Chapman moved to postpone the further consideration, but this was also negatived.

The committee then went through the bill, and Mr. Hill reported to the house, when Mr. Morris again moved his amendments, which passed in the negative, and Mr. Beresford was ordered to carry to the lord lieutenant, these heads of a bill which empower the commissioners to build the custom house where they please.

The supporters of this bill were Mr. Langrishe, Mr. Beresford, and Mr. Sheil. The opponents, Mr. Redmond Morris, Mr. Ogle, Mr. Bushe, and Mr. Chapman.

Monday, Dec. 11.] The Athy road bill, and the book debt bill were committed, reported and sent up.—The election bill was farther proceeded on, and Mr. Bushe presented heads of a bill to punish tumultuous risings.

Tuesday, Dec. 12.] Mr. Burke presented heads of a bill for regulating the pipe water committee.

The house then went into a committee on the heads of a bill to regulate elections of members to serve in parliament; made some progress, and are to sit again to-morrow.—The committee agreed to the clause which prevents all rent-charge freeholders under twenty pounds a year, from voting on any elections.

When the Speaker had taken the chair, Mr.

Mr. Clements presented a petition from lord Clare and Weibore Ellis, Esq; vice-treasurers; and Mr. Solicitor General presented a petition from Charles Jenkinson, Esq; clerk of the pells, praying an encrease of their fees.

When Mr. Clements moved that the first petition should be referred to a committee of the whole house on Friday next, this was opposed by Mr. Bushe, who proposed to amend that after the word Friday the word Sen'night should be added, lest the consideration of the petition should interfere with the business of the election and white boy bills, and a dispute about an hour and a half ensued merely on the propriety of considering it so soon. The house divided on the amendment.

Ayes 17. Tellers, Mr. Bushe and Mr. Yelverton.

Noes 53. Tellers, Mr. Solicitor General and Mr. Langrishe.

Mr. Jenkinson's petition referred to the same committee; and Mr. Barry, Sir Lucius O'Brien, and Mr. Solicitor General moved for sundry returns of the fees paid for fifteen years to the vice treasurers and clerk of the pells.

Wednesday, Dec. 19.] The house resolved into a committee on heads of a bill for a new turnpike road on the south, west and north sides of Dublin, from Donnybrook road to Cavendish-street, and went through the same. Mr. Fortescue reported to the house, and was ordered to carry them to his excellency.

The house resolved into a committee on heads of a bill for the more effectually preventing the plundering ships or vessels that may be wrecked or stranded on the coasts of this kingdom, (Mr. Neville in the chair) and made some progress therein.

The house resolved into a committee to continue the consideration of heads of a bill for better regulating the election of members to serve in parliament, (Mr. Robert French in the chair.)

The fifteenth clause enacted an oath to be taken by all electors of boroughs, "that he was a real housekeeper in said borough, had been so for months, had not for so long been an inmate, and had not divided his house to multiply votes."

Colonel Ross proposed to fill up the blank before months with the word twelve. This was opposed, and the committee divided on the question,

Ayes, 44; Noes, 47.

He then moved to insert the word nine; on which there was another division,

Ayes 44; Noes 50.

The tellers on both motions were, Colonel Ross for the Ayes, and Mr. Fortescue for the Noes. The blank was then filled up with the word six.

Thursday, Dec. 14.] The house resolved into a committee, (Mr. Burke in the chair,) on heads of a bill for the better supplying the city of Dublin with pipe water, and went through the same.

Mr. Ogle presented heads of a bill for raising the militia for the defence of this kingdom.

Colonel Burton presented heads of a bill to amend the act for paving the city and liberties of Dublin.

Mr. Serjeant Hamilton presented heads of a bill for the repair of the road from Navan; all which were committed for Monday.

The house then went into a committee (Mr. Langrishe in the chair,) and made some progress on heads of a bill to prevent and punish tumultuous risings.

When the speaker had resumed the chair, Mr. French reported from the committee on the election bill. The question was severally put on the amendments made by the committee; when all were agreed to but the following:

The house divided on agreeing to the filling up the blank in the oath of the time of residence in a borough with the word six before the word months.

Ayes 35; Noes 65.

The blank was then agreed to be filled up with the word twelve.

In the same oath the committee had expunged the words, "and hath paid all customary borough taxes and cesses;" with which the house disagreed,

Ayes 34; Noes 51.

Tellers on both divisions:

For the Ayes, Mr. Hatch and Mr. Fortescue.

For the Noes, Col. Ross and Mr. Skeffington.

These words being restored, it was thought necessary to qualify them by adding the words, "as have been demanded," which was carried on the motion of Mr. Barry; and then the heads of a bill were ordered to be carried by Mr. French to his excellency, and the house adjourned.

Friday, Dec. 15.] The heads of a bill for regulating the pipe water, were reported and sent up by Mr. Bourke, junior.

The heads of a bill against tumultuous risings were farther proceeded on in a committee, (Mr. Langrishe in the chair.)

Heads of a bill for collecting the revenue, were ordered on the motion of Mr. Hellen.

The house in a committee, Mr. Mason, chairman, took into consideration the petitions of lord Clare and Mr. Ellis, vice treasurers, and Mr. Jenkinson, clerk of the pells.

Sir Lucius O'Brien moved to resolve, that an address be presented to desire his majesty to grant 10,500l. a year to the vice-treasurers, free from all expences of executing the office, in lieu of fees, which should then go to the service of the public.

Mr. Barry moved to leave out the sentence, "free from all expences of executing the office." It being put that those words remain, the committee divided,

Ayes 84; Noes 47.

The resolution was then proposed,

Ayes 85; Noes 45.

Mr. solicitor general then moved, in like manner, for 3500l. a year for the clerk of the pells.

pells; and Mr. Barry moved, that the expences should not exceed 260l. a year. The amendment was negatived, and the resolution carried without telling, and the report is to be made to-morrow.

The speakers in this debate were, for the measures, Sir Lucius O'Brien, Mr. Langrishé, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Beresford, and Mr. Provost; and against them, Mr. Lowther, Mr. Barry, Mr. Grattan, Mr. Dillon, Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Burgh.

POETIC-FELICITY.

W H I L E princes celebrate the grand levee,

Alike forgetful of the state and me;

While statesmen at the splendid banquet shine;
And feast, and dance, and laugh, and tippie wine;

While lawyers o'er their midnight bowls preside,

And drown debate in Bacchus's flowing tide;

While learned priests in rev'rend posture sit,

Compose new sermons, or the old repeat;

And while the flocks, which these good shepherds keep,

Safe in their folds, poor sinful laymen sleep.—

I with my muse and pipe delighted feast,

Nor envy lawyer, statesman, prince or priest:

Thick clouds of aromatic vapour raise,

Feel transports spring, and carol tuneful lays.

My peaceful bosom knows no guilty fears,

No whining sorrows, nor ambitious cares;

But in the robe of homely meekness drest,

With thee, Content, sweet smiling nymph, I'm blest.

Thee, whom the scepter'd monarch pants to gain,

And laurell'd heroes strive to win in vain.

Thee, whom the scornful proud have never known;

Thee, whom the rich can seldom call their own:

Thee, I possess, and while possess'd of thee,
Far happier am, than even kings can be.

Waring blown.

On Monday January 1, at noon, was performed before their Majesties and Royal Family, the following Ode, written by Wm. Whitehead, Esq; Poet Laureat, and set to Music by Dr. Boyce, Master of the King's Band of Musicians.

O N the white rocks which guard her coast,

Observant of the parting day,

Whose orb was half in ocean lost,

Reclin'd Britannia lay.

Wide o'er the wat'ry waste

A pensive look she cast,

And scarce could check the rising sigh,

And scarce could stop the tear, which trembled in her eye.

"Sheathe, sheathe the sword, which thirsts for blood,

(She cry'd) deceiv'd, mistaken men!

Nor let your parent, o'er the flood,

Send forth her voice in vain.

Alas! no tyrant she;

She courts you to be free;

Submissive hear her soft command,
Nor force unwilling vengeance from a parent's hand."

Hear her, ye wise, to duty true,

And teach the rest to feel;

Nor let the madness of a few

Distress the public weal!

So shall the opening year assume

Time's fairest child, a happier bloom;

The white-wing'd hours shall lightly move,

The sun with added lustre shine!

"To err is human."—Let us prove,

"Forgiveness is divine!"

A few Days after the following Parody was published in the London Papers.

Another Ode for the New Year, 1776.

O N the green banks which guard her strand,

Regardful of the rising day,

Whose radiant orb illum'd her land,

America reclining lay.

Far o'er the boisterous main

Her aching eye-balls strain;

Yet the disdain'd to heave a single sigh,

Or drop a single tear from her enraged eye.

In vain, she cry'd, the sword ye wield,

Ye poor, deceiv'd, mistaken men!

Old Freedom's sons disdain to yield,

Tho' they have sued in vain!

In truth no rebels we;

Who live but to be free;

Who ne'er denied your mild command,

But scorn to sink beneath your wrathful hand.

Learn to be wise, and learn to know,

What all the world must owe,

Your blessings from our blessings flow,

While Commerce guards the throne.

Learn this, and let each future year

More radiant than the rest appear;

Let peace and plenty smile again,

And let fair Freedom shine;

Thine was the fault, Britannia, then

Be reparation thine.

An Epitaph on a Brass Plate, in the South Chancel of the Church at Borden, near Sittingbourn, in Kent.

W I T H I N the hollow of this stone, relieved from vital care,

The breathless body doe remain of late a wedded pair.

He, of the merchant tailors free, was made yre, warden twice;

And of the merchant venturers the trade did exercise.

Fiftie-four yeres together they in wedded state did live,
 Of whom, both in their life and death, the world good speech did give.
 Nicholas and Joan, so called they were, and as the effect did prove,
 He loved her dearly as his wife (no marvel) for his name was Love.
 He fourcore yeres did overgoe, whereof she eight did save,
 Thus well in yeres and well esteemed, they came into their grave.

A Common Prayer for the Present Times.

I.

SINCE we are taught, in scripture-word,
 To pray for friends and foes;
 Then let us pray for George the Third,
 Who must be one of those.

II.

Heav'n blefs America, and Britain,
 May folly past suffice,
 Wherein they have each other smitten
 Who ought to harmonize.

III.

Ally'd by blood, and interest too,
 Soon let them re-unite,
 May heav'n tyrannic minds subdue,
 Haste, haste, the pleasing sight.

IV.

May ev'ry morn and ev'ning pray'r
 Repeat this just petition,
 What thinking Christian can forbear
 Appriz'd of our condition?

V.

Britannia's sins are our worst foes,
 Let this be Britain's creed,
 For those who God and man oppose,
 Must rebels be indeed.

VI.

This rebel-host, how numerous grown!
 This growth kind heav'n forbid;
 'Tis fear'd some are too near the throne,
 And seem securely hid.

VII.

Just heav'n to light all rebels bring
 Who hate, or love the steeple,
 Rebels to God, and to the king,
 And rebels to—the

Occasional Prologue to the Tragedy of Hamlet. intended to have been spoken by the Manager of a strolling Company of Players. The Author is said to be an Attorney's Clerk.

NOW, far from hence, the great, the rich,
 the gay,
 In fashion's circle wheel their time away;
 And powder'd beaux, and flutt'ring belles are seen,
 Adoring taste as universal queen;
 And routs and balls, champetres, masquerades,
 Reviews, regattas, auctions, and parades,
 In quick succession to the gay appear,
 And with their magic spells enchant old care.

Reflection too, rude guest! dares not approach,
 But flies in silence from a gilded coach!
 Yet, when returned from the giddy round,
 The bold, intruding monitor is found;
 Within the curtain his old host he meets,
 And inward whispers poison all the sweets;

But we enjoy the calm, the rural scene,
 When trees and meads are clad in lively green;
 Where warbling birds, and murmur'ing streams are found, [ground;

And painted flow'rets deck th' enamel'd
 Where silver usk in peaceful windings flows,
 Upon whose banks the weeping willow grows;
 While on our lofty hills the woolly breed,
 In countless flocks do frisk around and feed.
 Sweet beauty too adorns this happy place,
 I see it smile in every lovely face
 That here beams innocence, content, and health,

The choicest blessings, and the greatest wealth.
 Behold in mournful weeds the tragic muse!
 Beneath this humble roof her precepts shews.
 What callous breast, when Hamlet's woes appear,

Can stop the sigh—what eye the bursting tear,
 The precious tear that from fine feeling flows,
 When pitying hearts are touch'd with other's woes.

Indulge the soft excess, ye fair, without controul, [soul;

'Twill sooth the breast, and humanise the
 And if our efforts merit not applause,
 Ah! do not judge us by the critic's laws,
 Take for the deed a warm and sanguine will,
 And where we err, excuse the error still:
 But if we hap to please, then let your praise
 For mirth be—tears, and for shouts be—sighs.

A New Occasional Prologue to the Clandestine Marriage, performed at the Theatre Royal Drury-lane, for the Benefit of the Middlesex Hospital.

SAY, can Thalia's comic scenes impart
 More pleasing transports to the feeling heart,

Than when, by soft-ey'd charity led on,
 She pleads the cause of sorrows—not her own?
 That all, from social sympathy may join,
 And pay their cheerful tribute at her shrine.

To-night ' the imploring hand of pale distress'

Awakens nature and intreats redress;
 Nor sues in vain—but finds in your relief,
 Whose generous pity softens ev'ry grief;
 Makes glad the widow's heart, and wipes the tear

Just falling from the eye of deep despair;
 Smooths the hard bed of penury and woe,
 And yields a cheering comfort—'passing show;
 Pours the sweet balm on the raging wound
 And sheds her mild beneficence around;

'Till age and want sit smiling at the door,
 And wretchedness forgets that she is poor.
 'Tis thus you vindicate those ways to man,
 Which best perform great nature's sacred plan
 Whose boundless wisdom and unerring eye
 See all our wants, and ev'ry want supply;

Gild the black cloud of sorrow's dunest night,
And makes misfortunes from compassion light;
Diffuse glad hope to ev'ry troubled mind,
And ope ' the gates of mercy on mankind,'
Deep sink it then—in ev'ry British breast,
They only live—who succour the distress'd!

*Sir Eldred of the Bower: A Legendary Tale.
In Two Parts. By Miss Hannah More.*

*Of them who, wrapt in earth so cold,
No more the smiling day shall view
Shou'd many a tender tale be told,
For many a tender thought is due.*

Langhorne.

PART I.

*O nostra vita, ch'è sì bella in vista!
Come perde agevolmente in un memento,
Quel, ch'è'n molti anni a grand pena s'acquista!*
Petrarca.

THERE was a young, and valiant knight,
Sir Eldred was his name,
And never did a worthier wight
The rank of knighthood claim.
Where gliding Tay her stream sends forth,
To crown the neighbouring wood,
The antient glory of the North,
Sir Eldred's castle stood.
The youth was rich as youth might be
In patrimonial dower;
And many a noble feat had he Atchiev'd, in hall, and bower.
He did not think, as some have thought,
Whom honour never crown'd,
The fame a father dearly bought,
Cou'd make the son renown'd.
He better thought, a noble sire,
Who gallant deeds had done,
To deeds of hardihood shou'd fire
A brave and gallant son.
The fairest ancestry on earth
Without desert is poor;
And every deed of lofty worth
Is but a tax for more.
Sir Eldred's heart was good and kind,
Alive to Pity's call;
A crowd of virtues grac'd his mind,
He lov'd, and felt for all.
When merit rais'd the sufferer's name,
He doubly serv'd him then;
And those who cou'd not prove that claim,
He thought they still were men.
But sacred truth the Muse compels
His errors to impart;
And yet the Muse, reluctant, tells
The fault of Eldred's heart.
Tho' kind and gentle as the dove,
As free from guile and art,
And mild, and soft as infant love
The feelings of his heart;
Yet if distrust his thoughts engage,
Or jealousy inspires,
His bosom wild and boundless rage
Inflames with all its fires:
Not Thule's waves so wildly break -
To drown the northern shore;
Nor Etna's entrails fiercer shake,
Of Scythia's tempests roar.
January, 1776.

As when in summer's sweetest day,
To fan the fragrant morn,
The fighting breezes softly stray
O'er fields of ripen'd corn;
Sudden the lightning's blast descends,
Deforms the ravag'd fields;
At once the various ruin blends,
And all resistless yields.
But when, to clear his stormy breast,
The sun of reason shone,
And ebbing passions sunk to rest,
And shew'd what rage had done:
O then what anguish he betray'd!
His shame how deep, how true!
He view'd the waste his rage had made,
And shudder'd at the view.
The meek-ey'd dawn, in saffron robe,
Proclaim'd the opening day;
Up rose the sun to gild the globe,
And hail the new-born May;
The birds their amorous notes repeat,
And glad the vernal grove,
Their feather'd partners fondly greet
With many a song of love;
When pious Eldred walk'd abroad
His morning vows to pay,
And hail the universal Lord
Who gave the goodly day.
That done—he left his woodland glade,
And journey'd far away;
He lov'd to court the stranger shade,
And thro' the lone vale stray.
Within the bosom of a wood,
By circling hills embrac'd,
A little, modest mansion stood,
Built by the hand of Taste.
While many a prouder castle fell,
This, safely did endure;
The house where guardian virtues dwell
Is sacred, and secure.
Of Eglantine an humble fence
Around the mansion stood,
Which charm'd at once the ravish'd sense,
And screen'd an infant wood.
The wood receiv'd an added grace,
As pleas'd it bent to look,
And view'd its ever verdant face
Reflected in a brook.
The smallness of the stream did well
The master's fortunes shew;
But little streams may serve to tell
From what a source they flow.
This mansion own'd an aged knight,
And such a man was he,
As Heaven just shews to human sight,
To tell what man shou'd be.
His youth in many a well-fought field
Was train'd betimes to war;
His bosom, like a well worn shield,
Was grac'd with many a scar.
The vigour of a green old age
His reverend form did bear;
And yet, alas! the warrior-age
Had drain'd the dregs of care:
And sorrow more than age can break,
And wound its hapless prey;
'Twas sorrow furrow'd his firm cheek,
And turn'd his bright locks grey.

One darling Daughter sooth'd his care,
 A young and beauteous dame;
 Sole comfort of his failing years,
 And Birtha was her name.
 Her heart a little sacred shrine,
 Where all the Virtues meet;
 And holy Hope, and Faith divine,
 Had claim'd it for their seat.
 She rear'd a fair and fragrant bower
 Of wild and rustic taste,
 And there the screen'd each fav'rite flower
 From every ruder blast,
 And not a shrub or plant was there
 But did some moral yield;
 For wisdom, with a father's care,
 Was found in every field.
 The trees, whose foliage fell away,
 And with the summer died,
 He thought an image of decay
 Might lecture human pride.
 While fair, perennial greens that stood,
 And brav'd the wintry blast,
 As types of the fair mind he view'd
 Which shall for ever last.
 He taught her that the gaudiest flowers
 Were seldom fragrant found,
 But wasted soon their little powers,
 Lay useless on the ground:
 While the sweet pink, and scented rose,
 In precious odours last;
 And when no more the colour glows,
 The sweetness is not past.
 And here the Virgin lov'd to lead
 Her inoffensive day,
 And here she oft retir'd to read,
 And oft retir'd to pray.
 Embower'd the grac'd the woodland shades,
 From courts and cities far,
 The pride of Caledonian maids,
 The peerless northern star.
 As shines that bright and blazing star,
 The glory of the night,
 When sailing thro' the liquid air,
 It pours its lambent light:
 Such Birtha shone!—But when she spoke
 The Muse herself was heard,
 And on the ravish'd air she broke,
 And thus her prayer preferr'd.
 "O blest thy Birtha, Power Supreme,
 "In whom I live and move,
 "And blest me most by blessing him.
 "Whom more than life I love."——
 She starts to hear a stranger voice,
 And with a modest grace
 She lifts her meek eye in surprize,
 And sees a stranger face.
 The stranger lost in transport flood,
 Bereft of voice and power,
 While she with equal wonder view'd
Sir Eldred of the Bower.
 The mountain breeze which paints her cheek
 With nature's purest dye,
 And all the dazzling fires which break
 Illustrious from her eye;——
 He view'd them all, and as he view'd
 Drank deeply of delight;
 And still his ravish'd eye pursued,
 And feasted on the sight.

With silent wonder long they gaz'd,
 And neither silence broke;
 At length the smother'd passion blaz'd,
 Enamour'd Eldred spoke:
 "O sacred Virtue, heav'nly power!
 "Thy wondrous force I feel;
 "I gaze, I tremble, I adore,
 "Yet die my love to tell.
 "Beauty with coldness I've beheld,
 "And 'scap'd the shaft divine;
 "But what my guileless heart can shield
 "From piety like thine?"
 She cast her mild eyes on the ground,
 And rais'd their beams as fast;
 And close her father dear she found,
 Who haply that way past.
 Good Ardolph's eye his Birtha meets
 With glances of delight;
 And thus with courteous speech he greets
 The young and graceful Knight:
 "O gallant Youth, whose'er thou art,
 "Thou art welcome to this place;
 "There's something rises at my heart
 "Which says I've seen that face."
 "Thou generous Knight!" the Youth re-
 "Tho' little known to fame, [join'd,
 "I trust I bear a grateful mind——
 "Sir Eldred is my name.
 "Sir Eldred?"—Ardolph loud exclaim'd,
 "Renown'd for worth and power?
 "For valour and for virtue fam'd,
 "Sir Eldred of the Bower?
 "Now make me grateful, righteous Heaven!
 "As thou art good to me,
 "Since to my aged eyes 'tis given
 "Sir Eldred's son to see!"
 Then Ardolph caught him by the hand,
 And gaz'd upon his face,
 And to his aged bosom strain'd,
 With many a kind embrace.
 Again he view'd them o'er and o'er,
 And doubted still the truth,
 And ask'd what he had ask'd before,
 Then thus address'd the Youth:
 "Come now beneath my roof, I pray,
 "Some needful rest to take,
 "And with us many a cheerful day
 "Thy friendly sojourn make."
 He enter'd at the gate straightway
 Some needful rest to take;
 And with them many a cheerful day
 Did friendly sojourn make.

 By Robert Houlton, M. A.
 O demum felix, O terque quaterque beate!
 Cui nova largitur gaudia dulcis Hymen.

COTTON. EL. ii.

HUSH gentle Eolus, the prosperous gale
 In Hymen's port the noble pair is found
 Breathe not 'till fame has spread the happy tale
 And echo faints with cherishing the sound.

“Bu

But thou, Apollo, scorn a beam to hide,
 In all thy splendor hail this nuptial day,
 A cloud would show thee envious of a bride,
 Who shines the rival of thy brightest ray.
 Ye happy sons of blest'd Ierne's sway,
 Who boast more beauties than Circaffia's clime,
 Proclaim, when saw you such a bride display,
 Charms that wou'd flourish in eternal rhyme.
 See from the sacred altar she returns,
 "Heav'n in her eye," blooming with virgin
 grace,
 The torch of Hymen that so purely burns,
 In innocence of love lights up her face.
 How more refulgent, at the holy shine,
 Her beauty blaz'd o'er brilliants of adorn,
 As much as rising Phœbus doth outshine
 The spangled radiance of the teeming morn.
 To beauty, thus, th' indebted tribute paid,
 The muse her lay with equal truth could grace;

To sing the virtues of the bridal maid,
 Whose temper rivals all her charms of face.
 The beaming lustre of a polish'd mind,
 The native sweetness of a gentle heart,
 With all the melody of voice combin'd,
 Stamp her a grace to nature and to art.
 How many youths, O Belvidere, in vain
 Have sigh'd for her thus destin'd to your arms!
 O happy man! thrice happy thus to gain
 With her the union of all female charms!
 The full-fraught rapture of your soul t'express,
 My humble muse now faints beneath the theme,
 No language can describe ecstatic bliss,
 No fancy paint your happiness supreme.
 O all ye graces, who adorn the fair!
 O all ye deities, benign to love!
 Shed joys uncommon on the noble pair,
 The boast of Hymen, and the care of Jove.

HISTORICAL

December 4.

THIS day his majesty went in state to the house of peers, and gave the royal assent to the following bills, viz.

The bill for granting an aid to his majesty by a land-tax.

The bill for punishing mutiny and desertion.

The bill to enable his majesty to call out and assemble the militia in all cases of rebellion in any part of the British dominions, for a limited time.

The bill to enable the present vice treasurers of Ireland to take the oaths of qualification in Great-Britain. And also to such other bills as were ready for that purpose.

One of the Blue-coat boys, who drew the numbers at Guildhall, was examined before Sir Charles Asgill, relative to a number that had been drawn out the Friday before, on which an insurance had been made in almost every office in London, when the boy confessed, that he was prevailed upon to conceal a ticket by a man who gave him money for so doing; that the man copied the number; and that next day, putting his hand into the wheel as usual, with the ticket in it, he pretended to draw it out. The man, it seems, had actually received 400l. of the office-keepers; and, had all of them paid him, the sum would have amounted to 3000l.

Extract of a Letter from Portsmouth, Dec. 12.

'The whole seizure of money, made on board a man of war at Spithead by Mr. Miles, the comptroller of this port, to the amount of 8000l. for having been shipped for North-America, contrary to law, is at length brought on shore, and secured in his majesty's ware-house.'

15.] Wednesday night S. Sayre, Esq; appeared at the Old Bailey, and his counsel, Mr. A. Lee moved the court to discharge the recognizance entered into before lord Mansfield on the 28th of October last, on his being brought before his lordship on a writ of Habeas Corpus, on the commitment of lord Rochford to the Tower for 'treasonable practices;' and

CHRONICLE.

Mr. Baron Burland, who with the lord mayor presided at the court, accordingly discharged the recognizance.

Extract of a Letter from St. Martin's, in the Isle of Rhe, Nov. 17.

'The Unity, late Neale, belonging to Sunderland, with troops from Stade for Gibraltar, sprung a leak at sea about four days ago in the Bay of Biscay, in company with several other vessels bound from Hamburg to Gibraltar with Hanoverian troops on board. Captain Neale being apprehensive she would sink, took to his boat with his mates, and all the officers of the troops, except the quarter master; but they had hardly left the ship's side before the boat overset, and every soul perished; as there remained but six sailors on board with the soldiers, and all ignorant of navigation, they ran her on shore on this island: it is feared she will not be got off.'

23.] This day his majesty went to the house of peers, and being seated on the throne, sent a message to the commons by Sir Francis Molineaux, knight, gentleman usher of the black rod, commanding their immediate attendance.

As soon as the commons, with their speaker, came to the bar, his Majesty was pleased to give the royal assent to the following bills:

To a bill intitled an act for prohibiting all trade with the colonies of new Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania, the three lower counties on Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, north Carolina, south Carolina, and Georgia, during the present rebellion in America, and for other purposes therein mentioned.

To a bill, intitled an act for the regulation of his Majesty's marine forces while on shore.

To a bill to encourage adventurers to make discovery of a northern passage from Europe, by British subjects only, to the western or southern ocean of America, and for penetrating to the north pole.

To the Shoreditch road, and to a few naturalization and other private bills.

The house rose at three o'clock, and adjourned till Monday the 23d of January next.

The same day the house of Commons met at two o'clock, and after attending in the house of peers, to be present at his Majesty's notifying the royal assent to such bills as were ready, adjourned till Thursday the 25th of January next.

Jan. 8.] Yesterday the council sat upwards of three hours upon the report of the criminals under sentence of death. There were present the Lords Chancellor, North, Suffolk, Germaine, Barrington, Denbigh, Falmouth, Lyttleton, the Lord Bishop of London, &c.

Yesterday the report was made to his Majesty in council of the convicts under sentence of death in Newgate, when the following were ordered for execution on Wednesday the 17th instant, viz. Robert Perreau, who was capitally convicted in June Sessions, for uttering and publishing as true, knowing the same to be forged and counterfeited, a bond for payment of money, purporting to be the bond of William Adair, Esq; in the penal sum of 14,000*l.* conditioned for the payment of 7300*l.* to him the said Robert Perreau, with intention to defraud Robert Drummond and Henry Drummond, Esqrs. Daniel Perreau (also convicted in the above sessions) for publishing and uttering a forged bond, knowing it to be forged, for 3,100*l.* with the usual double penalty, purporting to be the bond of William Adair, Esq; in order to defraud the said Adair, and Dr. Thomas Brooks. And five other felons, for different offences.

25.] On Friday the attorney general was at his chambers in Lincoln's Inn by counsel on behalf of the dutchess of Kingston, to support an application made to him for granting a noli prosequi, to stop all proceedings against her in the affair expected to be heard before the lords: the ground of the application was the sentence obtained in the spiritual court: but it is said the attorney general is of opinion that he has not authority to grant the writ on this occasion, as the offence for which her grace is indicted, is created by a penal statute, and the bill of rights in express words says, penal laws must not be suspended; and that the king's sign manual would not justify him if he issued the writ, as no command should induce a servant of the crown to act in his official capacity illegally. However his final determination is not yet positively known.

It is his majesty's pleasure, that from the date hereof, and during the continuance of the rebellion now subsisting in North America, every person who shall enlist as a soldier in any of his majesty's marching regiments of foot, shall be intitled to his discharge at the end of three years, or at the end of the said rebellion, at the option of his majesty.

MARRIAGE.

Right hon. the marquis of Granby, to the Right hon. lady Mary Isabella Somerset, youngest sister to the duke of Beaufort.

DEATHS.

Edw. Louisa Mann, Esq; of Linton, Kent. — Lord Hubert, an infant about two years of age, only son of the right hon. the earl of Buckingham. — John Scott, Esq; maj. gen. of his majesty's forces, and colonel of the 26th regiment of foot, at Belcomie, Scotland.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

Clonmell, December 28.

LAST Monday was committed to the county gaol, by Daniel Gahan, Esq; Richard Fitzgerald, of Killenaul, charged on oath with declaring himself to be a captain of the White Boys.

And the same day was committed to gaol, by William Barton, Esq; Thomas Fogarty, Patrick McGrath, Thomas Moreen, and John Power; the three first are charged, on oath, with being White Boys, and riotously and feloniously assembling as such; and the latter is charged, on oath, with breaking open the house of Ambrose Power, late of Barretstown, Esq; and aiding and assisting in murdering the said Ambrose Power, Esq; and also in carrying out of his house sundry fire-arms and ammunition: they were conducted to gaol by Hugh Massey, of Fethard, Esq; and a party of the prince of Wales's light dragoons.

Yesterday morning was committed to gaol by Richard Moore, Esq; Peter Hackett, of Ballynagranna, near Carrick-on-fuir, carrier, charged on oath with feloniously and burglariously breaking open three doors of the dwelling-house of James Fowley, of Carrick-on-fuir, on the night of the 27th of September last, with twelve or thirteen others well mounted, and armed with guns and pistols, and when they had entered said house, fired several shots, and by force and violence brought away Mary Fowley, daughter to the said James Fowley, Fowley, against her inclination, with an intent to marry or defile her.

Other charges of a similar nature lie against the said Hackett, particularly for having on the night of the 14th of April last, in company with several other White Boys in their uniforms, well armed with guns and pistols, broke open the door of the dwelling-house of John Quinlan at Crehannah in the county of Waterford, when they cruelly beat the said Quinlan and his son, for refusing to give Mary Quinlan, his daughter, in marriage to Thomas Butler of Seskin in the said county.—He was apprehended by John Cosgrave, last Tuesday evening at Carrick-on-Suir, and was conducted to gaol by Mr. James Kennedy of Tinivane, and the three servants of Richard Moore, Esq;

And yesterday evening was committed to gaol by William Barton and Daniel Gahan, Esqrs. John Meagher, Darby Meagher, James Walsh, James Kennedy, and Laurence Tierry, charged on oath with being White Boys, and riotously and feloniously gathering together and assembling as such.—They were conducted to gaol by a party of the prince of Wales's light dragoons, and a proper officer.

Clonmell, January 1.] Last Friday was committed to the county gaol, by William Barton, Esq; William Cathin, charged with being a White Boy, and riotously and feloniously assembling as such.

And the same day, by Matthew Pennefather, Esq; John M'Carty, charged with declaring himself to be one of the party who murdered Ambrose Power, Esq; a vagabond of no place of residence, who will give no account of himself, and affects being a fool.

Waterford, January 2.] Last Saturday night some barbarous villains cut off part of the ears of Anthony Dunlavy, a soldier in the 24th regiment of foot (now doing duty here) near the new church, and afterwards houghed him. In consequence a number of his comrades sallied out of the barracks in search of the assailants, and meeting with a sailor, who was not concerned in it, but who endeavoured to run from them, cut him in a dangerous manner.

Tuam, Dec. 26.] Last Friday night we had the most violent thunder that can be remembered in the memory of the oldest person living here. From seven o'clock until one the next morning, the atmosphere seemed to be a continual sheet of lightning, and we had scarce any intermission of the most dreadful thunder; at the same time there fell a heavy rain, and hail-stones of an enormous size; but happily we do not hear of any damage done, but the uncommon terror it created.

Kilkenny, Jan. 3.] Last Sunday night one Downing, alias capt. Slasher, was apprehended by a party of the light dragoons quartered at Fethard, and the next morning was committed to Clonmell gaol by William Barton, Esq. This fellow is charged with being a principal in the murder of Ambrose Power, and with being the first who fired at him through the windows on the morning of the 27th of November last.

Last Sunday the dwelling-house of Mr. James Leisle, in Athy, fell down, by which his wife and two fine children were killed.

Carlow, Jan. 6.] Last Monday was committed to the gaol of Athy, by John Percy, Esq; one of his Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Kildare, John Ennis, of the town of Castledermot, sawyer, who, with other rioters, attacked the house of Mr. Matthew Moore, of said town, publican, on the night of the 17th of December last, into which they forcibly entered, and with hangers, and pieces of scythes fastened in sticks, they cut and hacked every person they met with, particularly Mr. John Currin, of Knockshenna, and Mr. Benjamin Colman, of Ballyburne, whom they severely wounded. There was a knot of those villains, who were sworn to stand by each other, distinguished by the name of "Carlow-gate Boys," who lived in the said town of Castledermot, and were guilty of many thefts, robberies, and assaults, to the great injury and terror of that town and neighbourhood; but it is now happily broken by the taking of the said Ennis, who was their principal leader.

Belfast, Jan. 9.] In the night between Wednesday and Thursday last, one Hazely found means buglariously to break and enter the library part of the right hon. earl of Hillsborough, and thereout feloniously to take and carry away about 170 guineas in cash, all his lordship's wearing apparel and linen; a pair of silver candlesticks and other articles, amounting in the whole to about 400l. Friday morning said Hazely was apprehended at the Salt-water bridge, near Belfast, and almost all the money and clothes were recovered, many of which were found with him, and the rest where he had deposited them. He is committed to Downpatrick gaol. Hazely was formerly an inhabitant of Hillsborough, but lately belonged to one of the regiments now at Cork for embarkation, from which he deserted, and came to Hillsborough with an intent to commit the above robbery.

D U B L I N.

ON January 6, a small party of White Boys assembled between Ballycolla and Cuffe's-borough, in the Queen's county, from whence they proceeded to a place near Castle-town, where one William Phelan lived. He dwells on the verge of a bog, and the road to him extremely difficult and almost impassable. They were consequently obliged to leave their horses a considerable distance from his house, and were conducted through those narrow defiles, as is supposed by one Breen. When the White Boys reached the house, they broke it open, and endeavoured to carry off Phelan, but a smart and bloody contest ensuing between Phelan, his sons, and them, they were at length repulsed, and obliged to retreat, carrying off one of their companions who had received a mortal wound of a flane under the breast, of which he died in about an hour, and whom they buried about fix o'clock on Saturday morning in his cloaths, in the church-yard of Killermogh; he proves to be the son of a poor widow near Rathmickelly, and a notorious vagabond; the rest of the White Boys were severely bruised and cut. Phelan, whom those miscreants expected to inter where they laid their companion, received many stabs of swords in different parts of his body, as did his family, who made a very brave resistance.

By a letter from Paris, dated Dec. 8, we have an account, that the season which set in very cold, changed all on a sudden to very hot weather, which to affected the constitutions of every body, that there was not a house in that capital without some sick in it of a violent fever and cold, which sickness was epidemical, and spread so much, that a prodigious number of people died in a week's time. The royal hospital of invalids lost 99 persons in the last week, and 22 soldiers died in 24 hours. If this sickness last 14 days longer, it will carry off half the inhabitants of this city.

December 25.] This day his Excellency came to the house of peers, and gave the royal assent to the following bills:

1. An act for granting to his Majesty the several duties, rates, impositions and taxes therein particularly expressed, to be applied to pay an interest at the rate of four pounds, per centum per annum for such part of the several principal sums formerly borrowed, as shall remain unpaid on the 25th of December, 1775.

2. An act for granting annuities in the manner therein provided, to such persons as shall voluntarily subscribe towards the raising a sum, not exceeding the sum of 170,000l.

3. An act for granting to his Majesty an additional duty on the several goods and merchandizes therein mentioned.

4. An act to prevent frauds in obtaining the premiums on flaxseed imported into this kingdom.

5. An act to amend an act passed in the third year of his present Majesty, entitled, an act for continuing the encouragement given by former acts of parliament, to the flaxen and hempen manufactures.

6. An act allowing a further time to persons in offices or employments to qualify themselves, pursuant to an act, entitled, an act to prevent the further growth of popery.

7. An act to explain and amend an act passed last session of parliament, entitled, an act for amending the road from Dundalk to Dunleer, in the county of Lowth.

By letters from Edinburgh, we learn, that on Saturday the 30th of last month, the revenue cruiser, named the Royal George, commanded by capt. Ogilvie, took and brought into the road of Leith, an Irish schooner, called the Friends Endeavour, of Dublin, David Sinnet, master, from Dunkirk, laden with teas and spirits: This vessel mounted ten carriage and ten swivel guns, with which she engaged the cruiser, nor did she strike until the master was killed, and several of the hands wounded. The latter were brought to the infirmary at Edinburgh, where care is taken of them.

13.] About the hour of three o'clock in the morning, the noted offender Thomas Whelan (who was concerned with the late desperate Cunningham, in breaking the goal of Newgate, and the murder of Elizabeth Bentón) together with John Mahon, Thomas Weyburne and others confined in the same prison, found means to raise a large flag, and dig a hole in the archway in order to effect their escape; but by the vigilance of the Turnkey and centinels they were prevented, and on Mr. Roe, keeper of the goal attending, they were properly secured, and removed to another part of the prison.—The weak situation of this prison, which contains murderers, robbers, house-breakers and thieves, calls loudly for aid, to forward the building and completion of the new goal, as public safety much depends on securing such criminals as are daily committed to prison in this city.

Jan. 16.] Last week a box, containing one thousand guineas, for a merchant of this city, was given in charge at Chester to the stage coachman going to Holyhead; but when the coachman arrived at that place, it was found the box had been broke open, and the money taken away. Suspicion lighting on a Yorkshireman, who had come with the coach as an outside passenger, and was then missing, search was made after him, and fortunately he was found concealed in a barn, at Bangor Ferry, not having been able to cross the water by the severity of the weather. The money was all found upon him, except three guineas; he was immediately committed to Beaumaris gaol.

BIRTHS.

Jan. 3.] IN Jervais-street, the lady of sir Wm. Pigot Piers, bart. of a son.—In Nassau-street, the lady of the rev. doctor Law, of a son.—In Jervais-street, the lady of Edmund Weld, esq; of a daughter.—20th At Clogrennan Lodge, near Carlow, the lady of John Rochford, esq; of a son.—At Stephen's-green, the lady of the rev. doctor Abraham Symes, of a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

Jan. 4.] AT Cork, Lt. Bunbury, to Miss Grifley.—Jan. 21.] Tho. Todd Faulkner, Esq; of Parliament-street, to Miss Moncrieffe, daughter of Mr. Richard Moncrieffe, of Capel-street, bookseller.

DEATHS.

AT his house in Dorset-street, Stafford Husley, Esq; commonly called baron of Galtrim.—Mrs. Hickman, lady of Walter Hickman, Esq; of the general post-office.—At Webbsborough, county Kilkenny, Mary Coen, aged 112 years. She retained her senses to the last, and recollected the battle of the Boyne perfectly well: she remembered six generations of the Webbsborough's family, and her voice was so remarkably strong as to be heard at a great distance, for a few days before her death.

HIBERNIAN MAGAZINE:

O R,

Compendium of Entertaining Knowledge,

For FEBRUARY, 1776.

Some Account of Samuel Adams, Esq; one of the Delegates from the Province of Massachusetts-Bay to the General Continental Congress of North-America.

SAMUEL ADAMS, Esq; is a gentleman who has made a great figure in America, and has taken so active a part in all her disputes with the mother-country, that he was joined with Mr. Hancock, in being the only persons refused pardon on returning to their duty to the British administration, in the proclamation issued last summer by general Gage. He is a man of fortune, a native of New England, about fifty-four years of age, and early imbibed a love for constitutional liberty, which love he carried to a degree of enthusiasm, that would not permit him to be a silent spectator of the disputes which arose first about the stamp act, and since on the tea. He took every opportunity to warn his countrymen of the dangers arising to their liberties; and however some may think the question problematical, yet as he always acted from principle, if he is even mistaken, he has a just claim to the title of an honest man. When it was thought necessary to convene delegates from the different provinces, he was sent to the general continental congress, as one of the representatives for the province of Massachusetts-Bay, and in what light he is beheld by the Americans may be easily gathered from his being lately appointed to a post equivalent to that of secretary of state. In short, he is an able politician; and the attack on Canada by February, 1776.

Observations on the Nature of Civil Liberty, the Principles of Government, and the Justice and Policy of the War with America. By Richard Price, D. D.

OUR colonies in North-America appear to be now determined to do and suffer every thing, under the persuasion, that Great Britain is attempting to rob them of that liberty to which every member of society, and all civil communities, have a natural and unalienable right. The question, therefore, whether this is a reasonable persuasion, is highly interesting, and deserves the most careful attention of every Englishman who values liberty, and wishes to avoid staining himself with the guilt of invading it. But it is impossible to judge properly of this question without correct ideas of liberty in general; and of the nature, limits, and principles of civil liberty in particular.—The following observations on this subject appear to me important, as well as just; and I cannot make myself easy without offering them to the public at the present period, big with events of the last consequence to this kingdom. I do this, with reluctance and pain, urged by strong feelings, but at the same time checked by the consciousness that I am likely to deliver sentiments ments not favourable to the present measures of that government, under which I live, and to which I am a constant and zealous well-wisher. Such, however, are my present sentiments and views, that this is a consideration of inferior moment with me; and, as I hope never to go beyond the bounds of decent discussion and expostulation, I flatter myself, that I shall be able to avoid giving any person just cause of offence.

The observations with which I shall begin, are of a more general and abstracted nature; but being, in my opinion, of particular consequence, and necessary to introduce what I have principally in view, I hope they will be patiently read and considered.

S E C T. I. Of the Nature of Liberty in General.

IN order to obtain a more distinct and accurate view of the nature of liberty as such, it will be useful to consider it under the four following general divisions.

First, Physical liberty.—Secondly, Moral liberty.—Thirdly, Religious liberty. And fourthly, Civil liberty.—These heads comprehend under them all the different kinds of liberty. And I have placed civil liberty last, because I mean to apply to it all I shall say of the other kinds of liberty.

By physical liberty I mean that principle of spontaneity, or self-determination, which constitutes us agents; or which gives us a command over our actions, rendering them properly ours, and not effects of the operation of any foreign cause.—Moral liberty is the power of following, in all circumstances, our sense of right and wrong; or of acting in conformity to our reflecting and moral principles, without being controuled by any contrary principles.—Religious liberty signifies the power of exercising, without molestation, that mode of religion which we think best; or of making the decisions of our own consciences, respecting religious truth, the rule of our conduct, and not any of the decisions of others.—In like manner; civil liberty is the power of a civil society or state to govern itself by its own discretion; or by laws of its own making, without being subject to any foreign discretion, or to the impositions of any extraneous will or power.

It should be observed, that, according to these definitions of the different kinds of liberty, there is one general idea, that runs through them all; I mean, the idea of self-direction, or self-government.—Did our volitions originate not with ourselves, but with some cause over which we have no power; or were we under a necessity of always following some will different from our own, we should want physical liberty.

In like manner; he whose perceptions of moral obligation are controuled by his passions, has lost his moral liberty; and the most common language applied to him is, that he wants self-government.

He likewise who, in religion, cannot govern himself by his convictions of religious duty, but is obliged to receive formularies of faith, and to practise modes of worship imposed on him by others, wants religious liberty.—And the community also that is governed, not by itself, but by some will independent of it, and over which it has no controul, wants civil liberty.

In all these cases there is a force which stands opposed to the agent's own will; and which, as far as it operates, produces servitude.—In the first case, this force is incompatible with the very idea of voluntary motion; and the subject of it is a mere passive instrument which never acts but is always acted upon.—In the second case; this force is the influence of passion getting the better of reason; or the brute overpowering and conquering the will of the man.—In the third case; it is human authority in religion requiring conformity to particular modes of faith and worship, and superseding private judgment.—And in the last case, it is any will distinct from that of the majority of a community, which claims a power of making laws for it, and disposing of its property.

This it is, I think, that marks the limit, or that lays the line between liberty and slavery. As far as, in any instance, the operation of any cause comes in to restrain the power of self-government, so far slavery is introduced: nor do I think that a preciser idea than this of liberty and slavery can be formed.

I cannot help wishing I could here fix my reader's attention, and engage him to consider carefully the dignity of that blessing to which we give the name of Liberty, according to the representation now made of it. There is not a word in the whole compass of language which expresses so much of what is important and excellent. It is, in every view of it, a blessing truly sacred and invaluable.—Without physical liberty, man would be a machine acted upon by mechanical springs, having no principle of motion in himself or command over events; and, therefore, incapable of all merit and demerit.—Without moral liberty he is a wicked wicked and detestable being, subject to the tyranny of base lusts, and the sport of every vile appetite.—And without religious and civil liberty he is a poor and abject animal without rights, without property, and without a conscience, bending his neck to the yoke, and crouching to the will of every silly creature who has the insolence to pretend to authority over him.—Nothing, therefore, can be of so much consequence to us as liberty. It is the foundation of all honour, and the chief privilege and glory of our natures.

In fixing our ideas on the subject of liberty, it is of particular use to take such an enlarged view of it as I have now given. But the immediate object of the present enquiry being civil liberty, I will confine to it all the subsequent observations.

SECT. II. Of civil liberty and the principles of government.

FROM what has been said it is obvious, that all civil government, as far as it can be denominated free, is the creature of the people. It originates with them. It is conducted under their direction; and has in view nothing but their happiness. All its different forms are no more than so many different modes in which they chuse to direct their affairs, and to secure the quiet enjoyment of their rights.—In every free state every man is his own legislator.—All taxes are free-gifts for public services.—All laws are particular provisions or regulations established by common consent for gaining protection and safety.—And all magistrates are trustees or deputies for carrying these regulations into execution.

Liberty, therefore, is too imperfectly defined when it is said to be “a government by Laws, and not by Men.” If the laws are made by one man, or a junto of men in the state, and not by common consent, a government by them does not differ from slavery. In this case it would be a contradiction in terms to say that the state governs itself.

From hence it is obvious that civil liberty, in its most perfect degree, can be enjoyed only in small states, where every member is capable of giving his suffrage in person, and of being chosen into public offices. When a state becomes so numerous, or when the different parts of it are removed to such distances from one another, as to render this impracticable, a diminution of liberty necessarily arises. There are, however, in these circumstances, methods by which such near approaches may be made to perfect liberty as shall answer all the purposes of government, and at the same time secure every right of human nature.

Tho’ all the members of a state should not be capable of giving their suffrages on public measures, individually and personally, they may do this by the appointment of substitutes or representatives. They may entrust the powers of legislation, subject to such restrictions as they shall think necessary, with any number of delegates; and whatever can be done by such delegates, within the limits of their trust, may be considered as done by the united voice and counsel of the community.—In this method a free government may be established in the largest state; and it is conceivable that by regulations of this kind, any number of states might be subjected to a scheme of government, that would exclude the desolations of war, and produce universal peace and order.

Let us think here of what may be practicable in this way with respect to Europe in particular.—While it continues divided, as it is at present, into a great number of independent kingdoms whose interests are continually clashing, it is impossible but that disputes will often arise which must end in war and carnage. It would be no remedy to this evil to make one of these states supreme over the rest; and to give it an absolute plenitude of power to superintend and controul them. This would be to subject all the states to the arbitrary discretion of one, and to establish an ignominious slavery not possible to be long endured. It would, therefore, be a remedy worse than the disease; nor is it possible it should be approved by any mind that has not lost every idea of Civil Liberty. On the contrary.—Let every state with respect to all its internal concerns, be continued independent of all the rest; and let a general confederacy be formed by the appointment of a Senate consisting of representatives from all the different states. Let this Senate possess the power of managing all the common concerns of the united states, and of judging and deciding between them, as a common arbitrator or umpire, in all disputes; having, at the same time, under its direction, the common force of the states to support its decisions.—In these circumstances, each separate state would be secure against the interference of foreign power in its private concerns, and, therefore, would possess liberty; and at the same time it would be secure against all oppression and insult from every neighbouring state.—Thus might the scattered force and abilities of a whole continent be gathered into one point; all litigations settled as they rose; universal peace preserved; and nation prevented from any more lifting up a sword against nation.

I have observed, that tho', in a great state, all the individuals that compose it cannot be admitted to an immediate participation in the powers of legislation and government, yet they may participate in these powers by a delegation of them to a body of representatives.—In this case it is evident that the state will be still free or self-governed; and that it will be more or less so in proportion as it is more or less fairly and adequately represented. If the persons to whom the trust of government is committed hold their places for short terms; if they are chosen by the unbiassed voices of a majority of the state, and subject to their instructions; liberty will be enjoyed in its highest degree. But if they are chosen for long terms by a part only of the state; and if during that term they are subject to no controul from their constituents; the very idea of liberty will be lost, and the power of choosing constituents becomes nothing but a power, lodged in a few, to chuse at certain periods, a body of masters for themselves and for the rest of the community. And if a state is so sunk that the majority of its representatives are elected by a handful of the meanest * persons in it, whose votes are always paid for; and if also, there is a higher will on which even these mock representatives themselves depend, and that directs their voices: In these circumstances, it will be an abuse of language to say that the state possesses liberty. Private men, indeed, might be allowed the exercise of liberty; as they might also under the most despotic government; but it would be an indulgence or connivance derived from the spirit of the times, or from an accidental mildness in the administration. And, rather than be governed in such a manner, it

N O T E.

* In Great Britain, consisting of near six millions of inhabitants, 5723 persons, most of them the lowest of the people, elect one half of the House of Commons; and 364 votes chuse a ninth part. This may be seen distinctly made out in the Political Disquisitions, Vol. I. Book 2. C. 4. a work full of important and useful instruction, would perhaps be better to be governed by the will of one man without any representation: for a representation so degenerated could answer no other end than to mislead and deceive, by disguising slavery, and keeping up a form of liberty when the reality was lost.

Within the limits now mentioned, liberty may be enjoyed in every possible degree; from that which is complete and perfect, to that which is merely nominal; according as the people have more or less of a share in government, and of a controuling power over the persons by whom it is administered.

In general, to be free is to be guided by one's own will; and to be guided by the will of another is the characteristic of servitude. This is particularly applicable to political liberty. That state, I have observed, is free, which is guided by its own will; or, (which comes to the same) by the will of an assembly of representatives appointed by itself and accountable to itself. And every state that is not so governed; or in which a body of men representing the people make not an essential part of the legislature, is in slavery.—In order to form the most perfect constitution of government, there may be the best reasons for joining to such a body of representatives, an hereditary council, consisting of men of the first rank in the state, with a supreme executive magistrate at the head of all. This will form useful checks in a legislature; and contribute to give it vigour, union, and dispatch, without infringing liberty: for, as long as that part of government which represents the people is a fair representation; and also has a negative on all public measures, together with the sole power of imposing taxes and originating supplies; the essentials of liberty will be preserved.—We make it our boast in this country, that this is our own constitution. I will not say with how much reason.

Of such liberty as I have now described, it is impossible that there should be an excess. Government is an institution for the benefit of the people governed, which they have power to model as they please; and to say, that they can have too much of this power is to say, that there ought to be a power in the state superior to that which gives it being, and from which all jurisdiction in it is derived.—Licentiousness, which has been commonly mentioned, as an extreme of liberty, is indeed its opposite. It is government by the will of rapacious individuals, in opposition to the will of the community, community, made known and declared in the laws. A free state, at the same time that it is free itself, makes all its members free by excluding licentiousness, and guarding their persons and property and good name against insult. It is the end of all just government, at the same time that it secures the liberty of the public against foreign injury, to secure the liberty of the individual against private injury. I do not, therefore, think it strictly just to say, that it belongs to the nature of government to entrench on private liberty. It ought never to do this, except as far as the exercise of private liberty encroaches on the liberties of others. That is; it is licentiousness it restrains, and liberty itself only when used to destroy liberty.

It appears from hence, that licentiousness and despotism are more nearly allied than is commonly imagined. They are both alike inconsistent with liberty, and the true end of government: nor is there any other difference between them, than that the one is the licentiousness of great men, and the other the licentiousness of little men; or that, by the one, the persons and property of a people are subject to outrage and invasion from a king or lawless body of grandeers; and that, by the other, they are subject to the like outrage from a lawless mob.—In avoiding one of these evils, mankind have often run into the other. But all well-constituted governments guard equally against both. Indeed of the two, the last is, on several accounts, the least to be dreaded, and has done the least mischief. It may be truly said, that if licentiousness has destroyed its thousands, despotism has destroyed its millions. The former, having little power, and no system to support it, necessarily finds its own remedy; and a people soon get out of the tumult and anarchy attending it. But a despotism, wearing the form of government, and being armed with its force, is an evil not to be conquered without dreadful struggles. It goes on from age to age, debasing the human faculties, leveling all distinctions, and preying on the rights and blessings of society.—It deserves to be added, that in a state disturbed by licentiousness, there is an animation which is favourable to the human mind, and which puts it upon exerting its powers. But in a state habituated to a despotism, all is still and torpid. A dark and savage tyranny stifles every effort of genius; and the mind loses all its spirit and dignity.

Before I proceed to what I have farther in view, I will observe, that the account now given of the principles of public liberty, and the nature of an equal and free government, shews what judgment we should form of that omnipotence, which, it has been said, must belong to every government as such. Great stress has been laid on this, but most unreasonably.—Government, as has been before observed, is, in the very nature of it, a trust; and all its powers a delegation for gaining particular ends. This trust may be misapplied and abused. It may be employed to defeat the very ends for which it was instituted; and to subvert the very rights which it ought to protect.—A parliament, for instance, consisting of a body of representatives, chosen for a limited period, to make laws, and to grant money for public services, would forfeit its authority by making itself perpetual, or even prolonging its own duration; by nominating its own members; by accepting bribes; or subjecting itself to any kind of foreign influence. This would convert a parliament into a conclave or junto of self-created tools; and a state that has lost its regard to its own rights, so far as to submit to such a breach of trust in its rulers, is enslaved.—Nothing, therefore, can be more absurd than the doctrine which some have taught, with respect to the omnipotence of parliament. They possess no power beyond the limits of the trust for the execution of which they were formed. If they contradict this trust, they betray their constituents, and dissolve themselves. All delegated power must be subordinate and limited.—If omnipotence can, with any sense, be ascribed to a legislature, it must be lodged where all legislative authority originates; that is, in the people. For their sakes government is instituted; and theirs is the only real omnipotence.

I am sensible, that all I have been saying would be very absurd, were the opinions just which some have maintained concerning the origin of government. According to these opinions, government is not the creature of the people, or the result of a convention between them and their rulers: But there are certain men who possess in themselves, independently of the will of the people, a right of governing them, which they derive from the deity. This doctrine has been abundantly refuted by many * excellent writers. It is a doctrine which avowedly subverts civil liberty; and which represents mankind as a body of vassals, formed to descend like cattle from one set of owners to another, who have an absolute dominion over them. It is a wonder, that those who view their species in a light so humiliating, should ever be able to think of themselves without regret and shame. The intention of these observations is not to oppose such sentiments; but, taking for granted the reasonableness of civil liberty, to shew wherein it consists, and what distinguishes it from its contrary.

And, in considering this subject, as it has been now treated, it is unavoidable to reflect on the excellency of a free government, and its tendency to exalt the nature of man—Every member of a free state, having his property secure, and knowing himself his own governor, possesses a consciousness of dignity in himself, and feels incitements to emulation and improvements, to which the miserable slaves of arbitrary power must be utter strangers. In such a state all the springs of action have room to operate, and the mind is stimulated to the noblest exertions*.—But to be obliged, from our birth, to look up to a creature no better than ourselves as the master of our fortunes; and to receive his will as our law—What can be more humiliating? What elevated ideas can enter a mind in such a situation?—Agreeable to this remark; the subjects of free states have, in all ages, been most distinguished for genius and knowledge. Liberty is the soil where the arts and sciences have flourished; and the more free a state has been, the more have the powers of the human mind been drawn forth into action, and the greater number of brave men has it produced. With what lustre do the ancient free states of Greece shine in the annals of the world? How different is that country now, under the great Turk? The difference between a country inhabited by men, and by brutes, is not greater.

These are reflections which should be constantly present to every mind in this country.—As moral liberty is the prime blessing of man in his private capacity, so is civil liberty in his public capacity. There is nothing that requires more to be watched than power. There is nothing that ought to be opposed with a more determined resolution than its encroachments. Sleep in a state, as Montesquieu says, is always followed by slavery.

N O T E.

* See Dr. Priestley on Government.

The people of this kingdom were once warmed by such sentiments as those. Many a sycophant of power have they sacrificed. Often have they fought and bled in the cause of liberty. But that time seems to be going. The fair inheritance of liberty left us by our ancestors many of us are not unwilling to resign. An abandoned venality, the inseparable companion of dissipation and extravagance, has poisoned the springs of public virtue among us: And should any events ever arise that should render the same opposition necessary that took place in the times of king Charles the first, and James the second, I am afraid all that is valuable to us would be lost. The terror of the standing army, the danger of the public funds, and the all-corrupting influence of the treasury, would deaden all zeal, and produce general acquiescence and servility.

FROM the nature and principles of civil liberty, as they have been now explained, it is an immediate and necessary inference that no one community can have any power over the property or legislation of another community, that is not incorporated with it by a just and adequate representation.—Then only, it has been shewn, is a state free, when it is governed by its own will. But a country that is subject to the legislature of another country, in which it has no voice, and over which it has no controul, cannot be said to be governed by its own will. Such a country therefore, is in a state of slavery. And it deserves to be particularly considered, that such a slavery is worse, on several accounts, than any slavery of private men to one another, or of kingdoms to despots within themselves.—Between one state and another, there is none of that fellow-feeling that takes place between persons in private life. Being detached bodies that never see one another, and residing perhaps in different quarters of the globe, the state that governs cannot be a witness to the sufferings occasioned by its oppressions; or a competent judge of the circumstances and abilities of the people who are governed. They must also have in a great degree separate interests; and the more the one is loaded, the more the other may be eased. The infamy likewise of oppression, being in such circumstances shared among a multitude, is not likely to be much felt or regarded.—On all these accounts there is, in the case of one country subjugated to to another, little or nothing to check rapacity; and the most flagrant injustice and cruelty may be practised without remorse or pity.—I will add, that it is particularly difficult to shake off a tyranny of this kind. A single despot, if a people are unanimous and resolute, may be soon subdued. But a despotic state is not easily subdued; and a people subject to it cannot emancipate themselves without entering into a dreadful, and, perhaps, very unequal contest.

I cannot help observing farther, that the slavery of a people to internal despots may be qualified and limited; but I don't see what can limit the authority of one state over another. The exercise of power in this case can have no other measure than discretion; and, therefore, must be indefinite and absolute.

Once more. It should be considered that the government of one country by another, can only be supported by a military force; and, without such a support, must be destitute of all weight and efficiency.

This will be best explained by putting the following case.—There is, let us suppose, in a province subject to the sovereignty of a distant state, a subordinate legislature consisting of an assembly chosen by the people; a council chosen by that assembly; and a governor appointed by the sovereign state, and paid by the province. There are, likewise, judges and other officers, appointed and paid in the same manner for administering justice agreeably to the laws, by the verdicts of juries fairly and indiscriminately chosen.—This forms a constitution seemingly free, by giving the people a share in their own government, and some check on their rulers. But, while there is a higher legislative power, to the controul of which such a constitution is subject, it does not itself possess liberty, and therefore, cannot be of any use as a security to liberty; nor is it possible that it should be of long duration. Laws offensive to the province will be enacted by the sovereign state. The legislature of the province will remonstrate against them. The magistrates will not execute them. Juries will not convict upon them; and consequently, like the Pope's bulls which once governed Europe, they will become nothing but forms and empty sounds, to which no regard will be shewn.—In order to remedy this evil, and to give efficiency to its government, the supreme state will naturally be led, to withdraw the governor, the council, and the judges † from the controul of the province, by making them entirely dependant on itself for their pay and continuance in office, as well as for their appointment. It will also alter the mode of choosing juries on purpose to bring them more under its influence: And in some cases, under the pretence of the impossibility of gaining an impartial trial where government is resisted, it will perhaps ordain, that offenders shall be removed from the province to be tried within its own territories: And it may even go so far in this kind of policy, as

N O T E.

† The independency of the judges we esteem in this country one of our greatest privileges.—Before the revolution they generally, I believe, held their places during pleasure. King William gave them their places during good behaviour. At the accession of the present royal family their places were given them during good behaviour, in consequence of the act of settlement, 12 and 13 W. III. c. 2. But an opinion having been entertained by some, that though their commissions were made under the act of settlement to continue, during good behaviour, yet that they determined on the demise of the crown; it was enacted by a statute made in the first year of his present majesty, chap. 23. “That the commissions of judges for the time being shall be, continue, and remain in full force, during their good behaviour, notwithstanding the demise of his majesty, or any of his heirs and successors;” with a proviso, “that it may be lawful for his majesty, his heirs and successors, to remove any judge upon the address of both houses of parliament.” And by the same statute their salaries are secured to them during the continuance of their commissions: His majesty, according to the preamble of the statute, having been pleased to declare from the throne to both houses of parliament, “That he looked upon the independency and uprightness of judges, as essential to the impartial administration of justice, as one of the best securities to the rights and liberties of his loving subjects, and as most conducive to the honour of his crown.”

A worthy friend and able lawyer has supplied me with this note. It affords, when contrasted with that dependence of the judges which has been thought reasonable in America, a sad specimen of the different manner in which a kingdom may think proper to govern itself, and the provinces subject to it.

to endeavour to prevent the effects of discontents, by forbidding all meetings and associations of the people, except at such times, and for such particular purposes, as shall be permitted them.

Thus will such a province be exactly in the same state that Britain would be in, were our first executive magistrate, our House of Lords, and our judges, nothing but the instruments of a foreign democratical power; were our juries nominated by that power; or were we liable to be transported to a distant country to be tried for offences committed here; and restrained from calling any meetings, consulting about any grievances, or associating for any purposes, except when leave should be given us by a Lord Lieutenant or Viceroy.

It is certain that this is a state of oppression which no country could endure, and to which it would be vain to expect, that any people should submit an hour without an armed force to compel them.

The late transactions in Massachusetts Bay are a perfect exemplification of what I have now said. The government of Great-Britain in that province has gone on exactly in the train I have described; till at last it became necessary to station troops there, not amenable to the civil power; and all terminated in a government by the sword. And such, if a people are not sunk below the character of men, will be the issue of all government in similar circumstances.

It may be asked—"Are there not causes by which one state may acquire a rightful authority over another, though not consolidated by an adequate representation?" I answer, that there are no such causes.--All the causes to which such an effect can be ascribed are conquest, compact, or obligations conferred.

Much has been said of the right of conquest; and history contains little more than accounts of kingdoms reduced by it under the dominion of other kingdoms, and of the havoc it has made among mankind. But the authority derived from hence, being founded on violence, is never rightful. The Roman republic was nothing but a faction against the general liberties of the world; and had no more right to give law to the provinces subject to it, than thieves have to the property they seize, or to the houses into which they break.--Even in the case of a just war undertaken by one people to defend itself against the oppressions of another people, conquest gives only a right to an indemnification for the injury which occasioned the war, and a reasonable security against future injury.

Neither can any estate acquire such an authority over other states in virtue of any compacts or cessions. This is a case in which compacts are not binding. Civil liberty is, in this respect, on the same footing with religious liberty. As no people can lawfully surrender their religious liberty, by giving up their right of judging for themselves in religion, or by allowing any human beings to prescribe to them what faith they shall embrace, or what mode of worship they shall practise; so neither can any civil societies lawfully surrender their civil liberty, by giving up to any extraneous jurisdiction their power of legislating for themselves and disposing of their property. Such a cession, being inconsistent with the unalienable rights of human nature, would either not bind at all; or bind only the individuals who made it. This is a blessing which no one generation of men can give up for another; and which, when lost, a people have always a right to resume.—Had our ancestors in this country been so mad as to have subjected themselves to any foreign community, we could not have been under any obligation to continue in such a state. And all the nations now in the world who, in consequence of the tameness and folly of their predecessors, are subject to arbitrary power, have a right to emancipate themselves as soon as they can.

If neither conquest or compact can give such an authority, much less can any favours received, or any services performed by one state for another.—Let the favour received be what it will, liberty is too dear a price for it. A state that has been obliged is not, therefore, bound to be enslaved. It ought, if possible, to make an adequate return for the services done to it; but to suppose that it ought to give up the power of governing itself, and the disposal of its property, would be to suppose, that, in order to shew its gratitude, it ought to part with the power of ever afterwards exercising gratitude.—How much has been done by this kingdom for Hanover? But no one will say that on this account, we have a right to make the laws of Hanover; or even to draw a single penny from it without its own consent.

After what has been said it will, I am afraid, be trifling to apply the preceding arguments to the case of different communities, which are considered as different parts of the same empire. But there are reasons which render it necessary for me to be explicit in making this application.

What I mean here is just to point out the difference of situation between communities forming an empire; and particular bodies or classes of men forming different parts of a kingdom. Different communities forming an empire have no connexions, which produce a necessary reciprocation of interests between them. They inhabit different districts, and are governed by different legislatures.—On the contrary. The different classes of men within a kingdom are all placed on the same ground. Their concerns and interests are the same; and what is done to one part must affect all—These are situations totally different; and a constitution of government that may be consistent with liberty in one of them, may be entirely inconsistent with it in the other. It is, however, certain that, even in the last of these situations, no one part ought to govern the rest. In order to a fair and equal government, there ought to be a fair and equal representation of all that are governed; and as far as this is wanting in any government, it deviates from the principles of liberty, and becomes unjust and oppressive.—But in the circumstances of different communities, all this holds with unspeakably more force. The government of a part in this case becomes complete tyranny; and subjection to it becomes complete slavery.

But ought there not, it is asked, to exist somewhere in an empire a supreme legislative authority over the whole; or a power to controul and bind all the different states of which it consists?—This enquiry has been already answered. The truth is, that such a supreme controuling power ought to exist no-where except in such a senate or body of delegates as that already described; and that the authority or supremacy of even this senate ought to be limited to the common concerns of the empire.—I think I have proved that the fundamental principles of liberty necessarily require this.

In a word. An empire is a collection of states or communities united by some common bond or tie. If these states have each of them free constitutions of government, and, with respect to taxation and internal legislation, are independent of the other states, but united by compacts, or alliances, or subjection to a great council, representing the whole, or to one monarch entrusted with the supreme executive power: In these circumstances, the empire will be an empire of freedom.—If, on the contrary, like the different provinces subject to the grand seignior, none of the states possess any independent legislative authority; but are all subject to an absolute monarch, whose will is their law; then is the empire an empire of slaves.—If one of the states is free, but governs by its will all the other states; then is the empire, like that of the Romans in the times of the republic, an empire consisting of one state free, and the rest in slavery: nor does it make any more difference in this case, that the governing state is itself free, than it does in the case of a kingdom subject to a despot, that this despot is himself free. It has been observed, that this only makes the slavery worse. There is, in the one case, a chance, that in the quick succession of despots, a good one will sometimes arise. But bodies of men continue the same; and have generally proved the most unrelenting of all tyrants.

A great writer before * quoted, observes of the Roman empire, that while liberty was at the centre, tyranny prevailed in the distant provinces; that such as were free under it were extremely so, while those who were slaves groaned under the extremity of slavery; and that the same events that destroyed the liberty of the former, gave liberty to the latter.

The liberty of the Romans, therefore, was only an additional calamity to the provinces governed by them; and tho' it might have been said of the citizens of Rome, that they were the "freest members of any civil society in the known world;" yet of the subjects of Rome, it must have been said, that they were the completest slaves in the known world.—How remarkable is it, that this very people, once the freest of mankind, but, at the same time, the most proud and tyrannical, should become at last the most contemptible and abject slaves that ever existed!

P A R T II.

IN the foregoing disquisitions, I have, from one leading principle, deduced a number of consequences, that seem to me incapable of being disputed. I have meant that they should be applied to the great question between this kingdom and the colonies which has occasioned the present war with them.

It is impossible, but my readers must have been all along making this application;

tion; and if they still think, that the claims of this kingdom are reconcilable to the principles of true liberty and legitimate government, I am afraid, that nothing I shall farther say will have any effect on their judgment. I wish, however, they would have the patience and candour to go with me, and grant me a hearing some time longer.

Though clearly decided in my own judgment on this subject, I am inclined to make great allowances for the different judgments of others. We have been to used to speak of the colonies as our colonies, and to think of them as in a state of subordination to us, and as holding their existence in America only for our use, that it is no wonder the prejudices of many are alarmed, when they find a different doctrine maintained. The meanest person among us is disposed to look upon himself as having a body of subjects in America; and to be offended at the denial of his right to make laws for them, though perhaps he does not know what colour they are of, or what language they talk.—Such are the natural prejudices of this country.—But the time is coming, I hope, when the unreasonableness of them will be seen; and more just sentiments prevail.

Before I proceed, I beg it may be attended, that I have chosen to try this question by the general principles of civil liberty; and not by the practice of former times; or by the charters granted the colonies.—The arguments for them, drawn from these last topics, appear to me greatly to outweigh the arguments against them. But I wish to have this question brought to a higher test, and surer issue. The question with all liberal enquirers ought to be, not what jurisdiction over them precedents, statutes, and charters give, but what reason and equity, and the rights of humanity give.—This is, in truth, a question which no kingdom has ever before had occasion to agitate. The case of a free country branching itself out in the manner Britain has done, and sending to a distant world colonies which have there, from small beginnings, and under free legislatures of their own, increased, and formed a body of powerful states, likely soon to become superior to the parent state—This is a case which is new in the history of mankind; and it is extremely improper to judge of it by the rules of any narrow and partial policy; or to consider it on any other ground than the general one of reason and justice.—Those who will be candid enough to judge on this ground, and who can divest themselves of national prejudices, will not, I fancy, remain long unsatisfied.—But alas! matters are gone too far. The dispute probably must be settled another way; and the sword alone, I am afraid, is now to determine what the rights of Britain and America are.—Shocking situation!—Detested be the measures which have brought us into it: and, if we are endeavouring to enforce injustice, cursed will be the war.—A retreat, however, is not yet impracticable. The duty we owe our gracious sovereign obliges us to rely on his disposition to stay the sword, and to promote the happiness of all the different parts of the empire at the head of which he is placed. With some hopes, therefore, that it may not be too late to reason on this subject, I will, in the following sections, enquire what the war with America is in the following respects.

1. In respect of justice.
2. The principles of the constitution.
3. In respect of policy and humanity.
4. The honour of the kingdom.

And lastly, The probability of succeeding in it.

SECT. I. Of the Justice of the War with America.

The enquiry, whether the war with the Colonies is a just war, will be best determined by stating the power over them, which it is the end of the war to maintain: And this cannot be better done, than in the words of an act of parliament, made on purpose to define it. That act, it is well known, declares, “That this kingdom has power, and of right ought to have power to make laws and statutes to bind the colonies, and people of America, in all cases whatever.”—Dreadful power indeed! I defy any one to express slavery in stronger language. It is the same with declaring “that we have a right to do with them what we please.”—I will not waste my time by applying to such a claim any of the preceding arguments. If my reader does not feel more in this case, than words can express, all reasoning must be vain.

But, probably, most persons will be for using milder language; and for saying no more than, that the united legislatures of England and Scotland have of right power to tax the colonies, and a supremacy of legislation over America.—But this comes to the same. If it means means any thing, it means, that the property, and the legislations of the colonies, are subject to the absolute discretion of Great Britain, and ought of right to be so. The nature of the thing admits of no limitation. The colonies can never be admitted to be judges, how far the authority over them in these cases shall extend. This would be to destroy it entirely.—If any part of their property is subject to our discretion, the whole must be so. If we have a right to interfere at all in their internal legislations, we have a right to interfere as far as we think proper.—It is self-evident, that this leaves them nothing they can call their own.—And what is it that can give to any people such a supremacy over another people?—I have already examined the principal answers which have been given to this enquiry. But it will not be amiss in this place to go over some of them again.

It has been urged, that such a right must be lodged somewhere, “in order to preserve the Unity of the British Empire.”

Pleas of this sort have, in all ages, been used to justify tyranny.——They have in religion given rise to numberless oppressive claims, and slavish hierarchies. And in the Romish communion particularly, it is well known, that the pope claims the title and powers of the supreme head on earth of the christian church, in order to preserve its unity.—With respect to the British Empire, nothing can be more preposterous than to endeavour to maintain its unity, by setting up such a claim. This is a method of establishing unity, which, like the similar method in religion, can produce nothing but discord and mischief.—The truth is, that a common relation to one supreme executive head; an exchange of kind offices; ties of interest and affection, and compacts, are sufficient to give the British Empire all the unity that is necessary. But if not—if in order to preserve its unity, one half of it must be enslaved to the other half, let it, in the name of God, want unity.

Much has been said of “the superiority of the British State.” But what gives us our superiority?—Is it our wealth?—This never confers real dignity. On the contrary: its effect is always to debase, intoxicate, and corrupt.—Is it the number of our people? The colonies will soon be equal to us in number.—Is it our knowledge and virtue? They are probably equally knowing, and more virtuous. There are names among them that will not stoop to any names among the philosophers and politicians of this island.

“But we are the parent state.”—These are the magic words which have fascinated and misled us.—The English came from Germany. Does that give the German states a right to tax us?—Children, having no property, and being incapable of guiding themselves, the Author of nature has committed the care of them to their parents, and subjected them to their absolute authority. But there is a period when, having acquired property, and a capacity of judging for themselves, they become independent agents; and when, for this reason, the authority of their parents ceases, and becomes nothing but the respect and influence due to benefactors. Supposing, therefore, that the order of nature in establishing the relation between parents and children, ought to have been the rule of our conduct to the colonies, we should have been gradually relaxing our authority as they grew up. But, like mad parents, we have done the contrary; and, at the very time when our authority should have been most relaxed, we have carried it to the greatest extent, and exercised it with the greatest rigour. No wonder then, that they have turned upon us; and obliged us to remember, that they are not children.

“But we have, it is said, protected them, and run deeply in debt on their account.”—The full answer to this has been already given, (page 79.) Will any one say, that all we have done for them has not been more on our own account, * than on theirs?—But suppose the

N O T E.

* This is particularly true of the bounties granted on some American commodities (as pitch, tar, indigo, &c.) when imported into Britain; for it is well known, that the end of granting them was, to get those commodities cheaper from the colonies and in return for our manufactures, which we used to get from Russia and other foreign countries. And this is expressed in the preambles of the law which grant these bounties. See the Appeal to the Justice, &c. page 21, third edition. It is, therefore, strange that doctor Tucker and others, should have insisted so much upon these bounties as favours and indulgences to the Colonies.——But it is still more strange, that the same representation should have been made of the compensations granted them the contrary. Have they done nothing for us? Have they made no compensation for the protection they have received? Have they not helped us to pay our taxes, to support our poor, and to bear the burden of our debts, by taking from us, at our own price, all the commodities with which we can supply them?---Have they not, for our advantage, submitted to many restraints in acquiring property? Must they likewise resign to us the disposal of that property?---Has not their exclusive trade with us been for many years one of the chief sources of our national wealth and power?---In all our wars have they not fought by our side, and contributed much to our success? In the last war, particularly, it is well known, that they ran themselves deeply in debt; and that the parliament thought it necessary to grant them considerable sums annually as compensations for going beyond their abilities in assisting us. And in this course would they have continued for many future years; perhaps, for ever.----In short; were an accurate account stated, it is by no means certain which side would appear to be most indebted. When asked as freemen, they have hitherto seldom discovered any reluctance in giving. But, in obedience to a demand, and with the bayonet at their breasts, they will give us nothing but blood.

Histories of the Tete-a-Tete annexed; or, Memoirs of the Combustible Lover, and the Eloped Clara.

THIS department of our Magazine appears every month to teem with fresh objects for public exhibition, which may, with the greatest propriety, be brought forth upon our canvas. The Green room seems the peculiar soil for hot-beds of tetes-a-tetes; and we shall never be at a loss for subjects, whilst the theatres continue in their present state of gallantry.

Our hero and heroine have within these few weeks so much engrossed the attention of every polite circle, that we seized the first opportunity of laying their memoirs before our readers.

N O T E.

for doing more during the last war in assisting us than could have been reasonably expected; and also of the sums we have spent in maintaining troops among them without their consent; and in opposition to their wishes.---See a Pamphlet, entitled, "The Rights of Great Britain asserted against the Claims of America,"

The combustible lover, as we have styled him in our title, is the son of an eminent grocer in this city, who gave him a very liberal education, which his genius and talents enabled him to improve, and he was early in life pronounced an accomplished young gentleman; for, besides the classic lore, which he had judiciously gleaned, he possessed a genteel person, in which he united all the polite exercises, which gave additional force to a happy address, and seemed justly to entitle him to the possession of the graces.

Thus qualified he visited the continent, and, as a young man of taste and gallantry, made a very conspicuous figure in the capital of France. His strong propensity to the ladies, failed not to induce him to aim at some conquests, which created him many rivals amongst the Parisian petits-maitres, whose insuperable vanity excites them to believe that the whole sex are destined for their sole gratification. The French ladies are not, however, so destitute of discernment as not to distinguish between the sterling good sense of a well-bred Englishman, and the flippant compliments of a Chevalier de St. Louis sans chemise. Indeed, these butterfly knights the ladies amuse themselves with as they do with their parrots and their monkeys; they chatter, and skip about, and create a laugh; but the more solid joys of female society are reserved for men of superior talents and recommendations. Our hero was a man after their own hearts; his person was athletic, yet genteel; his manners engaging, and his conversation agreeable. A French Macaroni, one day in the Thuilleries was overheard by the combustible lover saying, Pardi, cet Anglois a trouve le moyen de ravir les cœurs de toutes nos belles.---To which he instantly replied, C'est parceque vous n'etes pas ravisseur de tout.

Neither was he less distinguished in the parterre as a dramatic critic, since his opinion had great weight among the connoisseurs of that circle, whenever a new piece was presented.

He kept genteel company among the French of both sexes, seldom being seen at the Casse de Conti, filled the English coffee-house, except it was to peruse the London papers; but he scarce ever passed an evening among his own countrymen, who usually associate together in that gay capital, and thereby return as little acquainted with the real manners of people of rank as they were the ~~day~~ they set out from hence.

Upon

The Eloped Slave

The Condemned Slave

Published as the Act directs by T. Walker Dame Street 1776

Upon our hero's return, he took French Flanders in his way, and passed several days agreeably at Lille; from whence he went to Brussels, and, after viewing every thing curious in that city, he returned to England, by the way of Amsterdam.

Soon after his arrival here he engaged in commerce, and became the proprietor of some powder mills, which proved very advantageous to him. This prospect did not, however, engage all his attention. His natural and unconquerable propensity for the muses induced him to pass his leisure hours in their service, and he produced some little dramatic pieces of the opera kind that met with applause; and it is reported he has now a new production in rehearsal at one of the theatres.

This intercourse with the stage necessarily introduced him into the Green room, where he became acquainted with the first rate actors; nor did the scenic beauties escape his observation. Many reports have prevailed that our hero has been the happy man with queens, princesses, and heroines; but he had always the honour to ascribe these Green-room rumours to the effect of scandal. At length, however, one has been so completely ascertained, and so publicly promulgated, that it remains no longer a doubt with the most intimate acquaintance of both parties.

In the interim, however, he made another trip to the continent, and renewed his former acquaintance at Paris, where he was equally caressed as upon his first visit to that metropolis, and the ladies, it is well assured, were full as kind to him. The countess de L—, who entertained a very strong partiality for him, and who was very jealous of Madame de S—, esteemed one of the prettiest and most facetious women in all Paris, upon seeing them at the opera together, wrote him a very severe billet upon the occasion. It was couched nearly in the following style.

“ I did not think, Sir, that a man of your good sense and breeding could behave in so rude a manner to a woman who has always entertained the highest respect for you. I do not pretend to dispute the charms of Madame de S—, that pretty doll has too many flatterers to let her vanity want for incense, and her loquacity, which she takes for wit, is sure to meet with applause from the ignorant adulators who surround her. But I judged a gentleman of your penetration could not be imposed upon by such clin- quant for sterling. Nevertheless, you greedily swallowed all the volubility of her tongue the whole time, to the disturbance of the audience and the interruption of the actors. Think not, Sir, that this flows from any jealous resentment. I own I have the vanity to think the countess de L— may, at any time, or upon any occasion, take the precedence of Madame de S—. But there is something due to bien seance, the want of which I owned shocked me in such an accomplished gentleman, and I could not, as a friend, refrain from communicating my sentiments upon the occasion.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Our hero's politeness was a good deal hurt at this remonstrance, and he repaired the next day to the countess's, when he apologized so well for his behaviour the preceding evening, that a reconciliation immediately succeeded, and he was again restored to her good graces. Indeed his situation was very critical at the opera; for had he quitted Madame de S—, to have paid his devoirs to the countess, the former would have had still more reason to complain of his want of politesse. However, by his present manoeuvre, he recovered the countess's favour, without offending her rival.

Upon his return to England, dramatic pursuits again attracted his attention, and the heroines of the boards again shared his respects. It was now the current talk of the Green-room at Drury-lane, that the pretty idiot had made a conquest of him: but her extravagance and dissipation must have presently upshackled him, as we find her, soon afterwards, in the arms of a peerless peer, whose motto is variety, and who, sooner than not complete his annual catalogue, will even take up with a R—d.

The period was now arrived, when the brunette fyren engaged all his attention. This young lady is the daughter of a very worthy reputable tradesman, who gave her a genteel education, and having a very melodious voice, he placed her under an eminent music master, who, finding her a very apt pupil, took uncommon pleasure in observing the speedy progress she made in this study. She now approached towards maturity, and expressed a strong inclination to come upon the stage, which her father with reluctance consented to. Her figure was genteel and elegant, her countenance expressive and engaging, and her voice and manner completely captivating. A young lady with such a person and accomplishments upon upon the stage could not fail inviting a number of suitors, especially as she met with great and just applause in every part she performed. Whether she had as yet listened to any admirer in particular, or distinguished any partiality in favour of any lover, cannot be ascertained, though, if the Green-room whispers were to be attended to, she had testified a predilection in favour of an adorer, previous to that which she demonstrated for our hero.

Be this as it may, the combustible lover found her attractions so great, that he left no method unpractised to insinuate himself into her good graces, and with great assiduity, he, at length, prevailed. She quitted her father's house, and flew with the happy man to some sequestered place, where for a short time they remained concealed; but a father's affliction and vigilance traced them out, and the young lady, as well as her swain, were compelled to make their appearance before a certain worshipful justice, who in examining the merits of the affair, asked our hero if he had any esteem for the young lady—he replied “he loved her better than life.” “Why then, said the justice, do you not marry her?” “Because, replied our hero, I am married already.” The enquiry here terminated, and Miss was committed to the care of her father, who kept a more vigilant eye upon her than before; but, as it was necessary that she should perform a new part at the play-house, it was not only proper for her to rehearse, but afterwards to exhibit several successive nights. Our hero was so delighted with her in the new character, that he resolved at all events to be once more in possession of his charmer. He accordingly laid a plan to carry her off one night after the performance, and she having received an intimation of his design, was prepared for the event. The plan succeeded agreeable to their wishes, and Clara (very characteristically) made another elopement.

Her father was not apprized of the desertion till it was too late; the managers, equally ignorant of it, were greatly disconcerted how to supply her part. Fortunately they had a young lady in their company, whose abilities till now they were unacquainted with, and who, upon a short notice, filled the character with great propriety.

Incessant search has been made after the fair fugitive, but hitherto unsuccessfully. Some assert that the lovers are flown to France, to give a loose to their raptures unallayed, and without interruption. But there was more reason to believe that the lady lay concealed in the labyrinth of this metropolis. It has since appeared that she has been articed to a music-master, to screen her from the resentment of her father. Our heroine is not at this period more than eighteen; so that we may, from this early sample of her passion for intrigue, suggest that her future history will afford ample matter for amorous biographers.

The Trial of Count Struensee, late prime Minister to the King of Denmark, before the Royal Commission of Inquisition, at Copenhagen, translated from the Danish and German Originals.

THIS publication hath all the marks of authenticity, and clears up a doubt that hath long prevailed in the bosoms of many persons. The apology offered for drawing aside the veil, is, the sacred page of history must not be influenced by any partial consideration, but represent the characters of those who are either born or raised to exalted stations, in their genuine light, either as deserving the imitation of sovereigns yet unborn, or hold them up on high as beacons, to caution the heedless royal mariners against those dangerous rocks which lie hidden in the tremendous bosom of the deep.

We shall lay before our readers that part which respects the late Queen of Denmark, as the most interesting to Britons. In the memorial of accusation against Struensee, the attorney general says.

“Count John Frederick Struensee has committed a crime of high treason, in that he, in a most daring and audacious manner, has undertaken to seduce the first lady in the kingdom, whose confidence he has obtained by the basest means, and extended the intimacy beyond the boundaries prescribed by nature, law and decency, to persons of different sexes, who cannot and must not be united. As I look upon this crime to be the greatest that can be committed by a subject against his sovereign, and as that which has precipitated Count Struensee into all his other crimes, I therefore mention it the first: and certainly it is a most daring and unparalleled crime, and of which history scarcely furnishes us with an example. I here refer the honourable judges to the different declarations of the witnesses upon oath, and particularly to that of her majesty's maid of honour; not in order to prove what is sufficiently known, but to shew, most sub-

missively, that Count Struensee has been the first instigator in this affair; that he, by his artifice and machinations, has endeavoured to bring about this intimacy; that he has taken all measures imaginable, to be made acquainted, and to be at hand, whenever an opportunity presented itself, to satisfy this impetuous and shameful passion; that the indifference with which he was treated at first by that high person, whose confidence he afterwards gained, sufficiently proves, that he was not led into temptation by the victim of his brutality, but that it was entirely his own inhuman audacity, his daring, subtle, and base intrigues, which brought about this fatal intimacy, and involved a royal personage in a participation of those crimes, which are forbidden by virtue, dignity, education, and decency; that for this very reason he is more punishable, as he has endeavoured to raise himself into power and places of honour, by bringing shame and ignominy on others. For the proofs of this most horrid crime committed by Count Struensee, I refer this most honourable commission to the following different proofs upon the records, viz.

1. To the first examination of both Counts, Struensee and Brandt, and professor Berger (sub Lit.--p.--) (*) in which Count Struensee has indeed confessed a particular intimacy and connection with the first lady in the kingdom; but as he has laid every thing to her account, and thinks both are excusable, particularly himself, as he had acted only in his medical capacity; and as there is no clear confession of the fact, I need not examine this minutely, nor seek for proofs in the answers of the other two prisoners, as there are much better proofs at hand. I therefore refer this honourable commission

2. To Count Struensee's fourth examination, (sub Lit.--p.--) where he, conscious of his sins, and moved by a sense of his guilt, has openly and freely confessed this high crime, as committed by him, with all the circumstances and informations necessary. The honourable judges have, in this important affair, required his signature to this confession, with which he has freely complied, I therefore refer

3. To Count John Frederick Struensee's
N O T E.

* This and the following references point to the records, or original papers, which were laid before the royal commission of inquisition, and which contain the cross examination of the different witnesses, &c.

own free, clear, and open confession of the perpetration of this high crime, as signed and authenticated by his own hand writing (sub Lit.--p.--) further,

4. To her majesty Queen C---ro--na M--t--da's declaration of the truth of Count Struensee's confession, dated Croneburgh, March 4th, 1772, (sub Lit.--p.--)

5. To Count Enewold Brandt's declaration concerning the conferences he had with Count Struensee on this affair, which proves the certain knowledge he had of this horrid crime (sub Lit.--p.--)

6. To professor Berger's declaration, which corroborates in every respect that of Count Enewold Brandt. (sub. Lit.--p.--)

7. To the declarations of her majesty's maids of honour, and their answers to the different questions during their examination. (sub Lit.--p.--)

Besides all these incontestible proofs, which are more than sufficient for the present purpose, I could refer this honourable committee to the declarations of many other witnesses, who have been examined upon oath, and which prove the audacious behaviour of this daring man; that he, without the least regard to decency, has pursued the most wicked courses, and what is horrible to think of, not contented with seducing royal virtue, his conduct seemed to declare, that he wished to make her infamy known to the whole world. His continually running backwards and forwards; his abrupt entrance into the queen's apartment, without being first announced, even at unseasonable hours; his long stay there, his coaching and riding with her majesty, even without any attendants, their frequent solitary walks in the gardens, his frequently giving and receiving presents, and many other circumstances in the declaration of these witnesses, sufficiently corroborate the truth of his own confession, so that he has by no means accused himself wrongfully.

Count Struensee has therefore been guilty of the crime of high treason, and that in the most aggravated light imaginable; he has openly and daringly violated the fidelity he owed his sovereign and royal master, and the respect and veneration due to her majesty.

He has, in a most daring and audacious manner, wrested from his royal master, that confidence, love, affection, and personal security, to which his majesty, after a solemn promise made in the presence of God, had a sole and exclusive clusive right. To arrive at dignities and power, he has sacrificed the unblemished honour of the royal house, and loaded it with shame and infamy. Where is the honest man, however low and indigent he may be, who would not think such treatment highly injurious to him?—But how keen and humiliating is the thought, that such an offence should be committed against the highest persons, against the anointed of God, against the dearest objects of the nation's affections!—O the horrid deed, which even the legislator seems not to have foreseen, and which cannot be mentioned with decency!—But, if it is an offence against the royal dignity to censure the king or queen for blameable actions, it is a much greater crime to those to load those royal personages with shame and infamy. It is unnecessary for me to dwell any longer upon this subject. The truth of the fact is sufficiently proved, the confession of the crime cannot be denied, and count Struensee may read his well-merited punishment in the Danish code of laws, book VI. chap. IV. Art. 1.

Count Struensee also knew of, advised, and assisted, in the disposal of her majesty's superb diamond nosegay, which was valued at above 40000 rixdollars, though known to be of much greater worth. This precious piece of jewels was sent to the state counsellor Waitz, at Hamburgh, with commission to sell it for 10000 rixdollars, notwithstanding he very well knew that it was part of her majesty's ornaments, the property of the crown, and of which no reigning queen of this kingdom should be deprived, as may be further seen by what appears upon the records (Lit.—p.—)

Count Struensee has therefore also, in this point, acted like a fraudulent traitor to his king, not only in causing such valuable jewels to be sold at so shameful a rate; but also, because there was no necessity for disposing of them, to the indelible disgrace of their owner.

To these charges counsellor Uhlidal said in the count's defence, "The sale of the diamond nosegay was entirely her majesty's doing, and as the count never knew otherwise than that his majesty had consented to the sale of this jewel, he never thought that he should be called to an account for it. What he has done in this affair, has been in obedience to the queen's commands; and as he has not derived the least advantage from it, it cannot be laid to his charge if the full value has not been paid for the jewel, which however has not yet been clearly proved.

"I hope, that every thing the attorney general has laid to the charge of count Struensee, will appear in a light very different to that in which he has placed it; and in case this should not prove sufficient for his justification, count Struensee flies to that mercy, which his majesty has been so often pleased to make him experience. He also throws himself at his majesty's feet, most humbly craving pardon for the crime the attorney-general has mentioned in the first section of his accusation, but which I have hitherto passed unnoticed. This is the only fault of all that have been laid to his charge, of which he knows himself guilty, being conscious, that in this he has offended his king and benefactor. He fears however, and laments with grief and sorrow, that his crime is too great, to hope for mercy; yet, if the consideration of the frailty of human nature, a true sense of his guilt, a sincere repentance, the flowing of unfeigned tears, and the fervent prayers he addresses to heaven for the prosperity of the king and the royal family---if these can excite any compassion in the royal bosom of his sovereign, whose bounty, humanity and benevolence will ever remain unparalleled--he hopes he shall not be thought wholly undeserving thereof."

Struensee, in the defence written by himself, hath only the following sentence relative to it, "It does not become me, nor is this a proper place to say any thing in defence of my moral conduct, or of whatever may be foreign to affairs of administration. I have therefore cautiously avoided saying any thing that might be considered as a justification of myself in that light."

The judges of the royal commission say in their judgment, "Though count John Frederick Struensee now stands lawfully and indubitably convicted, and has himself confessed, of having been guilty of a certain atrocious crime, at the bare recital of which human nature shudders, and which the faltering tongue seems unwilling to repeat;---a crime, which has sullied the unblemished honour, glory, and dignity of the royal house, and which, according to the established law, (Book VI. chap. iv. art. 1.) ought to be punished with all the aggravated horrors of death; though this crime alone is in every respect sufficient to justify the sentence he will speedily receive, yet we think it our duty cautiously to examine the validity of the other crimes laid to his charge by the attorney-general."

A Vindication

A Vindication of the New Oath of Allegiance, proposed to the Roman Catholics of Ireland. By a Steadfast Member of the Church of Rome. (Continued from our Mag. for January, p. 24.)

The Third Article of the Test

NEEDS no discussion, as the enormous impiety of the notions abjured therein is self-evident, viz. that it is lawful to murder or destroy kings, or any persons whatsoever, for, or under pretence of their being heretics, and that no faith is to be kept with heretics.

The Fourth Article of the Test,

From what has been already said, sets forth nothing but what may and ought to be abjured by every Catholic subject in these dominions.

The Fifth Article of the Test,

As to its general sense and meaning, cannot be objected to by any righteous Christian upon earth. Some indeed have picked a particular meaning out of it, and would fain persuade others that the following words, “without thinking that I am, or can be acquitted or absolved before God or man,” tend to contradict an established doctrine of the Roman catholic church, which is, that the church is invested with a power of examining into the nature of oaths, and of determining whether they be, or be not lawful, and, upon the whole, they say, it would be a dangerous presumption in a Roman catholic to decide for himself, and to affirm boldly, that every article of this oath is so clear to him, that he absolutely renounces all interposition of the church to examine into it, and to determine whether it be or be not lawful.

They insinuate moreover, that a Roman catholic ought rather to spurn the Test, crammed as it is with so many foul suspicions and indignities, offered to the holy doctrine of his church.

Answer. Here we are carried away from the plain road of common-sense, up to the clouds.—The fifth article of the test, according to its obvious sense, does not, either directly or indirectly, attempt to divest the Roman catholic church of any of its spiritual powers, such as that of pronouncing occasionally upon the lawfulness or unlawfulness of oaths, or upon any other point of christian doctrine and morality: on the contrary, the fifth article corresponds entirely with the doctrine of the catholic christian church; it rejects, condemns, and abjures what the said church censures and condemns. The catholic church ever did, and ever will condemn perjury, and all manner of deceitful equivocation and duplicity, in contracts between man and man, between the subject and the state. As she declares all absolutions and dispensations surreptitiously obtained, to be null and void before God and man, so she necessarily disavows as well the power as the impious practice of authorizing the commission of evil by previous dispensation, or of acquitting before God or man by subsequent absolution, any of her members from the obligations they contract in civil society by their honest and lawful oaths, such as that of civil allegiance to the established powers. The catholic church never forbids those solemn ties by which the subject's allegiance to the lawful sovereign, and the subject's own life and property is secured in the established courts of judicature.

In short, the whole tenor of the fifth article is rather levelled against the doctrines imputed to us by some of our dissenting brethren, as the act itself declares, than against the real principles and avowed doctrine of the Roman catholic church.

The legislature did not, could not mean to insult and affront such a respectable body of people as the Roman catholics of Ireland are. It declares, indeed, that such offensive doctrines are imputed to us, and, at the same time, it enables us to disavow them. Can this be called an indignity offered to our church? no.—It is rather a polite compliment paid to us by the legislature, which presumes, from all that has been written in favour of our church's doctrines, that we are impatiently waiting for a happy opportunity of renouncing those falsely imputed doctrines, and therefore is now graciously pleased to gratify us with the very object of our expectation. What opinion then must the legislature entertain of those Roman catholics who decline the test, and pretend, as a reason for so doing, that the form of the test is opprobrious to the Roman catholic church? why—that they are an humourful, and even insane body of people; who know not what they would be at; who quarrel, as the old saying is, like children, with their bread and butter; who, though they are doatingly fond of their political deformities, yet cannot endure the sight of them represented in the mirror of the test; and who, by their evasions, betray their own hearts, realize the doctrines imputed to them, which caused the test to be formed as it is, and which are so offensive, offensive, not only to our state, but to all the civil states in christendom.

Our government supposed that we would instantly, without any quibbling or cavilling, embrace the favourable opportunity of clearing ourselves and our holy mother church, from certain doctrines long imputed to us, and of proving to the world that our real tenets evidently tend to make the most faithful, the most loyal, the very best subjects, under every mode of government, and consequently entitle us to every act of humanity, to all the common rights and privileges of subjects.

It is not by any means sinful presumption in a Roman catholic, to declare his opinion or belief upon oath, no more than it is to declare his verdict upon a jury.—When he pronounces his verdict, he does not renounce the interposition either of church or state, to examine into it; and when he swears that he takes the oath without thinking that he is already absolved from the obligation of it by any previous, or that he can be absolved by any subsequent dispensation, he only certifies the sincerity of his heart, and the sanctity of his church's doctrine; thoroughly convinced as he is, that his holy mother church abhors all manner of double-dealing and hypocrisy, and fully persuaded that no spiritual or temporal power upon earth can authorize him to tell a lie, much less to involve himself in the horrid guilt of perjury.

The author of this objection openly declares in his remarks upon the test, that the simple oath of allegiance, may be safely taken, and that the Roman catholics of this kingdom are ready and willing to take it.

I beg to know, if they once took it, would they not think themselves bound down to observe it, so, as that no authority upon earth could acquit them from the obligation? at least, if they did not consider it in this light, when they were actually swearing, their oath would carry mental reservation with it; it would not correspond with the intention of the legislature: It would be a nugatory and deceitful oath, consequently injurious to both God and man. What an absurdity is here! to expect that government would accept my oath of allegiance, whilst I believe that my church may absolve me from it, upon any occasion. How could government trust in such a juror?

We are then necessarily supposed to swear according to the sense and meaning intended by the legislature. We abjure indeed a pretender who happens to be a Roman catholic, according to public report, and we swear to support the succession of his present majesty's family on the throne of these realms, not without pleasing hopes that he and his heirs, by law appointed, will from their moral virtues, as effectually promote the peace and happiness of all their subjects, as any Stuart that ever wore the British crown. Had James the II. been a protestant, and were his protestant male heir in possession of the British throne, we should equally swear true and faithful allegiance to him, as our forefathers did to Charles the I. whose religion, however adverse to popery, never cooled their loyal zeal, never lessened their attachment to his royal person.

* But to give a more precise answer to the last objection, such as it is set forth in the Hibernian Magazine of October, 1775:

It was hinted before, that a Roman catholic, by abjuring the dispensing power of his church in this oath of allegiance, can give no offence to her authority, whilst she herself disavows as well the power as the practice of acquitting her members from the obligations they contracted by their honest and lawful oaths.—Nor can it be said, with even the least colour of reason or common sense, that he abjures also explicitly the dispensing power of the state, when he declares upon this oath, that he believes he cannot be acquitted from the obligations he contracts, by any authority whatsoever. Because, if he swears honestly, he must swear according to the true sense, meaning and intention of the legislature which proposes the oath, and which is necessarily supposed to reserve to itself that dispensing power (which it allows to no other) in all its grants and interdicts, in all its public edicts.

A familiar example will make this supposed herculean objection to appear a mere quibble. I promise upon oath to pay unto A.B. the sum of five pounds, value received. No power upon earth can acquit me, able to pay, from this obligation, but A. B. himself. This oath is as inviolable to me, as if I had added in the form of my oath those expressions above-mentioned, which are so metaphysically and pompously amplified upon, in the objection, “without thinking that I am or can be acquitted from my obligation by any authority whatsoever.” It may indeed be objected with some colour of reason, that these words are superfluous in my oath; but however, may serve to exprefs fully the fincerity of my intentions to a creditor, who from the prejudices of education may fancy, that my church, the Roman catholic, deals out abfolutions and difpenfations of this kind.

Nor can theſe ſame words, which are declared in the objection to be ſo tremendous in their conſequences, expoſe the juror to any future inextricable perplexity, to any political error, or any moral evil, whiſt he fulfils his engagements with the ſtate, to which he has plighted his troth, and whiſt the ſtate remains on the ſame footing it now is. Becauſe, as it was from the beginning, ſo it now is, and ſo it ſhall be to the world's end, a ſacred truth, that an honeſt lawful oath is inviolable : And becauſe, if any alterations or revolutions ſhould happen hereafter in the ſtate, the teſt of courſe will be equally altered, and then, my prior oath neceſſarily becomes null and void by the ſupreme authority of the legiſlative powers in being.

But thoſe Roman catholics who now reject the teſt, from a pious delicacy as it were, from private views, or from a ſelfiſh attachment to private opinion, are not perhaps ſo ſecure from falling into a labyrinth of political errors, and moral evil. For they muſt know from the tenor of the late enabling act, that by declining the teſt, they fruſtrate the kind intentions of government : They leave ſcandalous and baſtard doctrines, ſuch as maſſacres, perjury, gun-powder-plots, &c. at the door of their holy mother-church, as was remarked before, and thus, they may wilfully be the occaſional cauſe, of all the temporal loſſes this kingdom, and their catholic brethren in it, muſt unavoidably ſuſtain, by a continuance of the popery-laws.

It is very well known, that in catholic countries, oaths are frequently taken, not only for the ſafeguard of the ſtate, but alſo for the maintenance of private opinions, antient rights and privileges, ſtatutes, and diſcipline in univerſities, colleges and corporations. It is equally well known, that in thoſe places, certain opinions are abjured, and that without ſuch a previous abjuration, the privileges, whether lucrative or honorary, cannot be enjoyed.

It is not leſs certain, that many good chriſtians, as delicate in their principles as any Iriſh conſcience in this kingdom, take theſe oaths, without any ſcruple or hesitation : At the ſame time, it cannot be ſaid, that they renounce by ſuch oaths, any right that church or ſtate may have to examine into them, though they bind themſelves down in a moſt ſolemn manner to adhere to their oath. They have indeed moral ſenſe to guide them, and a ſufficient weight of authority to convince them, that they may take the oath with a ſafe conſcience, that is to ſay, without the leaſt violation of faith or good morals, thinking all this while, that no power upon earth can authorize them to break it.

Now, when all the catholic divines in chriſtendom unaniſmouſly agree, that the doctrines, opinions, notions (by whatſoever name we pleaſe to call them) abjured in the teſt, are not at all tenets of the Roman catholic religion : Why ſhould we not all correſpond with the ſtate in abjuring them? Why ſhould we be in any pain, why ſhould we not be totally indifferent about them? For, let what will happen after taking the oath, our faith and good morals are ſecure ; and to boot, our minds will reſt ſatisfied, that we have left nothing undone, that may help to extinguiſh the old jealousies, ſuſpicions and diſtruſt, which have hitherto ſubſiſted between us and the ſtate. Were there no other reaſon for abjuring ſuch opinions, does not this comfortable perſuaſion, this heart-felt ſatisfaction, carry more weight, more convincing evidence with it, than a particular harſh-founding opinion, ſo thickly ſurrounded with a miſt of ſchool duſt, that it is no longer a topic of common ſerious converſation?

But perhaps, I have not as yet caught the right meaning of the objection.—The author certainly is too enlightened, to ſpeak here for himſelf. It is not about his own conſcience that he is ſolicitous ; he ſtoops with tendereſs to the relief of weak minds. He preſumes there are ſome few in the kingdom, who would not chooſe to debar themſelves by this teſt from action, in caſe of one revolution more, at the coming of a pretended Meſſiah for the redemption of poor, dejected, powerleſs Iſrael.

He imagines, that thoſe deluded expectants, at ſuch a critical juncture, after taking the preſent oath, would feel the painful ſting of conſcience, would then piteouſly cry out to their church for abſolution or diſpenſation, which is precluded by the fifth article of the teſt. He may think it more eligible, that they ſhould decline the teſt, than expoſe themſelves to the temptation of breaking through it hereafter, when they might fancy that the old cauſe of hereditary indeſeizable right and true religion, called for help from their right arm.

Certainly, this reluctance, with regard to the test, is not a slender proof of Irish catholic sincerity, whilst such a torrent of perjury and corruption prevails throughout the nation. It is a demonstration of the sacred light in which they view an oath : It is a glorious profession of their holy church's doctrine upon oaths ; it is an impregnable bold-fast, on which the state may safely depend, when once they comply with the test : It is a brazen wall, stronger than that in Tartary between the state and its foes, as well internal as external.

But, I am pretty sure, I firmly believe, there are few or none such expectants in this kingdom. Were there any such, they should fly the land, separate themselves from us, as being so many political schismatics.

In this enlightened age, knight errantry is no more. We are no longer like Jews, living in groundless expectation of a pretended Messiah. Our civil Messiah is come, long since : His throne is established by the supreme authority of the British state. To him we swear allegiance, with equal cheerfulness and safety of conscience : We are sincere in the oath : We exclude, we disavow all dispensing power, except that which as necessarily inheres in the state, as it does in a lord to set free his vassals : in a master to acquit his indentured apprentice ; in contracting parties to dissolve a compact by mutual consent. We are certain, our church would not countenance the violation of a lawful oath. Our oath of allegiance to a protestant king bylaw established, is as sacred and as binding, as if he were a Roman catholic ; and why not, as well as any other contract or covenant, that passes in civil life between men of different persuasions ? True religion never interferes with common honesty.

Moreover, what could we expect from this same pretended Messiah ? The redemption of Israel ! Nonsense !—Its utter destruction, perhaps.

Should he attempt what his grandfather did, what would be the consequence ? No meddling with edged tools.—Strada, I think, says it—Quoties mota est religionis anchora, toties fructuat Republice Navis.—An established religion is like the anchor of a ship : Attempt to dislodge it, and you set the whole ship of the nation afloat.

Those who have got any estate or fortune by the excluded family, may pity unfortunate royalty, without incurring the guilt of rebellion or disaffection to their lawful sovereign.

Those who got nothing by them, but ruined estates and broken hearts, may bewail their own misfortunes, without proceeding so far as to curse their origin. Their now mendicant posterity indeed, may prosper, under the protection of a king, more able, and perhaps more willing to make the wretched happy.

The popery laws sprung from the seed of the abdicated king. Welcome be the will of God—we have borne the scourge a long while ! Poor innocent sufferers !

And shall we amuse ourselves with flattering ideas of a pompous establishment of the Roman catholic religion ? Ah ! we know not what we ask—Such times of peace and exultation, may turn out to us, the bitterest of all bitters. Our solid comfort is, that under any king, any government, we can serve God, and earn an everlasting reward, which no king, no government can wrest from us.

Such ever will be the sentiments of a sound understanding and feeling heart, whilst Henry VIII. that once famous papist, and first called defender of the faith, lives upon record—and that such is the catholic sense of the kingdom, none will deny, but those who are unacquainted with men and books, or quacks, who deal out their old nostrums, without feeling and reflecting upon the pulse of the nation.

Now if, in this vindication of the test, nothing has been advanced, but what is perfectly agreeable to the real principles of the Roman catholic religion, surely we may hope, from the humanity of our dissenting fellow-subjects, that all old jealousies will be laid aside, according to the gracious intention of the legislature in the late act ; and that the parliament of this nation, will not continue to punish an innocent posterity, for the excessive zeal of their forefathers, whose sanguine attachment to their legal sovereigns, and antient religion, led them into those political errors, which, like original sin, brought such severe penalties upon all their descendants.

Yes, we must hope, that our redemption from the curse of the law, under the best of kings, under a mild government, and an enlightened senate, is near at hand. We must hope, that the supreme powers of the state, will at length confer upon the Roman catholics of this kingdom, a civil kind of baptism, will bury in oblivion the old papist, and give them a new birth in George the third : Thus, they shall be for the glory of his auspicious reign, so many regenerated, true, faithful, loyal, and useful members of the civil community : Not, as they are at present, lopped off from the body by the severity of the laws, and withering for want of that share of the vital juice, which common equity entitles them to.

Then let it, in the name of wisdom and humanity, circulate through the nation; it will, it must soon diffuse a fine bloom throughout the land, and render Great-Britain still more formidable to all her natural enemies.

The English Theatre.

Drury-lane.

BEN Johnson's comedy, called Epicane, or The Silent Woman, was revived on the 13th instant, at this theatre, under the immediate direction of Mr. Colman; who conceived that, if properly got up, it could not fail of affording high entertainment to a modern audience: how far this idea was well founded, will appear from a slight review of the comedy.

The fable of the piece, like those of the old bards, is trifling, broken, and confused—that of Old Morose being gull-ed into a settlement of his estate upon his nephew, &c. by True-wit's designs; who, from the beginning to the end of the piece, is employed in the most unnatural stratagems to effect it.—As to character, notwithstanding the traditional observation of Mr. Dryden, who tells us, “that a character of this whimsical nature really existed in the author's days,” we think Morose a most absurd caricatura, the offspring of the poet's own brain.—But even giving Ben Johnson his ground in this particular, he is highly censurable for not preserving it from that dramatic batbos, in which we frequently lose every trait of the intended character; for at times he has forgotten to let him be affected even by the most powerful noises.—Sir Am. La Foole and Sir John Daw are evident copies of Master Matthew and Master Stephen, and Cutbeard is the shadow of Brainworm, in Every Man in his Humour: True-wit is the only one like a finished character; and that is exceedingly overcharged, to produce—no effect whatever. A part of Tom Otter is very humorous, particularly in the drunken scene, with his bull, bear, and horse, where he gives a description of his wife's taking herself to pieces over night, and next day being put together like a German clock:—but the merit of this part of the character is destroyed by the absurdity of the succeeding one, where this sneaking driveller, after going off almost dead drunk, is ordered by True-wit to come on in the habit of a parson, and to harangue in Latin for half an hour, before Morose, with Cutbeard, (a pretended doctor of law) respecting the numberless causes and grounds for a divorce, in order further to gull the old man.—Dauphine and Clerimont are two poor animals indeed, the mere puppets of True-wit, who moves them at will:—Epicane is of the same stamp. As for the college ladies, which were the witty Coterie of their days, how has the poet coloured them? Why, he has given us four insignificant females in chalk, without a single stroke to distinguish them from any insensibles of that sex, and moves them on and off the stage, without producing the least effect. Mrs. Otter is an exception; for she gives us a tolerable likeness of the virago of those times.

As to situation, the only one attempted in this play, is in that scene where La Foole and Sir John Daw are so far the dupes of True-wit's waggery, as to fear the wrath of each other, and therefore consent the one to be kick'd, the other to be hood-winked and have his nose pulled by his supposed antagonist; and this for the diversion of Dauphine and True-wit, who perform the operations.—This is farcical to the highest degree, not to say improbable; but Ben Johnson never suffered his gulls once to open an eye when he had destined them to fall into a trap.

We have ventured to speak freely of this piece in its original state as it strikes us, uninfluenced by great names, notwithstanding Mr. Dryden himself styles it the first comedy in the English language. As to the style of Johnson's writing, compared to his cotemporaries, it appears much more correct and classical than theirs:—In this he triumphed not a little, and that even personally over Shakespeare, who, in erudition, was confessedly his inferior.—Let it be remarked, however, that the former seldom wrote a single page without various close imitations from the Greek and Roman authors;—but Shakespeare having neither his learned resources, nor his pedantry, was forced to fly to Nature's simple volume, and borrow from her pages:—hence, the superior immortality of his genius.

Let us now examine what alterations has this comedy undergone, in order to adapt it to the taste of the present times, and as performed on the before mentioned evening.

Mr. Colman's alterations of the Epitaph consist only of several judicious cuttings and advantageous transpositions; for we do not find that he has given us any additions, at least no material ones; this perhaps from the veneration he bears the memory of Old Ben.—It is to be regretted, however, that from that, or any other false delicacy, the piece should have been brought out with so much of the rust of antiquity remaining about it, when it is well known Mr. Colman is so capable of doing it infinite service, if he chose to sit down to it. What a very small part of the audience, for instance, knew that Ned Whiting and George Stone were two celebrated Bears, who went in those days by the names of their respective owners.—We do not see the necessity of retaining the passage at all; but if Mr. Colman thought so, it was certainly as easy as necessary to make it discernible to the audience.—We could point out many of those obsolete phrases in this piece, which might readily be spared, as we do not find that much wit or humour would be lost in the omission.

Upon the whole, we cannot esteem this a striking comedy, even with the assistance it has now received—the fine manner in which it is certainly got up, and the great expence which the managers have been at in habiting the whole Dramatis Personæ in splendid and characteristic old English dresses.

All the actors, except Mr. King and Mr. Parsons, performed but indifferently. Bensley is the worst Old Man we ever saw. He presents the countenance of a sickly old woman; and the uniform goggle of his eye, by which he means to express infirmity and distress, is the look of a man in anguish from the choleric. Mr. Palmer, Mr. Brereton, and Mr. Davis, have a bloated vulgarity about them, which should ever deter the manager from assigning them the parts of cavaliers or men of fashion. Baddeley, as usual, over-did his part; and Mr. Yates, as usual, was not very perfect in his.

Covent-Garden.

On Monday evening the 15th instant, the tragedy of Douglas was played at this theatre to a very numerous audience, which assembled chiefly with a view to support Mr. Webster*, a theatrical adventurer, who made his first appearance in the character of Young Norval. His person is rather elegant, his voice is full and harmonious, his pronunciation distinct and correct, and his delivery graceful and unembarrassed. Those are his excellencies, and considering it was his first performance, he seems to possess them in a degree far superior to the various candidates for theatrical fame which the managers of both houses have brought forward for some years past.—On the other hand, he was awkward, and in some parts unanimated. His arms are too long, or he flung them about in a very disgusting manner. He seemed to express the sense of his Author much better than his own feelings. His voice, though full, wants variety and modulation; not but on some occasions he managed it with infinite grace and judgment: but if this want of variety of tones and extent of voice, which is so indispensably necessary to constitute a first-rate actor, be not the effect of nature, the public may behold with less anxiety their decayed veterans giving nightly proofs of their increasing infirmities, and quick approaching theatrical dissolution. We would venture to pronounce with more confidence on the merits and demerits of this young man, if either the part he played, or a first appearance, would permit us. His friends will serve him more effectually by being less prodigal of their plaudits, and by permitting the public to judge for itself.

Opera-House.

On Tuesday night the 9th inst. a new Opera called Il Bacio, written by Mr. Badini, was performed at this theatre.—The Author has prefixed the following humorous motto to his performance:

*To-night we'll shew to madam, and to miss, were) by Mr. and Mrs. Barry for their theatrical child, for some time, who have taken great pains in training him up for the stage. Mr. Barry was so confident of Mr. Webster's success, that he prevented him from engaging with the managers at a stipulated and inferior price for the season, and desired him to insist upon a certain sum for every night he played. Mr. Webster has been offered 1200l. for the season to sing at the Pantheon. He is expected to appear shortly in Macheath in the Beggar's Opera, and is reckoned to have as good a bass voice as any man in England.
That nothing is more harmless than a kiss.*

The

The story is as follows :

DON John De Sordini, a Roman nobleman, who, notwithstanding his deafness, has an extraordinary passion for music, plays on the violoncello, and thinks himself a great composer, hires a maid-servant called Zuccherini, supposed daughter of one of his farmers. This young girl possesses so many good qualities, that her master grows passionately fond of her, and takes it into his head to bestow on his maid an accomplished education. Zuccherini's improvements add so much fuel to the amorous fire of Don John, that he determines to marry her ; which determination breeds a great disturbance in Don John's family ; for count Pocatesta, a young man of high rank, being betrothed to Clarice, who is believed Don John's daughter, hearing of the intended marriage of his future father-in-law, threatens to break off his own match with Clarice. " The Pocatesta's, says he, are the most illustrious family in the world ; it is well known that they always held the most conspicuous places and dignities ; therefore I will not fully the splendor of my noble birth by a mean connection." This, however, not altering the resolution of Don John, Clarice, who finds herself crossed in her love, wreaks her resentment on Zuccherini, whom she takes to be the source of her disappointment. Now poor Zuccherini meets with very ill usage in the house of Don John ; but the greatest of her vexations is love, which begins to start up in her tender heart.

She happened to see a young gentleman called Fidamante ; and the first instant she saw him, she says that his looks made on her mind one of those everlasting impressions expressed by the word Sympathy. Fidamante felt in that moment the same tender emotions for Zuccherini ; but Don John being extremely jealous, the lovers had never an opportunity of declaring their mutual feelings to one another. Fidamante, however, being an industrious young man, introduces himself into the house of Don John in the character of a language-master ; then in the character of a certain celebrated musician, under pretence of attending Don John's concert ; after which he assumes the character of an undertaker.

But all these contrivances not being sufficient to bring his scheme to a happy conclusion, he, always by the assistance of Trappolino, a valet, conceals himself in the case of a new violoncello which is brought to Don John ; and in Don John's absence persuades Zuccherini to elope with him. She is extremely glad of the opportunity, but expresses some fears about a barbarous law, the tenor of which she explains in the following terms : " You are unacquainted (says she) with a cruel law we have in this country. If any woman, either single or married, is found tete-a-tete with a strange person, she is immediately put to death, and the suspicion alone is sufficient to convict the guilty ; for we have a temple, called the Mouth of Truth, whither the female accused is carried to take her oath. If she forswears herself, the Mouth of Truth, by an extraordinary prodigy, incloses the woman's hand, upon which she is generally condemned to die."

Zuccherini's love, however, gets the better of her fears, but the moment she is eloping, Don John comes in, and secures her. He has seen her gallant, but could not stop him. Fidamante finds means to convey a note to Zuccherini, in which he advises her to be firm in denying the charge, and to be under no apprehensions about the oath which she will be obliged to take in the Mouth of Truth ; for he will go himself to the temple, and there appear as a madman, and give her a kiss ; after which she must swear, that nobody ever touched her except the madman, who gave her the kiss. She follows the instructions of her lover, and Don John is thunderstruck, when he sees that the Mouth of Truth does not inclose the hand of Zuccherini. The spectators begin to call in question the veracity of Don John, who, to make his charge good, takes his oath that he has seen Zuccherini embraced by another man besides the madman ; whereupon the Mouth of Truth incloses his hand, and the judges condemn Don John either to marry Zuccherini, or to renounce to her all his fortune. Clarice knowing that the only way to save Don John is to take away Zuccherini's evidence, hires some ruffians to murder her ; but they have not the heart to execute their savage design. Zuccherini finds her lover, and gives him her hand ; and Don John at last discovers, by a very extraordinary circumstance, that Zuccherini is his own daughter, and Clarice the daughter of his farmer, &c.

Mr. Badini has evidently founded his plot on the ancient test of chastity in use among the Greeks and Romans, called the Os Veritatis, or the Mouth of Truth. It was a custom with them, when any virgin virgin was suspected of impurity, to oblige her to put her hand and arm into the open mouth of a large brazen head, and then swear she was innocent; if she perjured herself, the mouth, by some means or other, was contrived to close, and she was condemned to die. This religious artifice was transmitted to Rome from Greece; as in the largest square of Athens there formerly stood a large pile of architecture called the Red Column, under which the head of an enormous brazen serpent gaped for the purpose just mentioned. Considering the serious mummery of this circumstance, Mr. Badini has made it the cause of a wonderful variety of pleasant and entertaining scenes in his opera.

The character of Don John is truly comic, and well sustained throughout, although it occasionally borders upon farce. Zuccherini and Fidamante are also well drawn. Upon the whole, Il Bacio may be heard with patience, even by an audience who have not (as Lord Chesterfield advises when a person goes to the opera-house) left their reason at home.

The music of Il Bacio is the composition of Signor Vento, and does him great credit. It is, in general, very happily adapted to the words.—Some of Sestini's airs are enchanting; and the finale at the end of the third act, admirable. Perhaps no character ever afforded a composer more scope for the exertion of his genius than that of Don Giovanni; and it is but justice to acknowledge, that Vento has made a good use of the opportunity.

The performers in general acquitted themselves well; Sestini and Trebbi with singular excellence.

Masquerade Intelligence.

On Monday evening, Jan. 8, Mrs. Cornelys held her second masqued ball for this season at Carlisle House; and though it was not quite so numerous as that of Monday the 18th of December last, it was, considered all together, very agreeable and entertaining. There were less dominos in proportion than have lately appeared on such an occasion. The principal characters were, Hecate and Four Witches, who danced with characteristic humour, and sung a ballad written for the purpose. A Highland Seer, and a rustic Lowlander, both really fræe the North, if we could guess either from dialect or deportment. The old man seemed to have met with some of his native whiskey in the rooms where the collation was served, as he was foi in a short time after the doors of those apartments were opened. An American rifleman, good in dress only. A groupe of Parades for the Comic Mirror, consisting of an Andrew, with his master and two young mistresses. The Zany, an excellent mask, and the character well supported. One of his mistresses appeared to be as frolicksome and free as the young women belonging to the shew folks usually are. Two Squire Grooms, lifeless and inanimate as a couple of broke-down racers. A brace of Harlequins; one sprightly and actively pantomimical; the other, a mere figure of the patched-coat hero. An Old Man and Woman tolerably kept up. A pair of female Ballad Singers, properly habited, and maintained well, till the hour of revelry sanctified a violation of character. A Grand Turk, the valiant captain R. consequently a good figure; but as the captain at the last masquerade got most violently drunk for the good of Old England, in conformity to the Author's colouring of Razor in The Upholterer, he now convinced the company that, like many other assumers of feigned characters, he was a mere mannerist, and therefore got as violently drunk pour l'honneur de grand Turc. Two Waggoners, one all alive and merry, and the other so fatigued with the business of his character, that he fell fast asleep on a sofa as soon as the rooms opened, and remained there perfectly composed when we left him at six in the morning. A good Chimney-sweeper, an indifferent Hawthorn, and a bad Nabob. Three figures personating a Capuchin, a Soeur of the Hospital, and a Girl on the Charity foundation, begging pour l'Hotel des Enfants trouves. A fat Carmelite. An excellent Child of mature growth, with a muslin frock. A Man in Woman's clothes, with a set of features so regular, that we were somewhat in doubt whether the figure was of the feminine or the epicæne gender, 'till the barbed chin shewed its virility. It, or rather he, was certainly the best masculine-feminine ever seen.—Two Lawyers, both good masques as to appearance, but one of them shamefully ignorant of the technical terms of his profession. Several sailors. A witless Linco. A real Mungo. Three University Scholars. A disgusting Female in dishabille; and, as usual, a number of bearers of the old hackneyed stage dresses. Some few of the masks were richly ornamented with jewels; but, as before, there did not appear appear to be any very great number of the nobility present. Lord Lyttleton seemed determined that all present should know that one Lord was in company, and therefore walked about unmasked very early in the evening. He was beset by the full-grown female Child, who rallied him, with some pleasantry, on his amours. The supper-rooms afforded great plenty of viands and wines, on a similar plan to that of the last masquerade. The company expressed universal satisfaction; and though, as before, frolic and fun were more predominant than either wit or wisdom, it may fairly be said to have been a very joyous evening.

The following hand-bill was given away by Hecate—and the ballad was sung by the Andrew to the groupe from the Comic Mirror:

“Just whisk’d over in a whirlwind, from Scandinavia, the celebrated sister Witches, Sallino, Marino, Fenino, Pegino, and Tabino, who propose dancing this evening the famous Lapland Quadrille, as performed before all the Sovereigns of the universe, and to the astonishment of all beholders.

ANOTHER masqued ball was given at the Pantheon on Wednesday evening, the 24th, when it was expected the company would be numerous and elegant. Either the severity of the weather, or the thinness of the town, prevented the former expectation from being completed; the latter was amply fulfilled. The great room was finely illuminated; and although the disposition of the lights in the dome was of itself beautiful and striking, it acquired an additional effect from their being of the same colour. There was in consequence a more noble appearance of splendor than can ever be produced by the childish variegation of red, blue, green, and yellow lamps. The company was rather of the medley kind; some men of character, and some women of virtue; but the majority was composed of peers, pimps, prudes, and prostitutes; their number increased very rapidly after twelve; previous to that hour, there were not above three hundred masks present.

The two best masks at the Pantheon were a brace of Israelites, whose language and dress very happily corresponded. Among those who formed the second rank, were a little chubby musical Harlequin; a Gipsy, with a child at her back; a tolerable Chimney-sweeper; six Indians of different nations; a short and a tall Quaker; the valiant Jack R—, as Mrs. Cole, who got as piously drunk as ever Bawd did; the Character of Christmas, well supported by counsellor D—y; three of the Weird Sisters; two Augustine Fryars; a Cordelier; an Austrian Chasseur; a Cricketer; a Chinese; a French doctor; a Lord Chalkstone, without gouty feet; an excellent Hermit; a good Waggoner; a tolerable Barrister; and a very seaman-like Sailor.

Among the Dominos some few of the females were brilliantly attired—but many appeared without any other ornament than that which nature had blest them with—a beautiful bosom. One Lady (who was habited in a fancy dress of light-coloured blue velvet, edged with a broad gold fringe, and wore a veil) bore a countenance so animating and charming, that she rivetted the attention, or rather the admiration, of all who approached her. Mr. Vernon, Mr. Reinhold, and several other musical gentlemen who were present, at different times entertained the company with catches, glees, and airs.—Upon the whole, the night was as merrily spent as plenty of spirits without an attempt at wit would allow. In the early part of the evening the masks seemed to have their tongues frost bound. After supper the gift of speech was pretty apparent, and a great deal was said, though—but little to the purpose.

Comic Mirror.

A NEW Piece entitled, O Tempora, O Mores! was performed among the entertainments of this place on Saturday evening the 6th instant.—This piece exhibited a striking picture of the manners in 1589 and 1776.—When the curtain draws up, Lady English and Mrs. Plumbtree are discovered waiting for Sir John English, who presently after returns from the parliament-house.—Sir John complains of the great hardships and inconvenience of parliamentary business, and murmurs that he is obliged to undergo so much fatigue—when the mayor and corporation of the borough he serves for, are bribed by two gentlemen of equal fortune with himself to excuse them from being elected.—This gives rise to a number of reflections on the licentiousness of that age—and they declare, from the queen's being so extravagant as to wear silk stockings, and other innovations, that they tremble for the consequences of what will happen a century or two afterwards. At this instant a figure of Aristophanes, in the Devil upon Two Sticks, passes up through a trap-door, and tells Sir John, that in that mirror (which he holds in his hand) he may behold what order of beings will possess this kingdom at the period before-mentioned; he then conveys him to an elegant dressing-room, where a modern valet-de-chambre and lady's woman are waiting for their master and mistress, who presently arrive, one from the parliament-house, and the other from the masquerade. The gentleman, for making too free with the Abigail, is very severely taken to task by his lady; when an altercation ensues, which ends in a determined separation. This the audience finds was a matter concerted between the lady and her woman, and the gentleman and his valet-de chambre. After some proper reflections on the difference in the manners of the two ages, the curtain drops.

On Saturday the 20th instant, another new piece, called The Levee of Aristophanes, was performed among these entertainments, which consists of a succession of Bon Mots, many of which have been given to the world as the impromptus of the above ingenious gentleman, and other celebrated wits. These were arranged in the manner of a dialogue between Aristophanes and certain Lords, upon a morning visit to him, and had a most pleasing effect.

Upon being asked what he intends for the subject of his new piece, he answers, that he shall introduce the Male Child lately made in France. This produced many laughable remarks, with which the audience were very much entertained.

A Fragment from Sterne, after the Manner of Rabelais.

C H A P. I.

Sheaving two Things; first, what a Rabelaisic Fellow Longinus Rabelaius is, and secondly, how cavalierly he begins his Book.

MY dear and thrice reverend brethren, as well archbishops and bishops, as the rest of the inferior clergy! would it not be a glorious thing, if any man of genius and capacity amongst us for such a work, was fully bent within himself, to sit down immediately and compose a thorough-stitched system of the Kerukopædia, fairly setting forth, to the best of his wit and memory, and collecting for that purpose all that is needful to be known, and understood of that art!—Of what art, cried Panurge? Good God, answered Longinus (making an exclamation, but taking care at the same time to moderate his voice) why, of the art of making all kinds of your theological, hebdomodical, rostrumical, humdrumical what d'ye call 'ems—I will be shot, quoth Epistemon, if all this story of thine of a roasted horse, is simply more than S———Sausages? quoth Panurge. Thou hast fallen twelve feet and about five inches below the mark, answered Epistemon, for I hold them to be sermons—which said word (as I take the matter) being but a word of low low degree, for a book of high rhetoric—Longinus Rabelaius was fore-minded to usher and lead into his dissertation, with as much pomp and parade as he could afford; and for my own part, either I know no more of Latin than my horse, or the Kerukopædia is nothing but the art of making 'em—And why not, quoth Gymnast, of preaching them when we have done?—Believe me, dear souls, this is half in half—and if some skilful body would but put us in a way to do this to some tune—Thou wouldst not have them chanted surely, quoth Triboulet, laughing?—No, nor canted neither, quoth Gymnast, crying;—but what I mean, my friends, says Longinus Rabelaius (who is certainly one of the greatest criticks in the western world, and as Rabelaius a fellow as ever existed) what I mean, says he, interrupting them both, and resuming his discourse, is this, that if all the scattered rules of the Kerukopædia could be but once carefully collected into one code, as thick as Panurge's head, and the whole cleanly digested—(pooh, says Panurge, who felt himself aggrieved) and bound up, continued Longinus, by way of a regular institute, and then put into the hands of every licensed preacher in Great Britain and Ireland, just before he began to compose, I maintain it—I deny it flatly, quoth Panurge—What? answered Longinus Rabelaius with all the temper in the world.

CHAP. II.

In which the Reader will begin to form a Judgment, of what an Historical, Dramatical, Anecdotal, Allegorical, and Comical Kind of a Work he has got hold of.

HOMENAS who had to preach next Sunday (before God knows whom) knowing nothing at all of the matter, was all this while at it as hard as he could drive in the very next room:—for having fouled two clean sheets of his own, and being quite stuck fast in the entrance upon his third general division, and finding himself unable to get either forwards or backwards with any grace—“Curse it,” says he, (thereby excommunicating every mother's son who should think differently) “why may not a man lawfully call in for help in this, as well as any other human emergency?”—So without any more argumentation, except starting up and nimming down from the top shelf but one, the second volume of Clark—though without any felonious intention in so doing, he had begun to clap me in (making a joint first) five whole pages, nine round paragraphs, and a dozen and a half of good thoughts all of a row; and because there was a confounded high gallery—was transcribing it away like a little devil.—Now, quoth Homenas to himself, “though I hold all this to be fair and square, yet, if I am found out, there will be the deuce and all to pay.—“Why are the bells ringing backwards, you lad? what is all that crowd about, honest man? Homenas was got upon doctor Clark's back, fir—and what of that, my lad? Why an please you, he has broke his neck, and fractured his skull, and befoiled himself into the bargain, by a fall from the pulpit two stories high.” Alas! poor Homenas! Homenas has done his business!—Homenas will never preach more while breath is in his body.—No, faith, I shall never again be able to tickle it off as I have done. I may sit up whole winter nights baking my blood with hectic watchings, and write as solid as a father of the church—or, I may sit down whole summer days evaporating my spirits into the finest thoughts, and write as florid as a mother of it.—In a word, I may compose myself off my legs, and preach till I burst—and when I have done, it will be worse than if not done at all.—“Pray, Mr. Such-a-one, who held forth last Sunday?” “Doctor Clark, I trow:” says one. “Pray what doctor Clark,” says a second? “Why Homenas's doctor Clark,” quoth a third. “O rare Homenas!” cries a fourth; “your servant Mr. Homenas,” quoth a fifth.—“'Twill be all over with me, by heav'n—I may as well put the book from whence I took it.”—Here Homenas burst into a flood of tears, which falling down helter skelter, ding dong, without any kind of intermission for six minutes and almost twenty-five seconds, had a marvellous effect upon his discourse; for the aforesaid tears, do you mind, did so temper the wind that was rising upon the aforesaid discourse, but falling for the most perpendicularly, and hitting the spirits at right angles, which were mounting horizontally all over the surface of his harangue, they not only played the devil and all with the sublimity—but moreover the said tears, by their nitrous quality, did so refrigerate, precipitate, and hurry down to the bottom of his soul, all the unsavory particles which lay fermenting (as you saw) in the middle of his conception, that he went on in the coolest and chafest stile (for a soli-loquy) that ever mortal man uttered.

"This is really and truly a very hard case," continued Homenas to himself.—Panurge, by the bye, and all the company in the next room hearing all along every syllable he spoke; for you must know, that notwithstanding Panurge had opened his mouth as wide as he could for his blood, in order to give a round answer to Longinus Rabelaius's interrogation, which concluded the last chapter—yet Homenas's rhetoric had poured in so like a torrent, slap-dash through the wainscot amongst them, and happening at that uncritical crisis, when Panurge had just put his ugly face into the above-said posture of defence—that he stopt short—he did indeed, and though his head was full of matter, and he had screwed up every nerve and muscle belonging to it, till all cried crack again, in order to give a due projectile force to what he was going to let fly, full in Longinus Rabelaius's teeth, who sat over against him—yet for all that, he had the continuance to contain himself, for he stopt short, I say, without uttering one word, except z . . . ds.—Many reasons may be assigned for this, but the most true, the most strong, the most hydrostatical, and the most philosophical reason, why Panurge did not go on, was—that the forementioned torrent did so drown his voice, that he had none left to go on with.—God help him, poor fellow! so he stopt short (as I have told you before) and all the time Homenas was speaking he said not another word, good or bad, but stood gaping, and staring, like what you please—so that the break, marked thus—which Homenas's grief had made in the middle of his discourse, which he could no more help than he could fly—produced no other change in the room where Longinus Rabelaius, Epistemon, Gymnast, Triboulet, and nine or ten more honest blades had got kerukopedizing together, but that it gave time to Gymnast to give Panurge a good squashing chuck under his double chin; which Panurge taking in good part, and just as it was meant by Gymnast, he forthwith shut his mouth—and gently sitting down upon a stool, though somewhat excentrically, and out of neighbours row, but listening, as all the rest did, with might and main, they plainly and distinctly heard every syllable of what you will find recorded in the very next chapter.

Alas! poor Yorick! thou wilt write no more chapters.

Character of Mr. Weston, the Actor.

TO mention Mr. Weston as an excellent comedian, would be paying him but a trifling compliment: we must consider him something farther. Untutored, either at school or by a taste for literature, he rushed upon the world as an unlettered mechanic, and evinced himself a real son of Thalia.

Mr. Foote, who has had the rearing of many heirs to the sock, brought Mr. Weston forth to the world. His Jerry Sneak, and his Dr. Last, removed every possible doubt of his having the most positive claim to an alliance with the Comic Muse. Scrub and Abel Drugger stamp the seal of his comic merit; and had we never seen Mr. Garrick in those parts, we should have thought Farquhar and old Ben had Weston in their eye, when they drew those characters. Or rather, if Weston had not made his appearance upon the stage till the retreat of Roscius, now so near at hand, we should almost have forgot David to admire Tom.

But the late Mr. Weston had his foibles as well as his merits. Although he was so excellent an actor upon the boards, he was but a "walking shadow, a poor player," upon the theatre of life. Unlettered, and with few ideas, he was very far from being an agreeable companion. Positive, overbearing, and frequently insolent—in his cups all these disagreeable characters were united; and of course rendered him a very disagreeable companion. He would often quarrel with his best friends, and as often give treats to obtain a reconciliation. He was an admirer, or rather a dupe of the fair sex, who laughed at and derided him for his folly. But he was a still greater dupe to the bottle, which frequently levelled him, not only with the brute, but even with the floor.

Such pursuits being his incessant avocations, his finances were necessarily dissipated, and his repeated wants were generated by wants. The sheriff's officers in him found an excellent customer, and the attorneys should erect a monument to his memory, to inform posterity that Tom Weston provided far better for them than he did for himself.

As to his dress and appearance, they united at once the fop and the sloven; a tawdry laced coat would be accompanied by a dirty shirt, and a Macaroni waistcoat with greasy breeches.

His physiognomy was happily calculated for the stage, having that necessary vacuity of expression, which his walk of parts so immediately required. His natural countenance and complexion were truly picturesque of the company he kept. He was the genuine representative of a night-cellar; and, as was said of a certain lady, who shone in a similar walk upon the stage, "she breathed gin at every pore."

But with all Tom's imperfections on his head, "We may ne'er see his like again."

To the Editor of the Hibernian Magazine.

Remarks on the Instinct which actuates Brutes.

AS you profess, Sir, to open your Magazine for literary as well as political discussions, I have not a doubt but you will give admission to what may tend either to the information or utility of our species.

Most of the natural productions of the earth are in some manner or other conducive to the use of animals. A variety of animals afford food for others, and unquestionably they were destined for that purpose by the sovereign Creator.

Man, considered as an animal, has a share of the leguminous, as well as of the animal food, allotted him by nature.

For all the various kinds of living creatures ample nourishment is provided. This earth may be considered as creation's store-house, wherein food is ready prepared for the multitudinous inhabitants of nature. But here lies the difference; the inferior species of creatures are not furnished with intellectual eyes to see the bounteous hand which thus provides for their subsistence; whilst man, though partaking in common with the brute creation of the alimentary supplies, is endowed with a mind capable of perceiving, through the medium of reflection, the finger of Deity labouring for his external support, and his internal happiness!

This essential difference between the brute and human species being admitted, it will hence follow demonstrably, that on the brute creation no obligatory claim of duty is incumbent. It is not from them that gratitude to the sovereign donor is to be expected; they trace not the Godhead in his works, and are therefore ignorant of his providential bounties; whereas to the intellectual eye of man, the hand of Divinity is visible; to a considerate mind each spire of grass proclaims it; man, therefore, who is so formed as to be conscious of his benefactor, should be so grateful as to love him for his benefits; from the human race it is expected, and those of the human species who feel not their obligations to infinite goodness, are lost to every sense of gratitude. Perhaps the principal design in crowding the earth with the various wonders of a vegetable and animal kind was, "That the mind of reflecting man might be lost in admiration; his heart absorbed in gratitude!"

It is rash to pronounce, that the bee, consciously, and with design, makes use of any geometric principles in the formation of the hexagonal cells; nor can it be said, that any physical knowledge of the distinct properties of flowers, directs this wonderful creature to cull such sweets as yield honey from some, neglecting others.

It is equally rash to affirm, that the various tribes of spiders by reflection adopt mechanic rules for framing those nets of different forms and sizes, wherein the careless flutterers are entangled.

Equally rash and unphilosophical is it to imagine that swallows or crows form their nests, and chuse the fittest situations, from any principle of antecedent reasoning about what is properest to be done. The cat lies not in wait so patiently and attentively for her prey, prompted either by reflection or the calls of hunger. These several animals are incited to these several actions merely because prompted by the apt formation of their frames, and impelled by that internal feeling to which we give the name of instinct.

It has been said by some philosophers, "that we are strangers to those instincts which actuate brutes; that we are not capable of forming any conception about them." I question, sir, the truth of this assertion; for, by what passes within ourselves, we may form an almost just idea of the workings of that principle we term instinct in brutes. Are we prompted to eat and drink from a previous reflection that such acts are necessary to support our existence? Is the desire we feel for the softer sex founded solely on an intention to propagate the species? These, sir, are mere instincts, which operate mechanically, and irresistibly impel us to eat, to drink, to copulate, independent of reflection. In such respects we are exactly on a par with with the brute creation, and, from the internal workings of such natural instincts within ourselves, we may form a very just idea of that unerring principle by which brutes are necessarily stimulated to perform the various offices, at the execution of which man stands amazed, and sometimes finds himself out-done in art by a reptile, whom a blast of his breath could instantly deprive of existence.

CONTEMPLATOR.

The History of the Female Sex; or a candid Inquiry into the gradual Progress of Women, from their low Situation in Savage Tribes to their elevated State in civilised Nations. In a Series of Letters.

L E T T E R I.

AN investigation of the manners of the female sex comprehends a great variety of curious and interesting matter. With regard to the outlines, whether of internal disposition, or of external figure, men and women are precisely the same. Nature, however, intending them for mates, has given them characters different, but concordant, so as to produce together delicious harmony. The man, naturally more robust, is fitted for severe labour and for field exercises: The woman for sedentary occupations, and particularly for nursing children. To that difference the mind also contributes. A boy is always running about, delights in a top or a ball, and rides upon a stick for want of a horse. A girl has less inclination to move: Her first amusement is a baby, which she delights to dress and undress. The man, bold and vigorous, is qualified for being a protector: The woman, delicate and timid, requires protection. The man, as a protector, is directed by nature to govern: The woman, conscious of inferiority, is disposed to obedience. Their intellectual powers correspond to the destination of nature: Men have penetration and solid judgment to fit them for governing: Women have sufficient understanding to make a decent figure under good government; a greater proportion would excite dangerous rivalry. Add another capital difference of character: The gentle and insinuating manners of the female sex tend to soften the roughness of the other sex, and, wherever women are indulged with any freedom, they polish sooner than men.

These are not the only particulars that distinguish the sexes. With respect to matrimony, it is the privilege of the male, as superior and protector, to make a choice: The female preferred has no privilege but barely to consent or to refuse. Nature fits them for these different parts: The male is bold, the female bashful. Hence, among all nations, it is the practice for men to court, and for women to be courted; which holds also among many other animals, probably among all that pair.

Another distinction is equally visible: The master of a family is immediately connected with his country: His wife, his children, his servants, are immediately connected with him, and with their country through him only. Women accordingly have less patriotism than men, and less bitterness against the enemies of their country.

The peculiar modesty of the female sex is also a distinguishing circumstance. Nature hath provided them with it as their chief defence against the artful solicitations of the other sex before marriage, and also as the chief support of conjugal fidelity. It is held to be their capital virtue; and a woman who surrenders her chastity is universally despised; though, in a man, chastity is scarce held to be a virtue, except in the married state. But of that more fully afterwards.

A fundamental article in the present sketch is matrimony; and it has been much controverted, whether it be an appointment of nature, or only of municipal law. Many writers have exercised their talents in that controversy, but without giving any satisfaction to a judicious inquirer. If I mistake not, it may be determined upon solid principles; and as it is of importance in the history of man, the reader, I am hopeful will not be disgusted at the length of the argument.

Many writers hold, that women were originally common; that animal love was gratified, as among horses and horned cattle; and that matrimony was not known till nations grew, in some degree, to be orderly and refined. I select Cicero, as an author of authority: "For there was a time, when men, like the brutes, roamed abroad over the earth, and fed, like wild beasts, upon other animals. Then reason bore no sway, but all was ruled by superior strength. The ties of religion, and the obligations of morality, were then unselt. Lawful marriage was unknown, and no father was certain of his offspring." Pliny, in support of that doctrine, informs us, that the Garamantes, an African nation, lived promiscuously together, without any notion notion of matrimony. Among the Aufes, a people of Libya, as Herodotus says, matrimony was not known, and men cohabited with women indifferently, like other animals. A boy educated by his mother, was at a certain age admitted to an assembly of the men, and the man he clung to was reputed his father. Justin and other authors report, that, before Cecrops, who reigned in Attica 1600 years before Christ, marriage was not known in Greece; and that the burden of the children lay upon the mother.

Before entering directly into the matter, it is proper to remove, if possible, the bias of these great names. The practice of the Garamantes and of the Aufes is mentioned by Pliny and Herodotus as singular; and, were it better vouched than it is, it would avail very little against the practice of all other nations. Little weight can be laid upon Pliny's evidence in particular, considering what he reports in the same chapter of the Blemmyans, that they had no head, and that the mouth and eyes were in the breast. Pliny at the same time, as well as Herodotus, being very deficient in natural knowledge, were grossly credulous, and cannot be relied on with respect to any thing strange or uncommon. As to what is reported of antient Greece, Cecrops possibly prohibited polygamy, or introduced some other matrimonial regulation, which by writers might be mistaken for a law appointing matrimony. However that be, one part of the report is undoubtedly false; for it will be made evident afterward, that in the hunter-state, or even in that of shepherds, it is impracticable for any woman, by her own industry alone, to rear a numerous issue. If this be at all possible, it can only be in the torrid zone, where people live on fruits and roots, which are produced in plenty with very little labour. Upon that account Diodorus Siculus is less blameable for listening to a report, that the inhabitants of Taprobana, supposed to be the island of Ceylon, never marry, but that women are used promiscuously. But, as there is no such practice known at present in the East-Indies, there is no just ground to believe, that it ever was the practice; and the East Indies were so little known to the antient Greeks, that their authors cannot be much relied on in the accounts they give of that distant region. The opinion of Cicero may seem to have more weight at first view, and yet a single observation will reduce it to nothing. The notions of that author upon the primitive state of man must confessedly be exceedingly crude, when he denies to savages any sense of religion or of moral duty. Ought we to rely more on him, when he denies, that they have any notion of matrimony? Cæsar's account of the antient Britons approaches the nearest to a loose commerce with women, though in the main it is good evidence against the opinion of Cicero. It was common, he says, for a number of brothers, or other near relations, to use their wives promiscuously. The offspring however were not common; for each man maintained the children that were produced by his own wife. Herodotus reports the same of the Massagetae.

Laying thus aside the great names of Cicero, Herodotus, and Pliny, the field lies open to a fair and impartial investigation. And, as the means provided by nature for continuing the race of other animals may probably throw light upon the œconomy of nature with respect to man, I begin with that article, which has not engaged the attention of naturalists so much as it ought to do. With respect to animals whose nourishment is grass, pairing would be of no use. The female feeds herself and her young at the same instant, and the male has nothing to do. On the other hand, all brute animals, whose young require the nursing care of both parents, are directed by nature to pair; nor is that connection dissolved till the young can provide for themselves. Pairing is indispensable to wild birds that build on trees; because the male must provide food for his mate while she is hatching the eggs. And, as they have commonly a numerous issue, it requires the labour of both to pick up food for themselves and for their young. Upon that account it is so ordered, that the young are sufficiently vigorous to provide for themselves before a new brood is produced.

What I have now opened suggests the following question, Whether, according to the animal œconomy above displayed, are we to presume, or not, that man is directed by nature to matrimony? If analogy can be relied on, the affirmative must be held, as there is no other creature in the known world to which pairing is so necessary. Man is a long lived animal, and is proportionally slow in growing to maturity; he is a helpless being before the age of 15 or 16, and there may be in a family 10 or 12 children of different births before the eldest can shift for itself. Now in the original nal state of hunting and fishing, which are laborious occupations, and not always successful, a woman suckling her infant is not able to provide food even for herself, far less for ten or twelve voracious children. Matrimony therefore, or pairing, is so necessary to the human race, that it must be natural and instinctive. When such ample means are provided for continuing every other animal race, is it supposable that the chief race would be neglected? Providential care descends even to vegetable life: Every plant bears a profusion of seed; and, in order to cover the earth with vegetables, some seeds have wings, some are scattered by means of a spring, and some are so light as to be carried about by the wind. Brute animals, which do not pair, have grass and other food in plenty, enabling the female to feed her young without needing any help from the male. But, where the young require the nursing care of both parents, pairing is a law of nature. When other races are so amply provided for, can it be seriously thought, that Providence is less attentive to the human race? If men and women were not impelled by nature to matrimony, they would be less fitted for continuing their species than even the humblest plant. Have we not reason fairly to conclude, that matrimony in the human race is an appointment of nature? Can that conclusion be resisted by any one who believes in Providence, and in final causes?

To confirm this doctrine, let the consequences of a loose commerce between the sexes be examined. The carnal appetite, when confined to one object, seldom transgresses the bounds of temperance. But, were it encouraged to roam like a bee sucking honey from every flower, every new object would inflame the imagination; and satiety with respect to one would give new vigour with respect to others: a generic habit would be formed of intemperance in fruition; and animal love would become the ruling passion. Men, like the hart in rutting-time, would all the year round fly with impetuosity from object to object, giving no quarter, even to women suckling their infants: and women, abandoning themselves to the same passion, would become altogether regardless of their offspring. In that state, the continuance of the human race would be a miracle. In the savage state, it is beyond the power of any woman to provide food for a family of children; and now it appears, that intemperance in animal love would render a woman careless of her family, however easy it might be to provide for it.

I say more; the promiscuous use of women would unqualify them in a great measure from procreating, or having a family. The carnal appetite in man resembles his appetite for food: both of them demand gratification without end, after short intervals. Where the carnal appetite is felt but a short space annually, as among animals who feed on grass, the promiscuous use of females is according to the order of nature: but such a law in man, where the carnal appetite is always awake, would be an effectual bar to population, as it is an undoubted truth, that women who indulge that appetite to excess seldom have children; and, if all women were common, all women would in effect be common prostitutes.

If undisguised nature shew itself any where, it is in children. So truly is matrimony an instinct of nature, as to be understood even by children. They often hear, it is true, people talking of matrimony; but they also hear of logical, metaphysical, and commercial matters, without understanding a syllable. Whence then their notion of marriage, but from nature? Marriage, at the same time, is a compound idea, which no instruction could bring within the comprehension of a child, did not nature co-operate.

That the arguments urged above against a promiscuous use of women do not necessarily conclude against polygamy, or the union of one man with a plurality of women, will not escape an attentive reader. St. Augustin and other fathers admit, that polygamy is not prohibited by the law of nature; and the learned Grotius professes the same opinion. But great names terrify me not; and I venture to maintain, that pairing in the strictest sense is a law of nature among men as among wild birds; and that polygamy is a gross infringement of this law. My reasons shall follow in my next epistle.

*The Wooden Leg: An Helvetic Tale.
From the German of Gesner.*

ON the mountain from whence the torrent of Runti precipitates into the valley, a young shepherd fed his goats. His pipe called Echo gayly from the hollow rocks, and Echo bid the valleys seven times resound his songs melodious. On a sudden he perceived a man climbing with pain the mountain's side.

side. The man was old ; years had blanched his head. A staff bent beneath his heavy tottering steps, for he had a wooden leg. He approached the young man, and seated himself by him on the moss of the rock. The young shepherd looked at him with surprise, and his eyes were fixed on the wooden leg. My son, said the old man, smiling, do you not think, that, infirm as I am, I should have done better to have remained in the valley? know, however, that I make this journey but once a year, and this leg, as you see it, my friend, is more honourable to me than are to many the most straight and active. I don't doubt, father, replied the shepherd, but it is very honourable to you, though, I dare say, another would be more useful. Without doubt, you are tired. Will you drink some milk from my goats, or some of the fresh water that spouts below from the hollow of the rock.

Old Man. I like the frankness painted on thy visage. A little fresh water will be sufficient. If you will bring it me hither, you shall hear the history of this wooden leg. The young shepherd ran to the fountain, and soon returned.

When the old man had quenched his thirst, he said, Let young people, when they behold their fathers maimed, and covered o'er with scars, adore the Almighty Power, and bless their valour ; for without that you would have bowed your necks beneath the yoke, instead of thus basking in the sun's warmth, and making the echoes repeat your joyful notes. Mirth and gaiety inhabit these hills and vallies, while your songs resound from one mountain to the other. Liberty ! sweet Liberty ! it is thou that pourest felicity upon this blessed land ! All we see around us is our own. We cultivate our own fields with pleasure. The crops we reap are ours ; and the time of harvest is with us rejoicing days.

Young Shepherd. He does not deserve to be a freeman, that can forget that his liberty was purchased with the blood of his forefathers.

Old Man. But who, in their place, would not have done as they did ? Ever since that bloody day of Nefels, I come once a year to the top of this mountain ; but I perceive that I am now come for the last time. From hence I still behold the order of the battle, where liberty made us conquerors. See, it was on that side the army of the enemy advanced ; thousands of lances glittered at a distance with more than two hundred horsemen covered with sumptuous armour. The plumes that shaded their helmets nodded as they marched, and the earth resounded with their horses hoofs. Our little troop was already broke. We were but three or four hundred men. The cries of the defeat were re-echoed from every side, and the smoke of Nefels in flames filled the valley, and spread with horror along the mountains. However, at the bottom of a hill, where we now are, our chief had placed himself. He was there, where those two pines shoot up from the edge of that pointed rock. I think I see him now surrounded by a small number of warriors, firm, immoveable, and calling around him the dispersed troops. I hear the rustling of the standard that he waved in the air ; it was like the found of the wind that precedes a hurricane. From every side they ran towards him. Dost thou see those floods rush down from the mountains ? Stones, rocks, and trees, overthrown, in vain oppose their course ; they o'erleap, or bear down all before them, and meet together at the bottom of that pool : So we ran to the cry of our general, cutting our way through the enemy. Ranked around the hero, we made a vow, and God was our witness, to conquer or die. The enemy advancing in order of battle, poured down impetuously upon us ; we attacked them in our turn. Eleven times we returned to the charge, but, always forced to retire to the shelter of these hills, we there closed our ranks, and became unshaken as the rock by which we were protected. At last, enforced by thirty Swiss warriors, we fell suddenly on the enemy, like the fall of a mountain, or as some mighty rock descends, rolls through the forest, and with a horrid crush lays waste the trees that interrupt its course. On every side the enemy, both horse and foot, confounded in a most dreadful tumult, overthrew each other to escape our rage. Grown furious by the combat, we trod under foot the dead and dying, to extend vengeance and death still further. I was in the middle of the battle. A horseman of the enemy in his flight rode over me, and crushed my leg. The soldier, who fought the nearest to me, seeing my condition, took me on his shoulders, and ran with me out of the field of battle. A holy father was prostrate on a rock not far distant, and imploring Heaven to aid us.—Take care, good father, of this warrior, my deliverer cried ; he has fought like a son of liberty ! He said, and flew back to the combat. The victory was ours, my son, it was ours ! But many of us were left extended on the heaps of the enemy. Thus the weary mower reposes on the sheaves himself has made. I was carefully attended ; I was cured ; but never could find out the man to whom I owe my life. I have sought him in vain. I have made vows and pilgrimages, that some faint of paradise, or some angel, would reveal him to me. But alas! all my efforts have been fruitless. I shall never in this life shew him my gratitude. The young shepherd, having heard the old warrior, with tears in his eyes said: No, father, in this life you can never shew him your gratitude. The old man, surprised, cried; Heavens! what dost thou say! Dost thou know, my son, who my deliverer was?

Young Shepherd. I am much deceived, if it was not my father. Often he has told me the story of that battle, and often I have heard him say, I wonder if the man I carried from the battle be still alive!

Old Man. Oh God! O Angels of Heaven! was that generous man thy father?

Young Shepherd. He had a scar here, (pointing to his left cheek;) he had been wounded with a lance; perhaps it was before he carried you from the field.

Old Man. His cheek was covered with blood when he bore me off. O my child! my son!

Young Shepherd. He died, two years ago; and as he was poor, I am forced for subsistence to keep these goats. The old man embraced him, and said, Heaven be praised! I can recompense thee for his generosity. Come, my son, come with me, and let some other keep thy goats.

They descended the hill together, and walked towards the old man's dwelling. He was rich in land and flocks, and a lovely daughter was his only heir. My child, he said to her, he that saved my life was the father of this young shepherd. If thou canst love him, I shall be happy to see you united! The young man was an amiable person; health and pleasure shone in his countenance; locks of yellow gold shaded his forehead, and the sparkling fire of his eyes were softened by a sweet modesty. The young maiden, with an ingenuous reserve, asked three days to resolve; but the third appeared to her a very long one. She gave her hand to the young shepherd; and the old man, with tears of joy, said to them: My blessing rest upon you, my children! This day has made me the most happy of mortals.

The present State of America.

IF we consider commerce, industry, and labour, as necessary to the opulence and happiness of society, we cannot but regard the discovery of the vast continent of America, and the infinity of wealthy islands with which it is surrounded, as one of the most important consequences of the happy discovery of the compass, and the improvement in navigation. Without a knowledge of the West-Indies, the intercourse with the east would be of little advantage to Europe; it might even be pernicious, by draining it of the gold and silver: whereas we now purchase the commodities of the latter, not only with European manufactures, but with the silver dug in the mines of Potosi. To her possessions in Chili, Peru, Mexico, and the Antilles, Spain owes all her opulence. Great Britain hath, by means of her colonies on the continent of America, and her islands in the West-Indies, raised herself to her present astonishing and much envied height of grandeur and importance. The very existence of Portugal depends in a great measure upon her possessions in Brazil; even the barren Canada, and Cape-Breton, were fruitful of blessings to France, while in her possession, by promoting her trade and navigation, not to speak of the benefits arising to her at present from Guadaloupe, St. Domingo, Martinico, and St. Lucia. The intercourse with Surinam, and the Spanish main, and the islands of St. Eustatia, and Curacao, have brought great wealth into Holland. In a word, every nation in Europe have made attempts to obtain some establishments in a country fraught with all those commodities, which the progress of science, of luxury, and refinement, has rendered almost essential to existence.

The trade of Great-Britain is much indebted to her colonies, though it has been purchased at a vast expence of blood and treasure. The trade to these colonies is in fact a foreign commerce, carried on and conducted under the direction of the mother country; accordingly we find, that in proportion as the several crowns of Europe cherish their plantations, while, at the same time, they keep them in a just subordination and dependence, they acquire a large share of maritime strength, establish a more fruitful nursery of seamen, gain a more considerable fund of wealth, and promise fairer for the superiority of the sea. How much then are the disputes that at present subsist between Great-Britain and some of her colonies to be regretted by all who wish well to both? However, to insist on the importance tance to Europe of the gold of Chili and Brazil, of the silver of Peru, the sugar, indigo, and coffee of the Antilles, the furs of Canada, the fish of Newfoundland, the tobacco of Virginia and Maryland, the precious stones, balsams, gems, drugs, dying woods, and other commodities, of the islands and continent of America, would not only be foreign to our design, but repeating what has been hackneyed by every political writer since they were first discovered.

America was so called from Americus Vespucio, a Florentine by birth, who, in 1497, was sent to improve the discoveries made by Columbus. The prodigious magnitude of this continent, the multitude and extent of its provinces, the diversity of its climates, inhabitants, and languages, its distance from Europe, its being encumbered with vast forests, lakes, and mountains, interspersed with large rivers, inhabited, in a great measure, by rude uncivilized savages, have been the cause that it is still but imperfectly known; though great advances have been made of late towards a more full and complete discovery, especially in regard to North-America, where exact surveys have been made of many large tracts on the great inland lakes and rivers, little known before. This continent reaches, at least what has been hitherto discovered, from latitude 78 deg. north, to latitude 56 south, that is, an hundred and thirty-four degrees; which, taken in a straight line, amount to upwards of eight thousand and forty miles in length. With regard to breadth, it is very irregular, being in some places three thousand six hundred and ninety miles, and in others, as at the isthmus of Darien, or Panama, not above sixty or seventy. The boundaries ascribed to it are the lands about the pole on the north; the Atlantic ocean, which separates it from Europe and Asia, on the east; another vast ocean on the south; and the Pacific Ocean, usually called the South Sea, which divides it from Asia, on the west.

This vast country was not discovered till the year 1492, when the enterprising genius of Columbus prompted him to make the bold adventurous attempt, which was crowned with success. The honour, however, of this discovery, has been claimed by all the maritime nations of Europe. The Spaniards tell us, that Columbus received his lights from captain Aldres, their countryman, who had been cast away on the coasts; and the French say, he had them from Betincourt, who first discovered the Azores. It would be a difficult matter to determine this contest: but it appears, that our claim to the discovery of this New World is prior to that of the Spaniards, whose pretensions seem to be the best grounded; for no one can dispute the authenticity of those vouchers, whereby it appears, that Sebastian Cabot, a Venetian, a man no less enterprising or less skilled in navigation, than Columbus himself, was sent by our Henry VII. a year before the discovery of Columbus; and that having first discovered Newfoundland, he sailed along the coast as far as Florida.

This quarter of the globe, besides the name of America, is sometimes also distinguished by that of the New World, and the West-Indies. The European nations, who have the largest settlements or possessions in it, are the Spanish, English, and Portuguese; and next to them, the French, Dutch, and Danes; but most of these settlements are only in the islands, and along the coast, the far greater part of the interior country being as yet in the possession of the natives. How or whence America was first peopled, cannot be ascertained; but if the north of Asia is joined to America, as seems highly probable, it is most likely to have been from thence, especially as the natives of those parts still bear a great resemblance to one another in many respects: besides, it is possible some ship or ships might have been blown over to it from the coast of Africa or Europe, after they first ventured into the ocean from the Mediterranean; or perhaps even from the Ethiopic or Eastern Ocean, and as they had not the use of the compass, would not attempt to cross such a wide sea again; but the wild beasts that are found here must have gone thither by land, and not in ships, or across the ocean.

The various tribes of the native Americans, as far as we are yet acquainted with them, are found to bear a wonderful likeness, both in their persons and manners; for they have all coarse black hair on their heads, but none on any other parts of their bodies, not even on their faces, except those in the country called Labrador, in North-America, who have not only thick bushy beards, and hair on other parts of their bodies, but eat also raw flesh, and go clothed both in summer and winter; in all which respects they differ from the others, and are therefore supposed to have a dis-rent origin. Several voyagers also mention a people at the other extremity of the continent, about the straits of Magellan, of a gigantic stature: and these accounts have been confirmed by the honourable commodore Byron and his crew, when they returned from the South Sea in the Dolphin man of war.

North-America.

In describing the several countries of America, we shall begin from the north, and proceed regularly southward.

New-Britain.

New Britain, or the country lying round Hudson's Bay, and commonly called the country of the Esquimaux, comprehending Labrador, New North and South Wales, &c. is bounded by unknown lands about the pole on the north; by the Atlantic Ocean and Baffin's Bay on the east; by the bay and river of St. Laurence and Canada on the south; and by unknown lands on the west.

There are very high mountains in this country towards the north, which being perpetually covered with snow, and the winds blowing from thence three quarters of the year, are the chief occasion of that excessive cold which is found on this continent, beyond any thing that has been known on the eastern continent, under the same parallels of latitude. The winter generally sets in in September, and continues till June; during most of that time the snow lies very deep upon the ground, and the rivers are frozen eight or nine feet thick. The lands near the south end of the bay produce large timber, and plenty of herbage, and no doubt would produce corn, if cultivated. The country about Fort Nelson is a low marshy soil, producing juniper, birch, poplar, a small wood of the spruce or fir kind; but little other herbage, besides moss; neither corn nor pasturage is to be expected in the north, where the earth, even in summer, remains frozen six feet deep, and the mountains are perpetually covered with snow. The soil of the south coast of Hudson's Straits, known by the name of Terra de Labrador, is much of the same nature as that of the western side of the bay. Terra de Labrador is of a triangular form, extending from the fiftieth to the sixty-third degree of latitude, and from the fifty-first to the seventy-ninth degree of longitude, west from London. The inland parts of this country are but little known, and are inhabited by certain tribes of Esquimaux Indians, the most untamed and untractable people in America. They were first discovered by the Danes, but no settlement has ever been made in their country. They have no settled habitations; nor do we know of any villages or towns among them: they are thought to be so numerous, that they can bring thirty thousand fighting men into the field; but though mischievous, untamable, and treacherous, they are excessively cowardly. Sometimes, in the night-time, they will cut the cables of ships, that they may enjoy their wrecks in the morning.

The only commodities they trade in, are furs, which they exchange for knives, scissars, pots, kettles, and the like hardware; but if an European ship should suffer them to come on board in too great numbers, they will, if they can, master the crew, and plunder the vessel. The food of these and the other Indians about Hudson's Bay, and indeed all over America, is chiefly what they take in hunting and fishing; for here is a great variety of land animals, besides fish and fowl; among the first are the moose deer, elks, stags, rein-deer, bears, tygers, buffaloes, wolves, foxes, beavers, otters, lynxes, martens, squirrels, wild cats, and hares: of the feathered kind are geese, ducks, bustards, partridges, and many other sorts: of fish, whales, morfes, seals, cod, a white fish, preferable to herrings, &c. and in the rivers and fresh waters, pike, perch, carp and trout. The foxes, hares and partridges turn white in winter; the last are as large as hens. There have been taken or killed at Port Nelson, in one season, ninety thousand partridges, and twenty-five thousand hares.

The principal settlements belonging to our Hudson's Bay company at present, are Forts Churchill, Nelson, New Severn, and Albany, on the west side of the Bay; and they had formerly Forts Charles and Rupert, at the bottom of the Bay. The English in these factories kill beef, pork, mutton, and venison at the beginning of winter, and these are preserved by the frost six or seven months, free from putrefaction: geese also, partridges, and other fowls, killed at the same time, are hung up with their feathers and guts, yet hold good all the winter. In lakes and standing waters, which are not ten feet deep, the water is frozen to the bottom, and the fish killed; but in waters of greater depth, and rivers near the sea, the fish are caught all the winter by cutting holes in the ice, to which they come for air. As soon as they are taken out of the water, ter, they are immediately frozen and stiff, but may be thawed again by being immersed in cold water; and thus it is that the salt provisions are thawed and freshened here: the meat is let down through a hole in the ice into the water, and in a little time becomes soft and pliable, as if it never had been frozen, and eats very well; whereas roasted or boiled, while frozen, it will be spoiled, and eat as if it was rotten. There is no want of food about Hudson's Bay at any time of the year. In April come the geese, bustards, and ducks, of which they kill as many as they please. About the same time they take great numbers of rein-deer, and these do not return to the north till July or August. In summer they also take pike, trout, carp, and other fish: and in the beginning of winter, all manner of wild-fowl return again.

A thousand Indian men, and some women, in about six hundred canoes, come down usually to port Nelson to trade with the English. Many of them come from far distant countries, and are much delayed in their voyages, by being obliged to go on shore every day to hunt for provisions; for their canoes are so small, holding only two men, and a pack of beaver skins, that they cannot carry much provisions with them. These Indians are of a tawny complexion, and not so fair as those in Labrador, nor of such large robust bodies; but much more gentle and tractable. In summer they wear scarce any cloaths, but anoint themselves with bears grease, or the oil of seals, which it is said, prevents their being stung by musketos, or bit by bugs, or any other insects; but those in Labrador go always clothed. In winter the southern Esquimaux Indians cloath themselves with beaver skins, which they oil and grease in the same manner as they do their own skins in summer, which prevents the cold penetrating them, and have a kind of buskins on their legs, and shoes of deer skins: they use also beaver skins and furs for their beds and covering in the night. The Indians of all sorts, inhabiting the country about Hudson's Bay, lead a wandering life, seldom remaining more than a week or two in a place; and most of their time is spent in hunting and fishing.

The Hudson's Bay company, it is probable, do not find their trade so advantageous now as it was before we got possession of Quebec, when they enjoyed the fur trade, almost without a rival, at least in respect to the British dominions; whence their profits must have been very great, especially as they availed themselves to the utmost of their exclusive charter, and made the poor Indians pay very dear for every thing they wanted of them.

This company, which does not consist of above nine or ten merchants, obtained their first charter from Charles II. in the year 1669, by which the sole property of all the lands, trade, royal fishery, and mines, within Hudson's Straits not actually possessed by any Christian prince, was vested in them.

According to Mr. Dobs, who has given the best account of Hudson's Bay, it may be extended from 51 to 65 north latitude, and from 78 to 95 west longitude from London. The whole of its extent, in length, may be about six hundred miles, and its northern boundary may be reckoned at Davis's Straits, the country to the north of that being claimed by Denmark. The dimensions at the entrance of the Straits are variously represented. At Resolution Island they are said to be twelve or thirteen leagues wide, but others make it not half so wide. As to the Straits themselves, they are said to be a hundred and twenty leagues in length; the shores on both sides being inhabited by a most savage race. At the mouth of the Straits lies Resolution Island, and in the Straits themselves lie the islands, Charles, Salisbury and Nottingham; and Mansfield Island is situated in the mouth of the bay. On the other side of Hudson's Straits, to the north of Labrador, lies what is called the North Main, which is bounded on the east by Davis's Straits, on the north by Baffin's Bay, and on the west by a nameless strait.

The Importance of the Discovery contained in the following Letter, intitles it to a Place in our Repository; and the rather, as it may thereby become more generally useful on some future Occasion.

To the Printer of the Hibernian Magazine.

S I R,

I N hopes of being serviceable to the community in general, and to the poor in particular, permit me to solicit an early publication of this letter; which contains an easy, but effectual, method of curing potatoes that have been penetrated by frost. The length and severity of the present frost, render the publication seasonable, indeed, necessary; and, as the insertion may be a means of preserving the food, and consequently the lives of thousands, thousands, your humane compliance is not, in the least, questioned. Actuated by the like benevolent motives, it is expected, that every other printer, in town and country, will give it an immediate circulation in his paper. And if the country clergy, of all denominations, would communicate it to their respective congregations, on the next Sunday after it comes to their knowledge, the benefit would thereby be considerably extended. The famine and pestilence that succeeded the frost in 1740, are admonitions too awful to be despised, too recent to be forgotten. It, therefore, behoves every good citizen to unite his endeavours to avert the impending calamity. Where the danger is imminent, delays may be fatal. A fire begun in a cottage, may end in a palace.

It is well known to naturalists, that fruits penetrated by frost, receive no injury, provided the nitre, or frosty particles, be extracted. This is best effected by putting the fruit in cold water, when a thaw approaches, and letting it remain there until it is purged, as it were by degrees, of all the nitrous spiculæ, which the air, by its activity, would agitate with such violence in a thaw, as to lacerate the substance of the fruit, and reduce it to a soft pulp or liquid. In this instance, the water seems as a lixive to suck out those minute thorns, by slow degrees, and without offending the solids of the fruit. The method may be extended to roots, and particularly potatoes. The following experiment will demonstrate its utility:

Take a couple of apples, and expose them to the cold air till they are perfectly frozen; then put one of them into cold water, and, in less than a minute, it will be all covered with sharp transparent spiculæ, as pungent as needles, and the apple will become soft and fit for use. Let the other apple be thrown into hot water, and it will be immediately turned into a pulp, and be as unfit for service as if it had been quite rotten. The philosophical account of this is thus manifested: Cold water extracts the icy particles, and thereby renders the fruit perfectly sound: whereas hot water, on the contrary, repels and agitates them, and lacerating the fibres, reduces the apple to a state of rottenness.

I would not be thought to assume any merit from this discovery: That, by right, appertains to others. It is well known to the curious; and appeared in, or about, the year 1762. Let it be our endeavours to circulate it among the ignorant and the labouring poor. They are, by far, the most numerous part of the community. With the preservation of their food, the preservation of themselves is inseparably connected; and that food is chiefly potatoes.

I am, Sir,

Dame-street, most respectfully your's,
Jan. 30, 1776. PETER WILSON.

A Circumstantial Account of the Behaviour of Robert and Daniel Perreau, on the Day of their Execution.

ON Wednesday morning, the 17th Jan. Messrs. Perreaus came from the cells of Newgate genteelly dressed in deep mourning, with their hair dressed and powdered, and joined the rest of the convicts (destined to share the same unhappy fate with them) in the chapel in Newgate, where they devoutly attended divine service with the ordinary, and received the holy sacrament; after which they retired to the apartment appropriated for the reception of malefactors to have their irons knocked off, previous to their going forth to execution.

The number of people who made application to be let into the room was incredible; but Mr. Akerman attended at the gate himself, and refused even his most intimate friends; six gentlemen only, friends of the convicts, were admitted, Daniel came in first from chapel, bowed to the company, and went to the fire, where he warmed himself with the greatest composure. Robert soon after followed, and looking at his brother for a moment, wiped off a falling tear, which he seemed anxious to hide: he then turned to a little table, where lay the ropes with which they were to be bound: his emotions were then so strongly painted in his countenance, that the surrounding spectators gave vent to their sympathy in loud lamentations. Daniel now assisted in putting the rope properly round himself with decent firmness: but when he saw the man do the same office for his brother, it quite unmann'd him—he sighed and wept. They then took a last farewell of their friends, and got into the coach, after Robert had given the turnkey three guineas.

They arrived at the place of execution about half past ten, and whilst the other criminals were tied up, which might be about fifteen minutes, the two Perreaus remained in the coach with a clergyman. Daniel first entered the cart, and Robert immediately after.—After the usual formalities of taking the cord from round the arms and waist, the executioner untied tied Daniel's neckcloth, and put the cord round his neck, which he immediately tied to the tree ; and then proceeded in the same manner with Robert.

All being made fast, the clergyman entered into prayer with them ; which being ended, he addressed himself to the two brothers, with whom he conversed for some time ; when the following papers were separately delivered to him by the unfortunate Perreaus, who added with great seriousness and solemnity, that " the contents were strictly true."

AS I am now going to appear before my great and just God to answer for all my actions, I do solemnly declare to the world in these my last moments, and I call God to witness, that I never had the least knowledge or suspicion of criminality whatever in any of the bonds or other securities that I negotiated of Mr. Wm. Adair's for Mrs. Margaret Caroline Rudd and my unhappy brother, but did always believe them to be valid and genuine securities. I do solemnly declare also, that I did firmly believe, till the moment the forgery was discovered, that Mrs. Rudd and my brother were intimately acquainted and connected with Mr. William Adair, as they had from time to time imposed upon me ; and under this firm belief I was led to negotiate these securities ; and when the bond I carried to Mr. Drummond to raise the money upon was objected to, as not being the hand writing of Mr. Adair, I applied to Mrs. Rudd to inform Mr. Adair of it ; who returned, and told me she had seen him, and that he would satisfy Mr. Drummond that it was his hand writing, if he would call or send to him about it, and desired I would return to Mr. Drummond and tell him so. Accordingly I returned to Mr. Drummond ; and from the implicit confidence I had in all Mrs. Rudd told me, I inadvertently gave her words to him as my own, saying, that I had seen Mr. Adair : but this I solemnly protest was done from no motive of defrauding whatever, nor did I ever detain any of the monies arising from the discounts of these securities for my own use : Therefore through my imprudence or folly in telling a falsity I am unhappily brought to an ignominious and shameful death.

ROBERT PERREAU.

I DO solemnly declare, in the presence of almighty God, before whom I am going to be judged for all my actions, that I am totally innocent of all the forgeries of bonds, or other securities of Mr. Wm. Adair given to my unhappy brother and myself by Mrs. Margaret

Caroline Rudd to be negotiated ; but that my unhappy connection with her, and infatuation to her, made me believe every thing she told me was true ; therefore through her impositions I deceived my brother in the supposed and pretended acquaintance with Mr. Adair, always believing, however, from her stories, that I was very soon to be introduced and connected with him by means of her family alliance, and thereby to derive considerable advantages in life : by which I am unhappily brought to an ignominious end through her artifice.

DANIEL PERREAU.

After praying a short time to themselves, each having a prayer book in his hand, the executioner put on their caps. The clergyman now took his leave, which Robert and Daniel returned by bowing, and immediately embraced and saluted each other in a most tender and affectionate manner. They then took hold of each other's hand, the caps having been drawn over their faces ; and in this manner, the cart driving away, they launched into eternity.

The two Perreaus hands remained clinched together about half a minute after the cart was drove away, when, by the motion of their bodies, they separated.

They both behaved with a firmness and resolution rarely to be met with in men at the hour of death ; yet, with a devotion becoming their unhappy situation.

Since the above execution the following " Solemn Declaration of Mr. Daniel Perreau, addressed to the Public, written by Himself, and delivered to a Friend in the Cells of Newgate on Sunday, Jan. 14, 1776," has been published ; the following part of which asserts the innocence of the two unfortunate Brothers in very positive terms :

IF it is the fraudulent intention which can alone render actions criminal, I can with the greatest confidence, and with my dying breath, boldly declare myself an innocent man, and call that God, who knoweth the secrets of all hearts, to witness, that so far was I from any knowledge that either the bond I deposited with Dr. Brooke, or any other, was forged, that even a doubt of their validity never entered my mind ; but that on the contrary, I have, through the whole of this most iniquitous transaction, been made the dupe to my unbounded affection for Mrs. Rudd, and the unlimited confidence I was thereby induced to repose in her uprightness and integrity of heart ; and I most solemnly protest, that I have had no degree of participation in a crime, which is big with such pernicious consequences to civil society, further than having, through my infatuated credulity and delusion, been made the innocent and ignorant instrument where-by it was perpetrated.

And although I now fall an innocent victim to a train of the blackest and most consummate villainy, yet I trust in the gracious providence of Almighty God, that I shall one day appear to the world to be what I really am, an innocent and most injured man, whose life was unjustly sacrificed in consequence of his infatuated delusion and credulity, and not at the shrine of offended justice, or the violated laws of his country.

I think it incumbent on me to use my endeavours to remove, as much as possible, that odium which my unhappy catastrophe may cast upon me, and which illiberality may attempt to reflect upon those dear relatives and connexions I leave behind: nor can I think a little part of my small remains of time will be misapplied in throwing together a few observations, and urging them in vindication of my own innocence and that of my unhappy brother; who, I declare in the most solemn manner, is, to the best of my knowledge and belief, equally innocent with myself, and free from every degree of criminal knowledge or intention in the part his fraternal affection for me induced him to take in this fatal business; wherein we were neither of us otherwise blameable, than as the innocent and ignorant instruments in the hands of Mrs. Rudd, wherewith she has perpetrated a crime of the most pernicious tendency.

To remove the vast weight of misery with which my unhappy brother and his family are oppressed, and to prevent him from perishing in that abyss of destruction into which my imprudence, not my guilt, has thrown him, I should with pleasure sacrifice my own life;—but although my weak efforts are unable to prevent him from being overwhelmed in the stupendous ruin which I have inadvertently, not designedly, drawn on both our heads; let me, however, endeavour as much as possible to soften his calamity, and remove, as far as in my power, those ignominious imputations of guilt which may be cast upon him, by solemnly declaring, that he never retained any part of the money raised on Mr. Adair's security; and that I most firmly and religiously believe he never was, in any respect whatever, privy to any deception; but that, on the contrary, he is equally free and innocent with myself from every degree of criminal knowledge in the forgeries which have been committed.

It is in justice to a most friendly and affectionate brother, that I most solemnly assure the world, with my dying breath, that it was his kindness and fraternal regard for my welfare and interest, which I verily believe induced him to take the part he has done in this fatal business; and however painful it may be, yet it is a debt I will not refuse paying to truth and rectitude, to acknowledge, that the influence Mrs. Rudd had over me, added to my perfect reliance on her uprightness and integrity, did induce me to contribute to the deception practised on him by Mrs. Rudd; for in the fullest belief of the truth of her assertions, I did tell my brother I had seen Mr. Adair.

I hope I have with the most sincere contrition, repented of all the sins of my past life, the catalogue of which I most solemnly protest does not contain the crime for which I suffer. I heartily forgive every one who may have injured me, even her to whose intrigues I am now about to fall an innocent sacrifice; fervently entreating those whom I may have injured, to exchange the like forgiveness with me; and thus, as I hope, in perfect amity with all mankind, I resign my soul into the hands of that Almighty and most Gracious God who gave it, in sure and certain hope that I shall, through the mediation of a blessed Saviour receive pardon for all my sins, and be made a partaker of eternal happiness.

DANIEL PERREAU.

The Character and Conduct of the Female Sex, and the Advantages to be derived by Young Men from the Society of Virtuous Women. A Discourse, in three Parts, delivered in Monkwell Street Chapel, January 1, 1776. By James Fordyce, D. D.

L E T T E R I.

John, xi. 5.*

FROM this amiable circumstance in the history of our Saviour, told with a simplicity inimitably tender, as well as from other beautiful passages connected with it, we know, not only that he often visited those worthy persons, but that his elevated soul took peculiar pleasure in their company. An example of such high authority will afford me a very fair occasion for contemplating the intellectual, moral, and spiritual intercourse, which ought to subsist between the sexes, as far as the condition of human nature will allow. A subject, you must acknowledge, of sufficient moment to merit some regard.

In the prosecution of it, I will first enquire into the character and conduct of the female sex, who have not, I apprehend, been always treated with the charity or the justice to which they are entitled; and then point out, as briefly as possible, the benefit to be derived by young men from the society of virtuous women.

I should be happy, if I were able, to promote at once the edification and delight of every individual in this assembly: but to hope it, were equal presumption and ignorance. I have no expectation of gratifying the gay libertine, the gloomy bigot, or the angry critic, if any such are present; unless it be my supplying each with ample matter of remark in his own way. And be assured, that they who are much inclined to censure, are but indifferently disposed to profit. What is now to be delivered will have little regularity of plan, and less connexion with system; as it will deviate considerably from the usual forms of religious discourse, and descend into particulars seldom introduced into the pulpit: on which account, I doubt not, it will be loudly reprobated by numbers. But, certainly, we need not be very solicitous about the opinions of the many, if we have the prospect of doing good to a few. A few at least will hear me with attention and candour: and indeed, if by convincing the understandings, and impressing the hearts, of ever so small a proportion of young men, or young women, I may, with God's assistance, contribute to the improvement and welfare of either, I shall, as long as I live, reflect on it with satisfaction, and call the first day of this new year blessed.

Among the innumerable ties by which mankind are drawn and held together, may be fairly reckoned that love of praise, which perhaps is the earliest passion of human beings. It is wonderful, how soon children begin to look out for notice, and for consequence. To attract mutual regards by mutual services, is one chief aim, and one important operation, of a principle, which I should be sorry to think that any of you had outlived. No sooner do the social affections unfold themselves, than youth appear ambitious to deserve the approbation of those around them. Their desires of this kind are more lively, as their dispositions are more ingenuous. Of those boys who discover the greatest ardour to obtain by their capacity, their spirit, or their generosity, the esteem of their companions, it may be commonly observed, that they shoot up into the most valuable characters.

Eagerness for the admiration of school-fellows and others, without distinction of sexes, is felt at first: but when, in process of time, the bosom becomes sensible to that distinction, it begins to beat with a peculiar anxiety to please the female part of your acquaintance. The smiles, the applause, the attachment of young women, you now consider as conferring felicity of a more interesting nature; and to secure such happiness, is from henceforth an object that incites and influences you on a thousand occasions. By an increasing susceptibility to the attractions of the softer sex, you are carried more and more into their company; and there, my brothers, your hearts and manners, your tastes and pursuits, receive very often a direction that remains ever after, and that will probably decide your destiny through the whole of your existence.

I am aware, indeed, that to under-rate their importance, and cultivate their commerce only as subservient to convenience, amusement, or voluptuousness, is common among the ignorant, the petulant, and the profligate of our sex: but, happy as I have been in the conversation of many worthy and accomplished persons of the other, I would willingly, if possible, prevent your adopting a system alike ungenerous and false.

It is certain, that savages, and those who are but little removed from their condition, have seldom behaved to women with much respect or tenderness. On the other hand, it is known, that in civilized nations they have ever been objects of both; that, in the most heroic states of antiquity, their judgment was often honoured as the standard, and their suffrages often sought as the reward, of merit: and though in those states the allurements of feminine softness was perhaps not always sufficiently understood, owing probably to that passion for public interests, and extensive fame, which seems to have overpowered all other emotions; it must yet be acknowledged, that the ladies of ancient days frequently possessed a wonderful influence in what concerned the political welfare, and private affections, of the people to whom they belonged.

ed. But say, my friends, does it not reflect some lustre on the fair sex, that their talents and virtues have still been most revered in periods of the greatest renown? And tell me, I beseech you, what age or country, distinguished in the annals of fame, has not received a part of that distinction from the numbers of women, whom it produced, conspicuous for their virtues and their talents? Look at this, in which you live: does it not derive a very considerable share of its reputation from the female pens, that eminently adorn it? Look into the history of the world at large: do not you find, that the female sex have, in a variety of ways, contributed largely to many of its most important events? Look into the great machine of society, as it moves before you: do not you perceive, that they are still among its principal springs? Do not their characters and manners deeply affect the passions of men, the interests of education, and those domestic scenes, where so much of life is past, and with which its happiness or misery is so intimately blended? Consult your own experience, and confess, whether you are not touched by almost every thing they do, or say, or look; and confess, whether their very foibles, and follies, do not often interest, and sometimes please you?

There cannot, I am persuaded, be many worse symptoms of degeneracy, in an enlightened age, than a growing indifference about the regards of reputable women, and a fashionable propensity to lessen the sex in general. Where this is the case, the decencies of life, the softnesses of love, the sweets of friendship, the nameless tender charities that pervade and unite the most virtuous form of cultivated society, are not likely to be held in high estimation: and when these fall into contempt, what is there left to polish, humanize, or delight mankind?

I am willing, indeed, to believe, that when thoughtless youths presume to laugh at women, it is not so much from any wicked incentive, as from an aim to display the powers of wit and ridicule, in imitation of those professed libertines, who having, among certain classes, acquired a name in that way, are ambitiously copied, by such as court the same kind of praise. With what pity have I sometimes listened to the low jests and miserable criticisms of striplings, on this subject; while they fancied, that, by adopting the style of their seniors in satire and licentiousness, they exhibited proofs of amazing proficiency in acuteness of remark, and knowledge of the world! But how has my compassion, both for them and their masters, been mingled with scorn, when I have seen both assume, in female company, the most respectful air, and the most complaisant behaviour; when I have heard them, on the entrance of an agreeable woman, break forth into the language of compliment and rapture, the moment after they had been loading the sex with abuse and derision!

The truth is, that neither the most frivolous, nor the most violent, declaimers against women can endure the thought of being neglected even by the meanest of them. The passion for importance is so strangely insatiable and inconsistent, as often to seek its gratification from the very persons, whom those it actuates pretend at other times to treat with disdain.

Suppose, Gentlemen, you were told that a woman had been speaking of you in the same unmerciful manner, in which multitudes of our sex pronounce upon hers; would you not complain of the sentence, and appeal from her tribunal? Most probably. But suppose, that on meeting any of you, immediately after, she should alter her style, assume a language diametrically opposite, and express the highest approbation in the smoothest tones and with the softest airs of female blandishment; would not so arrant a coquet deserve your abhorrence? Undoubtedly. And yet,—shall I speak out?—I am by no means certain, that those of your number, who most affect to despise the sex, would not be enchanted with the soothing of this very woman, more especially were she handsome. The credulity of loose men in similar circumstances, their boasting of the favours they have received, or would be thought to have received, and their exhibition of letters, presents, and gewgaws, from women who flatter their vanity to make sure of their purses, are sufficiently ridiculous. May we not add, that for those men to believe so implicitly in the sincerity of such artful creatures, where they themselves are the objects of their art, at the same instant in which they exult over them among their fellows, for giving credit to male adulation, demonstrates a weakness superlatively contemptible?

It proceeds, no doubt, in a great measure, from the mean opinion they entertain of female perception; in which, we will venture to say, they are often

often exceedingly mistaken. Where men are in question, it appears to me, that women not bewitched by passion, or not biassed by prejudice, are for the most part much deeper judges, than is generally supposed. Of this I am certain, that the least deserving of them take a pleasure in deriding to one another, and to their favourites, those fools of our sex, who at once calumniate and court theirs; while the worthy and the dignified frequently hear the smooth speeches, and plausible professions, made to them by numbers of men, just as they hear the passing winds, with perfect indifference, though they are not always at the pains to express it.

Among the absurdities of human pride, it is one of the greatest, that people under its influence are almost for ever deceived, themselves, by the very methods which, with the fullest confidence of success, they employ to deceive others. Giddy girls, and insignificant women, may be caught by the trite, unmeaning compliments of ignorant, or of dissolute men: but such men betray the narrowness of their views, no less than the vileness of their hearts, when they conclude, that they can impose alike on all females, as if none of them had understanding to despise nonsense, or virtue to detest licentiousness.

Having said this, shall I confess, my fair friends, that I have been not a little mortified, when I have observed some of you, whom I presumed to possess more spirit and sentiment, apparently delighted with the extravagant praises of those male parasites and impostors, knowing their characters, and in your most serious convictions disdaining them? Trust me, Ladies, you forget at such times what you owe to yourselves, as well as to the opinion of men of sense and honour, from whose attachment only you can derive real satisfaction. It is fit you should be told, that the undistinguishing approbation, if not seeming preference, you too often bestow upon the worst enemies of your sex, is as hurtful to your future establishment, as to your present appearance. I have known women of considerable merit, who have remained unconnected, and become forlorn, for no other reason but because they had given secret disgust to delicacy and discernment, by the allurements which they scattered, without discrimination or choice, amongst all the men of their acquaintance.

I just now mentioned the worst enemies of your sex. When they who have been accustomed to prey on beauty amongst individuals, scoff at virtue in all the rest, as nothing better than hypocrisy or affectation; is there not reason to apprehend, they would, in this manner, fain lessen to their own minds the guilt of their past conduct, and by throwing down, as far as in them lies, the barriers of female reputation, remove one great obstruction to their future depredations?

It is possible, indeed, that a man may, by long commerce with the worst part of the sex, become so depraved in his notions, as to disbelieve the existence of morals in the best. His infidelity on this article will be confirmed, if it has been his fortune to converse with courts, where luxury and duplicity are the mode, where truth and purity are rarely practised, and never known to be the means of preferment. The same inclination to question even the possibility of virtue in women will be too readily felt by such as, after losing their own at home, have visited countries from whence it is banished by universal levity and libertinism, while the established religion of those countries is only calculated to lead superficial thinkers into a contempt for better principles, and to relax, rather than strengthen, the obligations of duty. It is thus, I conceive, that we are chiefly to account for the opinions of a late celebrated writer, and many other men of the same stamp, in reference to the female character.

But need I remind those who now hear me, that equity, that reason, that common sense forbids us to take our estimate of the species from the most corrupt, or least significant, of them who compose it? Even self-love should teach us to judge as favourably as possible of our kind. To be connected with a race universally worthless, is, methinks, not a very flattering idea. To be born of mothers without virtue, or of suspicious virtue, can surely confer neither honour nor delight. Would not one imagine, that honest pride alone should prompt us to adopt different sentiments?

It is, you will allow, not very easy to comprehend the preposterous and gloomy, might I not have said the horrid and malignant, pleasure, which many take in fancying those bosoms to be hardened with avarice, blackened with falsehood, or embruted with sensuality, which, unless the contrary appears, should be supposed the chaste abodes of honour, veracity, and generous affection. What a turn of mind must that be, which is fond of figuring the darkest passions, the foulest demons, to lurk there where happier feelings and milder thoughts are disposed to behold the Virtues and the Graces disporting, like so many beautiful and benevolent angels.

Were there, in truth, no other reason for avoiding all intercourse with worthless women, would it not be quite sufficient, that from such connexions men are too generally tempted to suspect the principles of the virtuous? Tell us, ye votaries of Vice, ye who paint her with the smiling aspect of Pleasure, possessed of unrivalled attractions, surrounded with inexhaustible stores of delight, tell us, we conjure you, what she has to offer, as a proper compensation for the absence of that ineffable charm which attends the image of female innocence and sweetness? But we appeal to more competent judges; to such as have tried both sides, made the comparison, and fixed their choice for the better part. Let them decide, Whether, next to the joy arising from a consciousness of Virtue in their own breasts, there be any equal to the contemplation of her fairest forms in the behaviour of others; of those women in particular, from whose powers to please, to captivate, in nameless irresistible ways, she derives an additional loveliness.

Have any of you, my young auditors, worn away, by a course of riot, your sensibility to the enchantment you formerly found in such company? I pity you from my soul. I say not merely, that you have lost one of the finest perceptions of the mind: I go farther, and aver, that you are estranged from the most elegant enjoyments of the heart, from its tenderest wishes, its softest anxieties, its sweetest hopes. The superior endearments of female friendship, the triumphant sense of possessing the affection of an intelligent and worthy woman, you, Sir, you are condemned never to know. Go, thou wretched man, and try if thou canst fill up their place by the mercenary carresses of prostitutes, and the applauses of unattached, unfeeling, hollow-hearted libertines. But I turn from so sad a survey to those happy youths who have hitherto escaped such contaminating influence.

As it is probable, that most of you will, after the confinement of the school, of the college, of an apprenticeship, or of whatever other early study, pass much of your time in the company of women, it deeply imports you to consider, with what sort of women you should associate. The infinite mischiefs attendant on communication with those miserable females, who have forfeited their honour, I will not now attempt to relate. At present I will take it for granted, that the sons of Reason should converse only with the daughters of Virtue.

Of these last the number is greater than many of you have been told; much greater than bad men, who judge from bad samples, will ever be persuaded to believe; and even greater than would be readily expected by the candid and virtuous themselves, were they to take their estimate from the general appearance of women in public life, instead of those private scenes where show and noise are excluded, where the flutter of fashion is forgotten in the silent discharge of domestic duties, and where females of real value are more solicitous to be amiable and accomplished, than alluring and admired.

Little, indeed, do those women consult either their own interest, or the reputation of their sex, who enter eagerly into the bustle of the mode, obtrude themselves on the gaze of the glittering throng, and sacrifice the decent reserves, and intellectual attainments, by which men of sentiment and delicacy are most taken, to the passion for dress, and visiting, and splendor, and prattling, and cards, and assemblies, and masquerades without end. The coxcombs of the age may be caught by such arts of display, as much as those can be so who are generally captivated with themselves. They, no doubt, will be flattered with what they suppose to be an offering presented at their shrine, a price paid for their admiration. But, depend upon it, my sisters, those men who are formed to be agreeable companions, faithful friends, and good husbands, will not be very forward to chuse their associates and partners for life, from the flaunting train of Vanity, or the insipid circles of Dissipation. Nor will it always be very easy to convince them, that while the open theatre of the world exhibits so many trivial and insipid characters of the female sex, its more retired situations abound with women of discretion and significance.

For my own share, I will confess, that I should not have thought so favourably

SIMPING.

I can't for my life guess the cause of this fuss, why there's Pipers and Fiddlers, while Robin and in general concerning the fair part of the creation, as I now think, had I formed my opinions on their subject in places of gay resort ; where simplicity, softness, a sedate carriage, and rational conversation, must usually give way to the boasted tone, and brilliant but illusive figure of the society in vogue, which seems to me a composition of frivolous talk, fantastic manners, expensive outside, servile imitation of the mode, incessant amusement, ruinous gaming, and eternal disguise. May I venture farther, and acknowledge my astonishment, when I have discovered that some sensible and deserving women, who in the country delighted all that came near them, by a style and deportment perfectly reasonable and highly engaging, yet appeared to forget themselves the moment they plunged in the diversions and tumults of the town. Their heads turned round in the whirl of a fashionable life ; and their hearts, which went forth to their friends in the quiet of retreat, shrunk and vanished out of sight in scenes, where they apprehended that sentiment, affection, confidence, would probably be objects of derision. So then, Ladies, you could resign those sweetest pleasures of the soul, for the reputation of appearing modish : you could bury your better feelings, and relinquish, for weeks and for months, your more respectable pursuits, to mix familiarly and habitually with the herd of inferior beings, that run mad after superficial amusements, and the poorest objects of low-souled ambition.

Do we mean, that you ought to shut yourselves up from all the resorts of what is called Genteel Company, which, to say the truth, is often but another name for well-dressed triflers ? We do not mean, we do not wish it. There are situations and connexions which would render it improper. To minds capable of reflection, the pageant, as it passes in review, may occasion many observations on the emptiness and perturbation of all but piety, worth, and heart-felt enjoyment. Nor is it altogether impossible, that a more correct appearance, a more composed address, friendly hints dropped by accident, improving remarks suggested by good sense, without the affectation of unseasonable gravity, may sometimes leave useful impressions, where they were least expected. We only complain, that the friends of Virtue should ever be so far intangled in the maze of modern impertinence, as to be afraid of living principally to themselves, to one another, and to the noblest purposes of their being.

Such, indeed, is the free system of manners in these days, as to render it difficult for a woman living in the world to keep that line of wise reserve, which leads most directly to female dignity and happiness. The customs of different countries and ages are known to have produced very different ideas on this point, as on a multitude of others. The opinion of him who affirmed, that a female's truest praise was her not being talked of at all, might be relished in ancient Greece, where the married women were in a manner secluded from society, being mostly confined to the interior apartments of their houses, and wholly engrossed by domestic occupations. According to our apprehensions, it is hard to conceive how a practice in appearance so uncourteous to the ladies, as well as unanimating to the men, could obtain amongst a people highly polished and uncommonly awake. Perhaps they judged, that the summit of female glory lay in breeding and training children for the commonwealth ; for that commonwealth, which was the great commanding object of their affection and zeal ; so that however a female here and there might be permitted to shine in the lights of science, and to charm by the powers of conversation, the studies necessary to this kind of eminence were considered, in general, as not very compatible with the tender cares, and arduous attentions, of wives and mothers, devoted to the prosperity of the state ; nor were women remarkable for those acquisitions usually regarded, as distinguished by their virtue.

In Rome matters were conducted with, what many of the sex would esteem, a more flattering indulgence : they were not only admitted to convivial intercourse with the men, but to public festivals, theatrical entertainments, and even military games ; where young virgins appeared openly with a freedom of attire, an exposition of beauty, and a boldness of manner, but ill consistent with the just standard of female decency and attraction ; though by these means they would, no doubt, acquire uncommon vigour and resolution, become more strongly interested in the achievements and honours of a warlike race, and be qualified in due time for giving birth to conquerors and heroes.

Even in Greece, where the wives were were subjected to severe restraints, the maidens, not excepting the daughters of the principal citizens, were accustomed to be seen in processions, dances, and gymnastic exercises, which, if not very improving to their virtue, would however contribute to strength of constitution, and gracefulness of demeanour, while they gave sufficient opportunity of studying to please the eyes of the male spectators.

The fair sex in those days being, on many occasions, respected as the judges and rewarders of many enterprises and magnanimous deeds, would naturally kindle, in the youth of their country, an emulation and ardour peculiarly conducive to the exalted flights of spirit and patriotism that marked the purest ages of antiquity.

When from those illustrious people we turn our eyes to the Eastern regions, what do we see but swarms of effeminate and voluptuous men, who are either tyrants or slaves; and of ignorant, idle, luxurious women, whose highest destination is to gratify the intemperate desires, or humour the proud caprices, of their masters; a set of wretches as arbitrary as they are sensual, and whose jealousy and insolence join with their want of taste and refinement to treat those poor imprisoned females, as merely subservient to their passions? Humanity and Virtue are afflicted at the view.

In some of the Western nations we are presented with a very different scene. It is the infirmity of our nature, to be almost always in extremes. In France the Women are supreme: they govern all from the court down to the cottage; and from their influence the men, at least in the more early periods of life, seem to derive their whole system of sentiments, inclinations, and manners. Can it be thought surprising, if the conceit and volatility of the former, continually nourished and flattered, should, in a climate which gives animal spirits light as air, infect the latter with a vanity, a giddiness, and an effeminacy, that characterize their youth to a proverb? But then, if I mistake not, it must happen in such a country, that when knowledge, good sense, observation, and sedate years take place, men will be found much the more courteous and amiable, as well as entertaining and accomplished, for their constant intercourse with a sex whom they are taught from the beginning to treat with attention and respect; a sex whose society in general, wherever it is cultivated with a proper regard for decorum and elegance, cannot fail to soften the temper, enliven the genius, and give an agreeable polish to the whole deportment.

That it is not more cultivated on such a footing in this country, has been often regretted by persons who despised very heartily the unmanly levity and loquacious nonsense of French coxcombs. Here the sexes meet with a greater or less degree of frequency and freedom; but for what purposes chiefly? Shall I be forgiven, if I tell the truth?—Why; to eat, and talk of eating, of the weather, or of the news; to visit, and practise forms; to play at cards, describe the fashions, and remark on the diversions of the season, or rather, for the most part, to repeat what they have heard others say about them; to partake in those diversions as often as they can; but both in public and private to amuse themselves more than one another; to gratify the love of dress, and display the pride of opulence. In the mean while, what barrenness of sentiment, what want of taste, vivacity, reflexion! How little interchange of minds, or reciprocation of those winning regards on the part of the men, and interesting manners on that of the women, which give the communion between the sexes its greatest beauty and allurements!

Considering the fund of solid sense, and original humour, which has long distinguished the writers of this nation; considering the valuable improvements in the philosophy of the human mind, in several branches of science, in composition, style, taste, and the fine arts, which have been visibly advancing for a course of years; is it not somewhat strange, that the conversation of the upper classes, and of those individuals in the middle ranks who have been favoured by their education, does not in general take a better tincture, and exhibit a richer vein? But when we have made the just exceptions, which we with pleasure acknowledge to be many, it must still be confessed, though not without pain, that the endless dissipation, and enervating luxury, of the times, have produced a languor of understanding, a feebleness of affection, and flatness of spirit, which diffuse a mortifying insipidity over the intercourse of the sexes: they meet without attraction; they converse without delight; and they part without concern. I describe the common process. Men and women of enlightened enlightened understanding, and polite behaviour, are in all countries and ages as like one another, as they are different from the vulgar of whatever rank.

That the company of silly women must necessarily increase, amongst youth, the evil we complain of, that the company of artful women is always dangerous and often fatal, and that association with those females whose intellects and principles correspond not with their exterior-allurements, has a tendency to effeminate and to corrupt, it were idle to deny, it were hurtful to conceal. We would carefully guard you on all these quarters; and were such persons only to be met with, it would be our duty, instead of recommending, to warn you against intimacy with the sex. But do not, my brothers, do not believe those wanton buffoons, or those worthless satirists, who would labour, from whatever motive, to lessen your esteem for the loveliest part of God's workmanship, by confounding, in their indiscriminate, and therefore cruel, censures, the handmaids of Wisdom with the handmaids of Folly.

End of Part I.

The following Letter appeared in the Newspapers from Dr. Manningham, on Jan. 30.

SOME of the Public Papers, and Private Letters received by me, require an Answer from me relative to a paragraph in your Paper of the 23d instant, where my name was at length in the transaction of the late Robert Perreau. As you have so particularly mentioned my name, hope you will insert the underwritten true state of the transaction: It essentially differs from what your and other Papers have related.

"Mr. Robert Perreau did apply to me for advancing money to him on Mr. William Adair's bond. Had he asked for the loan of two or three hundred pounds, I should readily have supplied him, upon his own word or acknowledgment. He asked for a large sum (two or three thousand pounds): on my replying, that I had not so large a sum, he said, "Perhaps your brother has, or some of your friends;" and he should be greatly obliged to me for it for a short time, the security being unexceptionable, for it was Mr. Adair's bond. I asked what Adair? He replied William. I then said, I knew Mr. William Adair well; but wondered why he could want money; adding, I could carry it to Crofts the bankers, and have any sum on such security. Mr. Perreau said, "Mr. Adair would not chuse an application to Crofts, wishing it to be a secret that he (Mr. Adair) had given a bond:" and Mr. Perreau strenuously requested secrecy from me, that he (Mr. Perreau) had offered me a bond of Mr. Adair's: I never saw the bond. I wish I had; knowing Mr. Adair's writing, I might have discovered to Mr. Perreau his deluded infatuation, and been the happy means of preventing the fatal issue. I saw Mr. Perreau many times after this transaction, thinking no more about it, and we were on the best terms of friendship. I saw Mr. Adair frequently after Mr. Perreau had tendered me the bond. I kept the business secret, as Mr. Perreau had requested. When the other bonds were discovered, I mentioned this affair (as now related) to Mr. Adair and others; blaming myself for want of curiosity, in not looking upon the bond; which if I had done, probably Mr. Robert Perreau might have discovered his error in time. To this Account I can justly assign my name,

And am, Sir,

Jermyn-Street, Your humble servant,
Jan. 18. T. MANNINGHAM.

An Evening Paper adds, We are assured from that authority which we cannot doubt, that during the pendency of the late state of the unhappy Brothers before the Privy Council, Lord Weymouth received a letter from a celebrated Coadjutrix in their affairs; desiring his Lordship, if he had any doubt of the guilt of one of the brothers, to ask such and such particulars as she pointed out, of such and such Gentlemen. His Lordship is said to have made his enquiries accordingly, and received every possible satisfaction.

The Natural History of Hair.

HAIR is a sort of covering that, more or less, nature has provided for the greatest part of animals, except the soles of the feet and palms of the hand, either for ornament, or defence, against the weather.

Hair properly lives, and receives nutriment to fill up, and distend it like the other parts of the body; however, this growth is of a different kind from that of the rest of the vessels, and is not immediately derived therefrom, nor reciprocated therewith. It grows like plants out of the earth, or as some plants shoot from the parts of others; from which though they draw the nutriment, each has its distinct life and æconomy.

Hairs

Hairs are observed by the microscope (an optical instrument found out about the year 1628, at the same time with the circulation of the blood) to be hollow, and furnished with a multitude of vessels; yet however they appear smooth to the naked eye, the microscope shews them knotted like some sort of grass, and to send out branches from their joints.

The branching of the hair is pretty visible at the extremities by the help of the microscope; for it is very apt to split, especially if worn too long, or kept too dry, for which reason it appears like a brush.

Each hair has a little bulbous, or other root, in the skin, which is sometimes plucked away with it. The hair is commonly reputed as acrement; and whatever the nature of its nourishment be, it seems to be more simple than the other humours of the body: for long after death, when all other parts, and humours, are corrupted, the hair will vegetate or grow.

The size of hairs depends on the magnitude of the pores they issue from: if they are straight the hairs are so too; if those be oblique, or sinous, the hairs are curled. Their length depends on the quantity of proper humour to feed them, and their colour on the quality of that humour: whence at different periods of life the colour usually differs.

Hair, since perukes have been in use, (king Charles the Second's picture being the first I ever saw the figure of a wig in) makes a considerable article in commerce. That of the growth of the northern countries is much preferred to that of the more southern ones.

The merit of good hair consists in its being well fed, and neither too coarse nor too slender; the bigness rendering it less susceptible of an artificial curl, and disposing it rather to frizzle; and the smallness making its curl of too short duration. It should be about twenty-five inches long, and as it falls short of this it decreases in value.

Hair is sold from 5 s. to 5 l. an ounce, according to its quality. The grey is most valuable; next to that the white, &c. The scarcity of grey and white hair, put the dealers in that commodity upon artificial methods of rendering hair of these colours. They spread the hair to bleach on the grass, after washing it first in a lixivious water: they also dye hair with bismuth; both which artifices are detected by boiling and drying it.

Review of New Publications.

A R T I C L E I.

HINTS to gentlemen of landed property.
By Nath. Kent. 5s. Dodfley.

Gentlemen and farmers will find in this volume, many valuable hints on the following particulars. Of the application of soil to its right use; draining; natural and artificial grasses; improving meadow and pastures; turneps; cole and rape seed; hops; building and repairs; timber and planting; advantages of small farms; importance of cottages; distress of the poor, and increase of rates.

Of the advantages resulting from small farms, and those of the most profitable size described, Mr. Kent thus speaks, "Every speculative Englishman who travels through the Austrian Netherlands, is astonished at the great population of that country, and at the sight of the markets, which are plentiful beyond description. Upon enquiring into the internal state, and regulation of the country, he finds that there are no large farms, no class of men who pass under the character of gentlemen-farmers, acquiring large fortunes merely by superintending the business of farming, but that the whole country is divided into much smaller portions than land is with us, and occupied by a set of laborious people, who in general work for themselves, and live very much upon a footing of equality.

This seems a presumptive proof, that agriculture, when it is thrown into a number of hands, becomes the life of industry, the source of plenty, and the fountain of riches to a country; but that monopolized, and grasped into few hands, it must dishearten the bulk of mankind, who are reduced to labour for others instead of themselves; must lessen the produce, and greatly tend to general poverty.

I shall not attempt wholly to account for the amazing increased price of provisions with us. There are, undoubtedly, many causes which contribute to it; but it is very evident that no single cause affects it, so much as the destructive practice which has prevailed, for near half a century back, of demolishing small farms. This absurd custom, which is not without its advocates, draws its birth from ill-digested calculations; is attended with great cruelty to individuals; and ends in considerable private loss, and public calamity.

The specious inducements are, to avoid trouble, to save expences in repairs, pairs, and to secure the rent by having more capital tenants.

Granting these arguments their utmost weight, they may be easily confuted.

Those who contribute towards the destruction of small farms, can have very little reflection. If they have, their feelings are not to be envied. Where this has been the practice, we see a vast number of families reduced to poverty and misery, the poor rates much increased, the small articles of provision greatly diminished in quantity and number, and consequently augmented in price.

The increase of farms has a general bad tendency, for as soon as the little schools of industry are grasped into the hands of an over-grown, rapacious farmer, the former occupiers are, at once, all reduced to the state of day-labourers; and when their health or strength fails, there is but one resource; they, and their children, are thrown upon the parish. This has undoubtedly swelled the rates to their present enormous height, more than any cause whatever.

The mechanic and manufacturer next feel the blow. The market wears a different face. The vast number of poultry, the quantity of pork, and a variety of other small articles, of provision, are no longer supplied in their former abundance. The great farmer raises no more of these, than are necessary for his own consumption; because his wife and children will not take the trouble and care of them, or condescend to attend the market, like the wives and children of little farmers. His views are formed upon a large scale, and every thing flows from him in a wholesale channel. And as no man can execute any very extensive business, so well as that which lies in a more contracted space, he must, when he has a great deal upon his hands, neglect many small objects, partly for want of time, and partly because they appear trivial in their nature: and many trifles added together, make a large deficiency upon the whole.

The case is different upon the small farm. Here the tenant's great dependence rests upon trifles merely; and therefore it behoves him to make the most of every thing. As he has no great space to superintend, it lies under his eye at all times, and seasons; he seizes all minute advantages; cultivates every obscure corner; generally accumulates more manure in proportion to his land; and considering his animal as well as vegetable produce, has likewise in that a greater proportion.

February, 1776.

He does great part of his work with his own hands; and every man works more chearfully, zealously, and diligently for himself, than for another. His wife and children are likewise of great service to him, especially if his gains depend much upon a dairy. And, in general, the children of these little farmers prove the most useful people the country produces. The girls make the best dairymaids; the boys the best gentlemen's bailiffs; the best head-men in larger farms; the best persons to superintend, and manage cattle; and, in a word, the most regular servants, in most capacities.

Upon an estate of one thousand pounds a year, I wish to see something like the following proportion: one farm of 160l. one of 120l. one of 100l. two of 80l. two of 60l. two of 50l. three of 40l. and four of 30l. each. This would be sixteen farms upon a thousand pounds a year, and would be a profitable division to an owner, and to the public. But, instead of this, the generality of large estates do not support above a third part of these families. And I will venture to assert, that the poor rates will be much higher in the latter, than in the former mode of allotment; because a great many families, which would get a decent livelihood upon the farms of 30l. 40l. and 50l. a year, come to the parish, as I have before observed, when they are deprived of this method of supporting themselves.

V. On Illicit Love, written among the Ruins of Godstow Nunnery, near Oxford, by John Brand, A. B. 1s. 6d. Wilkie.

Godstow is at present a ruin on the margin of the Isis, at a small distance from Oxford. It was formerly a house of nuns, famous perhaps on no account so much as for having been the burial place of Rosamond, daughter of Lord Clifford, the beautiful paramour of Henry the second. This monarch is said to have built a labyrinth at Woodstock to conceal her from his jealous queen, who, during his absence, when he was called away by an unnatural rebellion of his sons, at the supposed instigation of their mother, found means to get access to her, and compelled her to swallow poison. Frequent walks in this delightful recess, sacred to the moments of contemplation, suggested the following thoughts, for the publication of which, the alarming progress of lewdness, and consequently of licentiousness of manners, which indeed threatens the dissolution of our state, should be accepted as an apology.

The following extract is selected from this agreeable poem for our fair readers. Ah hapless maid! th' ætherial Power began, [ran!]

VI. Adventures of Alonso, containing some striking Anecdotes of the present prime Minister of Portugal, 2 vols. 5s. Bew.

The most striking anecdotes we shall select next month: the adventures contain some pleasing particulars, and extraordinary events; some of them too extraordinary to be true; however, at last, Alonso is reconciled to his father, survives him, and inherits great wealth. His crime was an intrigue with a married lady, and running away with her, which involved both in numerous evils. Warned by their errors and sufferings, may others avoid their evil footsteps.

VII. A Letter to Lord Cathcart, concerning the Recovery of Persons drowned and seemingly dead, by Dr. William Cullen. 1s. 6d. Murray.

The author has displayed great judgment and humanity: he observes, that life doth not cease immediately upon the cessation of the action of the lungs and heart, and the consequent ceasing of the circulation of the blood, but on a certain condition in the nerves and muscular fibres, by which they are sensible and irritable, and on which the action of the heart itself depends. As long as this subsists it is presumed, that the action of the heart and lungs, the circulation of the blood, and therefore all the functions of life may also, though they have many of them long ceased, be again entirely restored. The directions for the recovery of persons drowned, are judicious, and very similar to those already recommended by the London society for the same purpose.

Account of a most remarkable and dreadful Accident, taken from the Paris Gazette of Dec. 5, 1775.

ON the 15th of September last the Modeste Frigate, commanded by captain Gayat, sailed from Marfeilles for Cape Francois. On the 19th, about half past eleven o'clock, at night, the vessel was struck by lightning, the greatest part of the crew thrown down, several seamen wounded, and two horses that were on board killed dead on the spot. A sulphurous stench and a thick smoke, that came from the hold, soon proclaimed the danger. It was in vain to throw water, the fire encreased; the captain ordered the two boats to be hoisted out, one of them being got out, the crew pressed so precipitately, that it sunk; the fire seized the other, and thus deprived the crew of their last and only resource. The progress of the fire was rapid, the main-mast half burned, fell into the sea, and the whole after-part of the ship was in flames. The sorrowful remainder of the ship's company pressed forward to the fore-castle, as their last asylum, stretching forth their hands to the shore, which was not above four leagues distant, but to which they could not attain, as the wind blew directly off the land. They had no longer time to deliberate, they found they must either perish by the fire, or throw themselves into the sea, with the feeble hopes of being saved on some of the wreck of the vessel; this latter part they embraced at about half past twelve; part of them got upon the main-mast and some planks, which formed a kind of raft, namely captain Gayat and thirty-four others, who remained four days in that dreadful situation, expecting every instant to be swallowed up by the waves.

The cabin-boys and other lads fell off the first, the more weak fell successively, and by their fall advertised their companions that they would not be long ere they followed them. Several became delirious. One asked the captain who was to be the first slaughtered to serve the rest for food?—Another very calmly, asked for money to buy bread to satisfy his hunger. And these poor wretches had at first to confront the cannon of two ships, which went off as the fire burned down to the gun-deck and heated the ordnance.

At length, on the 23d of September, about ten at night, they perceived by the light of the moon, a vessel. They endeavoured, but in vain, to make themselves be heard by hailing the ship; failing in this attempt, two seamen resolved to swim towards it, and by the help of the sprit-sail yard, they got within hail. It proved to be an English ship, commanded by one Thomas Hubbard, who immediately ordered out his long-boat, and took up captain Gayat and eighteen others (all that remained alive out of the thirty-six) one of them a young man, named Fauquette, as soon as he came on board, lifting to his lips a glass of wine, which was given to comfort him, was suddenly taken with a kind of convulsion, bit the glass with his teeth, and dropped down dead at the feet of his distressed companions.

We have since learned, that a Dutch vessel had taken up eleven of this unfortunate crew, and carried them into Genoa; but have not yet any certain account when or where they were taken up, or what they suffered before they were relieved.

Five others, after suffering inexpressible hardships, were perceived by an Algerine corsair, who took them up. Their number at first was fifteen, who had got on the bowsprit, on which they remained six days without any food, or any kind of liquid but sea-water or their own urine, ten of these unhappy people perished successively, the other five were received by the Algerine captain, with the greatest humanity and tenderness; and having learned from them that others of the crew were doubtless in the same distressful condition, the corsair rowed about for several leagues, but in vain. They found a mast, but no person thereon, the people having been taken up by captain Hubbard. In spite of all the care of the Algerines one of the five died at the end of two days; the four others were conducted to Algiers, and presented to the dey, who sent them immediately to the French consul. The humanity of the Algerine captain did him great honour, and shewed that all are not Barbarians who live in Barbary.

A Copy of the Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union, entered into by the Delegates of the several Colonies of New-Hampshire, Massachusetts, &c. &c.

in General Congress met at Philadelphia, May 10th, 1775.

A R T I C L E I.

THE name of this confederacy shall henceforth be, the United colonies of North America.

II. The United colonies hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other; binding on themselves and their posterity, for their common defence against their enemies, for the security of their liberties and properties, the safety of their persons and families, and their mutual and general welfare.

III. That each colony shall enjoy and retain as much as it may think fit to retain of its own present laws, customs, rights, privileges, and peculiar jurisdictions, within its own limits; and may amend its own constitution, as shall seem best to its own assembly or convention.

IV. That for the more convenient management of general interests, delegates shall be elected annually in each colony, to meet in general congress, at such time and place as shall be agreed on in the next preceding congress. Only where particular circumstances do not make a deviation necessary, it is understood to be a rule, that each succeeding congress is to be held in a different colony, till the whole number be gone through, and so in perpetual rotation; and that accordingly the next congress after the present shall be held at Annapolis in Maryland.

V. That the power and duty of the Congress shall extend to the determining on war and peace, the entering into alliances, the reconciliation with Great-Britain, the settling all disputes between Colony and Colony, if any should arise, and the planting new Colonies where proper. The Congress shall also make such general ordinances thought necessary to the general welfare, of which particular assemblies cannot be competent, viz. those that may relate to our general commerce or general currency, to the establishment of posts, the regulation of our common forces: The Congress shall also have the appointment of all officers, civil and military, appertaining to the General Confederacy, such as general treasurer, secretary, &c. &c.

VI. All charges of wars, and all other general expences to be incurred for the common welfare, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which is to be supplied by each Colony, in proportion tion to its number of male polls between 16 and 60 years of age: The taxes for paying that proportion are to be laid and levied by the laws of each Colony.

VII. The number of Delegates to be elected, and sent to the Congress by each Colony, shall be regulated from time to time by the number of such polls returned; so as that one Delegate may be allowed for every 5000 polls. And the Delegates are to bring with them to every Congress an authenticated return of the number of polls in their respective Colonies, which is to be taken for the purposes above-mentioned.

VIII. At every meeting of the Congress, one half of the members returned, exclusive of proxies, shall be necessary to make a quorum; and each Delegate at the Congress shall have a vote in all cases; and if necessarily absent, shall be allowed to appoint any other Delegate from the same Colony to be his proxy, who may vote for him.

IX. An executive Council shall be appointed by the Congress out of their own body, consisting of 12 persons, of whom in the first appointment, one-third, viz. four, shall be for one year, four for two years, and four for three years; and as the said terms expire, the vacancies shall be filled up by appointments for three years, whereby one third of the members will be changed annually; and each person who has served the term of three years as Counsellor, shall have a respite of three years before he can be elected again. This Council, of whom two thirds shall be a quorum, in the recess of the Congress, is to execute what shall have been enjoined thereby; to manage the general continental business and interests, to receive applications from foreign countries, to prepare matters for the consideration of the Congress, to fill up, pro tempore, continental offices that fall vacant, and to draw on the general treasurer for such monies as may be necessary for general services, and appropriated by the Congress to such services.

X. No Colony shall engage in an offensive war with any nation of Indians, without consent of the Congress, or Great Council above-mentioned, who are first to consider the justice and necessity of such war.

XI. A perpetual alliance, offensive and defensive is to be entered into, as soon as may be, with the Six Nations; their limits ascertained, and to be secured to them; their lands not to be encroached on; nor any private or colony purchase to be made by them hereafter to be held good, nor any contract for lands to be made, but between the Great Council of the Indians at Onondaga and the General Congress. The boundaries and lands of all the other Indians shall also be ascertained and secured to them in the same manner; and persons appointed to reside among them in proper districts, who shall take care to prevent injustice in the trade with them; and be enabled at our general expence, by occasional small supplies, to relieve their personal wants and distresses; and all purchases from them shall be by the Congress, for the general advantage and benefit of the United Colonies.

XII. As the new institutions may have imperfections, which only time and experience can discover, it is agreed that the General Congress, from time to time, shall propose such amendments of this Constitution as may be found necessary; which being approved by a majority of the Colony Assemblies, shall be equally binding with the rest of the articles of this Confederation.

XIII. Any and every Colony from Great-Britain upon the continent of North-America, not at present engaged in our association, may, upon application, and joining the said association, be received into the Confederation, viz. Quebec, St. John's, Nova-Scotia, Bermudas, and the East and West Floridas, and shall thereupon be entitled to all the advantages of our union, mutual assistance, and commerce.

These Articles shall be proposed to the several Provincial Conventions or Assemblies, to be by them considered; and, if approved, they are advised to empower their Delegates to agree and ratify the same in the ensuing Congress; after which the union thereby established is to continue firm, till the terms of reconciliation proposed in the Petition of the last Congress to the King are agreed to; till the Acts, since made, restraining the American commerce and fisheries, are repealed; till reparation is made for the injury done to Boston by shutting up its ports; for burning Charlestown; and for the expence of this unjust war; and till all the British troops are withdrawn from America. On the arrival of these events, the Colonies are to return to their former connexions and friendship with Great Britain; but on failure thereof, this Confederation is to be perpetual.

An Election Ball in Poetical Letters, in the Zomerzetsbire Dialect, from Mr. Inkle, a Freeman of Bath, to his Wife at Gloucester: With a Poetical Address to John Miller, Esq; at Bath-easton Villa. By the Author of the New Bath Guide.

The first Ode of the first Book of Horace imitated.

To JOHN MILLER, Esq;

MILLER, 1 whom fair Ierne bore
To grace Britannia's happier shore,
2 Who's genius guides, whose counsel guards
The labours of Bathonian bards,
Survey mankind, and each you'll view
His various path of joy pursue.

There are, in 3 Phaetons who smoke ye,
4 Collecting dust enough to choke ye,
With elbows square, and nodding heads,
And long-tail'd scrambling quadrupeds
Whip round the post—turn sharp—cut neat—
Despise—and frighten all they meet;
Or studious of th' Olympic races,
Keep half a running horse at * Scrase's,
Hedging, and odds, and bets their theme—
By which some knowing ones, I deem,
With zones around their necks have vaulted
5 Tow'rs heav'n, above their peers exalted.

The alderman who pants to grace
6 The golden chain, the sword, and mace;
7 The gripping hunks, whose barns contain
Full many a year's well-hoarded grain,
8 Yet anxious to encrease his store,
Grubs his paternal fields for more,
Would ne'er the boisterous waves be tost on,
To meet their dearest friends at Boston;
9 Though all the treasures were consign'd them,

Her hapless exiles leave behind them,
10 In stoutest bark would ne'er sustain,
11 The horrors of th' Atlantic main.

12 Secure from wars, and dangerous seas
Colonel Jaghire enjoys his ease;
Buys land, and beever, with Indian gold,
Which some poor English 'Squire has sold;
Kings, lords, and commons he defies,
13 "The town is all my own, he cries,

"That cursed cli mate I've been hurt in,
"And Nabob-making grows uncertain—
"This snug retreat I'm safe from harm in,— "How sweet that wood! that lawn how

But ah! his passion soon returns,
With restless flames his bosom burns;
14 His bark he rigs, resolv'd once more,
The distant Ganges to explore,
Rather than on his native ground
15 To starve—on fourscore thousand pound.
16 Oft' will you meet old General Drone:
A character at Bath well known;
The rooms and coffee-house he haunts,
17 Drink sometimes tea, and sometimes

Nantz:

Complaining of the gripes and vapours,
He'll ask "what news you've in the papers;
Then cry, "such measures we're pursuing,
"This nation's on the brink of ruin:"—
But urge him to explain her wrongs,—
Down fall the poker and the tongs;
He hums, and haws, and recommends—a——Prescription for the—Influenza;
In Summer, lounging at Spring-Garden, 18
In Winter, ev'ry door bombarding,
With morning visits duly paid
Down from the Crescent to Parade,
19 His head he'll in the pump-room poke
To catch some stale, unmeaning joke,
With news and nonsense for the day,
20 To drive his irksome hours away.

20 Pierc'd with the fife's, and trumpet's voice,
Britannia's warlike youth rejoice;
21 The blended sounds transport their ear,
22 While trembling, anxious mothers fear—
These heroes should desert their quarters,
To Scotland to entice their daughters.

23 The northern blast, and driving rains
Sir Hardy Thickset well sustains;
24 Whether the hind, or wily fox
His fleet hounds urge o'er vales and rocks,
He drives the chase with perseverance,
25 Nor heeds his tender wife's endearance,
At night returning to console her—
With feats of Bowman and of Jowler.

25 For me—the verdant ivy Guerdon
(Which you, Sir, have my brows conferr'd on)
With many an artless rhyme I jingle,
26 Gives me with loftier bards to mingle:
27 Me, to enjoy thy cool cascade,
Thy nodding grove, and checker'd shade,

1 Amox rescit rates
Quassas, 15 indocilis pauperiem pati.
16 Est qui 17 nec veteris pocula Massici,
2 Nec partem solido demere de die
Spernit; 18 nunc viridi membra sub arbute
Stratus;

19 nunc ad aquæ lene caput sacræ.
20 Multos castra juvant, & lituo tubæ
21 Permissus senitus, 22 bellaque matribus Detestata.

23 Manet sub Jove frigido
Venator ateneræ conjugis immemor:
24 Deus visa est catulis cervæ fidelibus,
Seu rupit teretis Marsus aper plagas.
25 Me doctarum Hederæ præmia frontium
26 Diis miscet superis: 27 me gelidum nemus,

And

28 And view the smiling nymphs advance,
 29 To join with thee the festive dance,
 (While every charm of art and nature Conspires to grace thy Fete Champetre)
 Thy kind indulgence has allow'd,
 30 And sets me 'bove th' ignoble crowd;
 31 Content, if sweet Euterpe deign
 To hear my humble pipe/complain;
 Or when beside the Winter fire,
 With careless hand I sweep the lyre,
 32 The gay fantastic Polyhymny
 Visit the corner of my chimney,
 Inspiring notes of joy and mirth,
 That please, and perish in their birth:
 33 But if thy fair, thy matchless dame
 Approve my verse, and stamp my fame,
 In concert with well-judging Riggs,
 Assign to me her myrtle sprigs,
 And lead me through th' Aonian path
 To join the vocal swans of Bath,
 Not * Madge in all her glory'drest,
 Shall rear to high her tow'ring crest,
 34 I'll soar above all vulgar eyes,
 And bear my plumage to the skies.

The

The History of the present Session of the Irish Parliament (Continued from p. 63.)

Saturday, Dec. 16.

MR. solicitor-general presented heads of a bill for licensing hawkers and pedlars; as did Sir Lucius O'Brien, heads of a bill to continue the act for granting a bounty on the exportation of corn.

The house in a committee (Dr. Ratcliffe in the chair) went through the heads of a bill for the exchange of Glebe lands, and ordered the same to the lord lieutenant: and also made a further progress in the White-boy bill.

Mr. Mason reported the resolutions of the committee of the whole house, on the petitions of lord Clive, Mr. Ellis, and Mr. Jenkinson, (See page 62) when it was agreed that the expence of executing the office of vice treasurer should not exceed three thousand five hundred pounds a year; and of the office of clerk of the pells, the sum of three hundred and fifty pounds a year.

Monday, Dec. 18.] The house went into a committee, (Mr. Warden Flood in the chair) on heads of a bill for the better ascertaining the fees to high sheriffs, deputy sheriffs, clerks of the crown, clerks of the peace, gaolers, and others, upon discharging prisoners on crown prosecutions. The committee was empowered to receive a clause to settle the salaries of some county treasurers; that for the county of Tipperary had been formerly allowed 40*l.* a year; it was proposed to augment it to 80*l.* a year, and after great diversity of opinions it was settled at 70*l.*

Sir John Blaquiere said he had formerly thrown out, that he conceived it to be the universal wish of gentlemen, that no transmisses should be sent over after Christmas; but he had since been assured by several respectable members, that the many important businesses before the house could not be gone through before the recess. It was therefore thought proper not to introduce the revenue bill before Christmas; yet it were to be wished that some day should be limited for the introduction of private bills, and hinted a fortnight after the recess. But no question was put upon it.

Mr. Burton (of Carlow) presented heads of a bill for incorporating a company of subscribers for promoting and carrying on the navigation of the river Barrow, and to enable them to regulate the trade thereof.

A farther progress was made (in a committee) on the heads of a bill to prevent and punish tumultuous risings.

Tuesday, Dec. 19.] The house went into a committee, (Mr. Langrishe in the chair) on heads of a bill for the relief of the creditors of William Howard.—This bill is intended to include the said Howard in the bankrupt act, and make the effects of Abraham Grear responsible to the creditors of both: Mr. Grear was heard by council against the bill.

The house went into a committee, Sir Lucius O'Brien in the chair, on heads of a bill to continue for seven years the bounty on the exportation of corn, and went through the same.

When the speaker had resumed the chair, it was ordered that the house, with their speaker, do attend the lord lieutenant with those heads of a bill, and request that they may be transmitted into Great Britain in due form.
February, 1776.

Mr. Bourke jun. presented heads of a bill for the better regulating the Work-house and Foundling hospital, and the funds thereof.

The house then went into a committee, (Mr. Neville in the chair,) on heads of a bill for establishing a militia for the defence of this kingdom.

Mr. Shiel presented heads of a bill to enable the magistrates of the county of Dublin to act in the city, and those of the city to act in the county.

Wednesday, Dec. 20.] Mr. Langrishe presented heads of a bill to explain and amend certain acts for the better supplying the city of Dublin with corn, meal, and flour. Committed for to-morrow.

The house resolved into a committee, (Mr. Langrishe in the chair,) and finished the heads of a bill to prevent and punish tumultuous risings.

Dr. Clement presented a petition from the corporation for maintaining and employing the poor in the county of the city of Dublin, setting forth the public utility of the house of industry, and praying assistance for carrying it on; which was read and referred to a committee.

Mr. Malone presented the following five money bills, returned from England, viz.

1. A bill for granting to his majesty an additional duty on beer, ale, strong waters, wine, tobacco, &c.

2. A bill for granting to his majesty several duties upon vellum, parchment, and paper.

3. A bill for granting to his majesty several lean duties.

4. A bill for granting annuities to such persons as shall voluntarily subscribe towards raising the sum of 175,000*l.* And,

5. A bill for granting to his majesty an additional duty upon the several goods and merchandizes therein mentioned (on corn, meal, and flour imported.)

These bills were severally read, and ordered to receive a second reading to-morrow.

Dr. Clement moved for a committee to compare the bills returned with the transmisses, and report any and what alterations have been made; which was appointed accordingly.

The house then went into a committee, (Mr. Lloyd in the chair,) on heads of a bill to make perpetual the act for preventing delays of justice by reason of parliament. The committee generally approved the purport of the bill, but several gentlemen thought it better to continue it for ten years, which was agreed to, and the amendments made accordingly.

Thursday, Dec. 21.] The bill to grant the old and new additional duties, was read a second time.

On the question being put that the bill be committed, Dr. Clement reported from the committee of comparison, that this money bill had been altered in England, by leaving out the two clauses relative to the 4000 troops allowed to be sent abroad, according to his excellency's message; and the question passed in the negative.

Mr. Malone moved that this bill be rejected, which was carried nem. con.

Mr. Ogle then moved, that the bill be burnt before the door of the parliament-house, by the hands of the common hangman, and that the sheriffs of Dublin be ordered to see it done.

Mr. Malone replied, the bill was returned under the great seal of England, and it would be a great indignity to it.

Mr. Robert French was against the motion; he could wish he said, the house would act with firmness, but it should also regard its own dignity.

Mr. Ogle answered, the great seal would help to burn it; and he never should regard the great seal when it was affixed to an affront to the house.

Mr. solicitor-general said he did not imagine any affront was intended by the alteration.

Mr. Ogle replied, it was a great affront to refuse, what the benevolence of parliament had granted in compliance with a request of his majesty. It was also an affront to a right honourable gentleman, (Sir John Blaquiere) and it was offered by the head of the Bloomsbury gang, (Mr. Rigby) in revenge for what was said by the right honourable gentleman, against that man's insolence in urging in the British parliament that it could tax Ireland; and in this case he must bear testimony, and give his praise to the real candor and honest zeal of the right hon. gentleman;—he then withdrew his motion.

Mr. Malone then presented new heads of a bill in the room of that which was rejected, which were read and committed for that afternoon.

The stamp bill was then read a second time, and rejected nem. con. on Dr. Clement's reporting these words, and such commissioners and inferior officers as shall be appointed by the lord lieutenant, had been added in England.

Mr. Malone then presented new heads of a stamp bill, which were read and committed for that afternoon.

The bill for levying the loan duties.

The bill for the new tontine, and

The bill for granting a duty on the importation of corn, meal and flour, were severally read a second time, and committed for tomorrow.

The house then went into a committee, Mr. Malone in the chair, on the new stamp-bill.

Mr. Bourke, jun. moved to amend a clause, by adding words to the same purport with those added in England.

Mr. Ogle, Mr. Ponsonby, Mr. Dillon, Sir Lucius O'Brien and Mr. Bushe opposed the amendment, as re-echoing the alteration made in Great Britain; Mr. solicitor-general and Mr. attorney-general defended it, as necessary, and not giving any new power to the lord lieutenant, but solely to replace such officers as may die or be removed:

The question was put on the amendment, Ayes, 61; Noes, 39.

The heads of a bill being gone through, Mr. Malone moved that the report be now received; this was opposed, and the house divided, Ayes, 61; Noes, 39.

The report was then made, and the heads of a bill ordered to his excellency.

The house then went into a committee, (Mr. Malone in the chair,) on the new heads of a bill for the old and new additional duties.

These heads of a bill had been brought in, at the request of several gentlemen, exactly the same of those sent over to England, but those in administration had expressed a desire that the two clauses omitted in the transcripts should also be omitted in this bill.

When the question was put that the preamble be postponed, Sir Lucius O'Brien read an amendment to the preamble, containing a recital of the message requesting the 4000 men and the cheerful compliance of the house. A debate then ensued, whether the preamble be postponed or not, which lasted near three hours. Mr. William Brabazon Ponsonby, thought the old preamble would be sufficient, as did also Mr. Yelverton; but Mr. Burgh was of opinion the amendment was necessary. He said he supposed the reason why the English attorney-general had cut out the two clauses, was because they said it should be lawful for his majesty to take 4000 men out of the 12000 men stipulated to be left at all times in this kingdom for its defence; whereas that officer might think the royal prerogative could do it without the authority of parliament. On this ground the tenure of keeping 12000 men in this kingdom hung on a very slender thread; the house was in a critical situation if they sent the bill just as it was sent back to them, they sacrificed their privileges; if they did not, but reinstated those clauses, they risked not only the bill, but might open a dangerous dispute with a nation stronger than this. A middle way ought therefore be adopted, and the best medium would be to cut out the clauses, and have a formal recognition of the compact, to have 12000 men, always here inserted in the preamble.

After this, Mr. attorney general, Mr. Provoost, Sir John Blaquiere, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Langrishe, Mr. Mason, Mr. Bourke, and Mr. Prime serjeant Dennis, spoke, to postpone the preamble till it was known whether the two clauses would be admitted or rejected, and Mr. Barry Barry, Mr. Daly, Mr. Ogle; Mr. Burgh, Mr. Conolly, Mr. Bushe, and Mr. Robert French, on the contrary.

The question was put to postpone the preamble,

Ayes, 100; Noes, 74.

Mr. Burgh then said, since the alteration of money bills was become a constant practice, it was fitting the house should shew a proper resentment, and let the English ministry know if they altered bills, they would risk part of the supplies. To that end he would propose a diminution of the grants to testify indignation; but that diminution should be but small, that the revenue should not be much hurt. In the first enacted clause, which lays

lays a duty of two shillings on every barrel of beer or ale, he moved, in the room of two shillings, to insert the words one shilling and eleven pence three farthings. This amendment was defended by Mr. Burgh, Mr. William Brabazon Ponsonby, Mr. Ogle, Sir Lucius O'Brien, Mr. Chapman, Mr. Barry Barry: and opposed by Mr. Langrishe, Mr. Carlton, Mr. Fortescue, Colonel Brown, Mr. Attorney General, and Mr. Serjeant Dennis.

The committee divided on the question for the amendment, Ayes, 71; Noes, 94.

Mr. Chapman moved, instead of the words four pence on the new duty on home made spirits, the words three pence should be inserted, This passed in the negative without telling.

The two clauses which had been rejected in England were then read, and Mr. Bourke, junior, moved to expunge them. This brought on a fresh altercation. Mr. Conolly, Mr. Yelverton, and Mr. Barry, spoke for retaining the clauses, and Mr. Solicitor General against it. Mr. Barry proposed an amendment, by inserting in their place a recognition of the compact for 12000 men, and a recital of the message and answer. This amendment was opposed by Mr. Provost, and defended by Mr. Grattan.

The question was put :

Ayes, 75 ; Noes, 94.

Mr. Burgh, Mr. Dillon, Mr. Bushe, and Mr. Yelverton then spoke for the two clauses, and Mr. Attorney General against them. The question was put that these clauses should stand part of those heads of a bill. The committee divided again,

Ayes, 71 ; Noes, 93.

The clauses being thus rejected, the preamble was read, and Sir Lucius O'Brien revived his motion of amending it, which was defended by Mr. Burgh, and opposed by Mr. Provost. The committee divided,

Ayes, 61 ; Noes, 88.

The bill being gone through the committee, the speaker took the chair, and Mr. Malone moved that the report be now received. Mr. Burgh moved the question of adjournment, on which the house divided,

Ayes, 50 ; Noes, 86.

Mr. Maloné then reported, and Sir Lucius O'Brien again proposed his amendment to the preamble, on which the house divided again,

Ayes, 50 ; Noes, 81.

The heads of a bill were then ordered to the lord lieutenant, and it being near three o'clock in the morning, the house adjourned till the same day.

Account of the Proceedings of the American Colonists, since the passing the Boston Port-Bill. (Continued from p. 56.)

SINCE the reduction of Chamblee and the Surrender of St. John's, the provincials have extended their conquests in Canada by the capitulation of Montreal. The terms insisted on by the inhabitants (the garrison having previously abandoned the town) were as follows :

Article 1. That the citizens and inhabitants of Montreal, as well individuals, as religious orders and communities, without any exceptions, shall be maintained in the free possession and enjoyment of their rights, goods, and effects, moveable and immoveable, of what nature soever they may be.

2. That the inhabitants, French and English, shall be maintained in the free exercise of their religion.

3. That trade in general, as well within the province as in the upper countries and parts beyond the seas, shall be carried on freely as heretofore, and passports shall be granted for that purpose.

4. That passports shall also be granted to those who may want them, for the different parts of this province, or elsewhere, on their lawful affairs.

5. That the citizens and inhabitants of the town and suburbs of Montreal shall not be compelled, on any pretence whatsoever, to take up arms against the mother country, nor to contribute in any manner towards carrying on war against her.

6. That the citizens and inhabitants of the town and suburbs, or any other part of the country, who have taken up arms for the defence of this province, and are taken prisoners, shall be set at liberty.

7. That the courts of justice shall be established for the determination of property, and that the judges of the said courts shall be elected by the people.

8. That the inhabitants of the town shall not be subjected to lodge troops.

9. That no inhabitants of the country, or savages, shall be permitted to enter the town, until the commandant shall have taken possession and provided for the security thereof.

General Montgomery's Answer :

I DO hereby certify that the above articles were presented to me, to which I have given the following answer :

The city of Montreal having neither ammunition, artillery, troops, nor provisions, and having it not in their power to fulfil one article of the treaty, can claim no title to a capitulation.

The continental army have a generous disdain of every act of oppression and violence. They are come for the express purpose of giving liberty and security. The general, therefore, engages his honour to maintain, in the peaceable enjoyment of their property of every kind, the individuals and religious communities of the city of Montreal.

The inhabitants, whether English, French, or others, shall be maintained in the free exercise of their religion.

The present unhappy contention between Great-Britain and her colonies, puts it out of his power to engage for freedom of trade to the mother country, nor can he make a general promise of passports. As far as it may consist with the safety of the troops, and the public good, he shall be happy to promote commerce, and for that purpose promises to grant passports for the upper countries when required.

The general hopes to see such a provincial virtuous convention assembled, as will enter with zeal into every measure that can contribute to set the civil and religious rights of this, and her sister colonies, on a permanent foundation. He promises for himself, that he will not compel the inhabitants of the town to take up arms against the mother country, or contribute towards the expence of the present war.

The continental army came into this province for its protection; they therefore cannot consider their opposers as taking up arms for its defence.

It is not in the general's power to engage for the return of prisoners. Motives of humanity will induce him to use his interest for their return to their families, provided it can be done without endangering the public safety.

Speedy measures shall be taken for establishing courts of justice, upon the most liberal plan, conformable to the British constitution.

The inhabitants shall not be burthened with troops, but when necessity requires it, of which necessity the general must be judge.

The inhabitants of the country, and savages, shall not enter the town till the guards are posted.

To-morrow morning, at nine o'clock, the continental troops shall take possession of the Recollects Gate; the proper officers must attend with the keys of all public stores, upon the quarter-master-general, at nine o'clock, at the Recollects Gate.

This engagement is understood, and declared to be binding on any future commanding officer of the continental troops that may succeed me in this district.

Montreal, Nov 12, 1775.

RICHARD MONTGOMERY.

To counterbalance these advantages in Canada, Lord Dunmore has erected the King's standard in the province of Virginia; to which great numbers have repaired both white and black. He has likewise obtained some signal advantages over the Virginians, the particulars of which have not yet transpired.

But previously to this measure, his excellency caused the following proclamation to be issued, which has spread a general alarm.

"AS I have entertained hopes that an accommodation might have taken place between Great Britain and this colony, without being compelled, by my duty, to this most disagreeable, but now absolutely necessary step, rendered so by a body of armed men, unlawfully assembled, firing on his majesty's tenders, and the formation of an army, and that army now on their march to attack his majesty's troops, and destroy the well disposed subjects of this colony; To defeat such treasonable purposes, and that all such traitors, and their abettors, may be brought to justice, and that the peace and good order of this colony may be again restored, which the ordinary course of the civil law is unable to effect, I have thought fit to issue this my proclamation, hereby declaring, that until the aforesaid good purposes can be obtained, I do, in virtue of the power and authority to me given by his majesty, determine to execute martial law, and cause the same to be executed throughout this colony; and to the end that peace and good order may the sooner be restored, I do require every person capable of bearing arms to resort to his majesty's standard, or be looked upon as traitors to his majesty's crown and government, and thereby become liable to the penalty the law inflicts upon such offences, such as forfeiture of life, confiscation of lands, &c. And I do hereby farther declare all indentured servants, negroes, or others (appertaining to rebels) free, that are able and willing to bear arms, they joining his majesty's troops, as soon as may be, for the more speedily reducing this colony to a proper sense of their duty, to his majesty's crown and dignity. I do farther order, and require, all his majesty's liege subjects, to retain their quit-rents, or any other taxes due, or that may become due, in their own custody, till such time as peace may be again restored to this at present most unhappy country, or demanded of them for their former salutary purposes, by officers properly authorised to receive the same."

The body of armed men alluded to in the above proclamation, were those, who, on an attempt being made to burn the town of Hampton by Captain Squire, assembled, and defeated that design. The force that was sent to execute the cruel order for burning the town consisted of an armed schooner and three tenders; these had cut thro' the boats that had been sunk to block up the harbour, but a body of rifle men having joined a party of the Virginian regulars, received them so warmly, that captain Squire was obliged to retreat, and to abandon one of his tenders.

The provincials, exulting on this victory, were not a little mortified on seeing the above proclamation, which gives encouragement to slaves to free themselves from the yoke of their masters, and to take up arms against them; a licence which none of the governors on the continent had hitherto ventured to grant.

This provocation has called together not only the Virginian troops, but those also of the adjoining colonies; and even a naval force is said to be preparing to lend assistance to the military to pursue the governor thro' land and water, and to make his escape impracticable. How this affair will terminate we will not venture to foretell. The trial however, will in a great measure decide the question that has hitherto been doubtful, whether the friends of government are or are not considerable in that province.

Very much unlike the conduct of lord Dunmore to the Virginians is that of governor Tryon towards the inhabitants of New York; he tells his people in the mildest manner, that, having obtained his majesty's permission to withdraw from his government, seeing no hope of restoring harmony, he expected pected soon to be obliged to avail himself of his majesty's indulgence.

It has given me great pain, says he (in a letter directed from the ship, Duchess of Gordon, to the mayor of New York) to view the colony committed to my care, in such a turbulent state, as not to have afforded me, since my arrival, any prospect of being able to take the dispassionate and deliberate voice of its inhabitants, in a constitutional manner, upon the resolution of parliament for composing the present ferment in this province.

I owe it to my affection to this colony, to declare my wish, that some measure may be speedily adopted for this purpose; as I feel an extreme degree of anxiety, in being witness to the growing calamities of this country, without the power to alleviate them.

Of the same benevolent and conciliating disposition governor Franklin appears to be, who, on calling the assembly of New Jersey together, to transact such business as the exigencies of the province required, told them in a candid manner, how much his majesty lamented that his American subjects were so lost to their own interest, as neither to accept the resolution of the house of Commons of Feb. 20, nor make it the basis of a negotiation which probably might have led to some plan of accommodation:—apprized them of his majesty's firm resolution to pursue the most vigorous efforts to reduce his rebellious subjects to obedience; but hoped, that men of sense, and friends to peace and good order, would see their error before it was too late, and that they would concur in restoring the public tranquillity on the terms held out by his majesty and the parliament.

He likewise informed them of the orders which his majesty's naval commanders had received, to proceed against such sea-port towns and places, that were accessible to his majesty's ships, as should offer any violence to the king's officers, or should raise any troops, erect any military works, or make any attempt to plunder any public magazine of arms or ammunition.

He acquainted them, moreover, that, if he had followed the advice of his best friends, he would ere this, like other governors, have sought an asylum on board one of his majesty's ships; but that, in full confidence of the affection of the people over whom he was appointed to preside, he had avoided that step, and persuaded the other crown officers to do the same, lest it should be attributed to a well-grounded apprehension of violence, and of course subject the colony to be more immediately considered as in actual rebellion, and be productive of mischiefs which it was his earnest desire to prevent; but at the same time he entreated the assembly, that, if they would not, or could not, be answerable for the safety of himself and his subordinate officers, to tell him so in plain terms: for, said he, as sentiments of independency are by some men of present consequence openly avowed, and essays are already appearing in the public papers, to ridicule the people's fears of that horrid measure, and remove their aversion to republican government, it is high time every man should know what he has to expect. If, as I hope, you have an abhorrence of such design, you will do your country an essential service, by declaring it in so full and explicit terms as may discourage the attempt. You may always rely on finding me ready to co-operate with you in every proper expedient for promoting peace, order, and good government; and I shall deem it a particular happiness to have an opportunity of being instrumental in saving this province from the present impending danger.

We have not yet been favoured with the assembly's answer to this address; but doubt not of the assembly's candor in affording safety to the king's governor and officers, who thus, confiding in the people's love, entrusted their persons to their protection.

Whatever influence these pacific recommendations may have upon the people within doors to whom they are addressed, they seem to take no other effect without doors, than just to preserve the persons in office from insult. The whole continent continues still to be in motion, and every colony is not only providing for its own particular safety, but likewise to assert the common cause with proportionable force. They are busy too in forming a marine; but it must be long before they can be formidable at sea.

The house of representatives in the province of Pennsylvania have recommended to all male white persons within their province, who are within the ages of 16 and 60, and who are not conscientiously scrupulous of bearing arms, to join the military association in that province forthwith; and to all those who are thus scrupulous and conscientious, to contribute an equivalent in money. They have, at the same time, ordered the sum of 80,000*l.* to be struck in bills of credit, for answering the present exigencies of the province, in order that the associators may be allowed all necessary charges for their respective services.

The like has been done in the province of Massachusetts-bay, and in other provinces. The representatives of the Massachusetts have ordered notice to be given to all the officers and minute men, who on the alarm on the 19th of April last marched from home for the defence of the colony, against the ministerial troops, to make up their account of time and travel on that occasion, in order to be paid for their service; and also for all innholders, and others, who afforded money or entertainment to the said minute-men, to make up their account, in order to receive satisfaction for the same; and it is likewise ordered, that all who served in the character of field officers, whether of the militia or minute-men, should make up their accounts, colonels at the rate of 12*l.* per month, lieutenant-colonels 9*l.* 10*s.* majors 8*l.* and adjutants 3*l.* 12*s.*

At the same time, a kind of censure was passed upon some of the troops, who on that occasion marched to the place of rendezvous, but returned again without leave, whereby not only the lives of their worthy friends and fellow-countrymen left in the field, but also the rights and liberties of their country were greatly endangered: to avoid such unworthy behaviour for the future, it was ordered and expected, that officers and privates of the militia faithfully attend their duty on all such occasions, and that they do not quit their posts until regularly dismissed.

The Assembly of the Massachusetts have passed an act to encourage privateering at sea, and granting commissions for that purpose. This precedent has encouraged the representatives of other colonies to issue out like commissions, in consequence of which a very considerable naval force is actually fitting out; so that a pyratival war may now be said to be declared by sea, of advantage only to the daring and desperate.

It appears already, by undoubted information, that one ship, of inestimable value to the provincials, has fallen into the hands of their privateers, namely, the Nancy, Hunter, a transport vessel, on board of which they found 30 tons of cartridges, 2500, others say 15,000, stand of small arms, two brass 24 pounders, two brass 18 pounders, one 13 1 half inches, and some smaller mortars, with a proportionable number of shells, some say no less than 30,000. This capture appears to be of the greater importance, as it enables the provincial army to keep in awe the regulars in Boston. The following letter, which is said to be authentic, and written by a gentleman who arrived in England by the very last ship from Boston, will place this matter in a clearer light:

"THE troops from Bunker's Hill (says the letter-writer) went into winter quarters a very few days before I quitted Boston, which was on the 16th of December; those in Boston had broke up camp about a fortnight before; all in good spirits, and in better health than could be expected after so late a campaign. No part of the fleet sent from England and Ireland with supplies had arrived when we left Boston; but we had the pleasure of seeing five sail standing into the harbour as we came away, and which from their size we judged were from Europe; a sight truly pleasing to us,—how much more to those who had not our prospect of plenty!—Fuel was weekly issued out only, there not being a sufficiency to afford a greater supply; and every regiment had old houses and wharfs assigned to them contiguous to their quarters, to serve in lieu of better firing.

"I do not recollect whether you saw Charles-Town side in that forwardness to give you any idea of its present strength, nor can I with words well describe the plan;—suffice it to say, that we thought 600 men, commanded by two field officers, so fully sufficient to protect it against the whole rebel army, that the bushes are levelled, and the neck left open for their approach.

"After saying thus much on the favourable side, I must confirm the report you have, no doubt, heard, of the capture the rebels have made at sea, of an ordnance brig, containing a mortar, and, I fear, so many loaded shells, as to prevent our attempting to burn the barracks by bombarding them, for fear of a return; however, I still imagine they will be glad to keep Tom Fool's bagain, as we are so much superior in point of artillery.

"Several other vessels have been surprised by their insignificant bomb-boats. I trust it will not last, and that they will pay dear for all in the spring. Indeed, I make no doubt of it, if the force intended arrives early enough to act."

This letter, which is apparently written by a friend to government, destroys the credibility of another letter circulated in the papers, importing, that, on the 16th of December, a great mutiny had happened in the American camp; that the generals Lee and other officers, endeavouring to use violence in quelling the tumult, had been killed; that the regulars had taken advantage of the confusion, and, marching forth to the number of 5000, had slaughtered 300 of the enemy.

The house of assembly of representatives, in Rhode-Island, have passed an act making it death to correspond with the enemies of the colony.

A letter from Rhode-Island gives an account of a plundering party of cruisers, tenders, and transports, who lately surrounded Gold island, Hope island, Dutch island, and other islands in Narraganset-bay, in order to make prize of sheep and cattle; that, after cruising about, firing, and frightening the inhabitants, for near a fortnight, they had carried off about 40 head of cattle, and near 100 sheep; that they had fired on Bristol and Pupaquadi, and upon James-town; and that they had cut away the masts and bow sprits of a great number of vessels in the creeks and harbours.

An English man of war having entered Port-Royal harbour, in Martinico, in pursuit of an American vessel, and also cast anchor before St. Peter's, in which were twelve vessels from the same continent, the French commandant complained to the English captain of this breach of the law of nations, and insisted that he should release the prisoners he had taken, and restore the goods he had seized; which, it is said, were complied with.

Major Rogers, who, the papers said, had raised a regiment in favour of the provincials, has solemnly contradicted that report, and declared himself a prisoner upon parole.

We have purposely avoided saying any thing concerning the capture of Quebec. Most people are of opinion that it is in the hands of the provincials; but, from what is said in the public papers, we own we can see no sufficient grounds to believe it.

We shall, therefore, conclude our account of American affairs for the present with a letter letter from George-Town, in Maryland, dated Nov. 26, which has nothing improbable in it to destroy its credibility:—"Major Conolly, with three companions, are just taken five miles above Hagat's-town, on their way to Fort Pitt. Conolly had been this summer at Boston, where he presented a plan of operation for the back settlement to general Gage, which met the general's approbation, and he was now in his way to put it in execution. He was made lieutenant-col. commandant, was to proceed to Fort Detroit, where Capt. Lord, who is now at the Illinois with two companies of the Royal Irish, was to meet him with the field-pieces and stores that are there. Conolly was to raise a regiment, and as many Indians and partizans as he could: to enable him to do this, he had power to promise every person that entered into the service 300 acres of land when the troubles were over, and what other pecuniary rewards he might think proper; was to appoint and commission all the officers under him, which commissions were to be confirmed by lord Dunmore. With this force he was to penetrate through the country, in order to cut off the communication between the Southern and Northern colonies, destroy Fort Pitt and Fort Fincaitle, if the Americans should make any resistance, and meet lord Dunmore by the 20th of April next at Alexandria, when he (Dunmore) was to land an army under the cannon of the ships of war. Conolly's companions were one Cameron, who is now a lieutenant, with a promise of promotion, and one Dr. Smith, who says he was to be surgeon of Conolly's regiment. They were examined before the committee. On searching their portmanteaus a copy of Conolly's plan was found."

Sir Eldred of the Bower, and the Bleeding Rock, two Legendary Tales. By Miss Hannah More. (Concluded from p. 66.)

P A R T II.

ONCE—'twas upon a summer's walk,
The gaudy day was fled;
They cheated time with cheerful talk,
When thus Sir Ardolph said:
"Thy father was the firmest friend
"That e'er my being blest;
"And every virtue Heaven could send,
"Fast bound him to my breast.
"Together did we learn to bear
"The targe and ample shield;
"Together learn'd in many a war,
"The deathful spear to wield."
"To make our union still more dear,
"We both were doom'd to prove
"What is most sweet and most severe
"In heart-dissolving love.
"The daughter of a neighbouring knight
"Did my fond heart engage;
"And ne'er did Heav'n the virtues write
"Upon a fairer page.
"His bosom felt an equal wound,
"Nor sigh'd we long in vain;
"One summer's sun beheld us bound
"In Hymen's holy chain.
"Thou wast Sir Eldred's only child,
"Thy father's darling joy;
"On me a lovely daughter smil'd,
"On me a blooming boy.
"But man has woes, has clouds of care,
"That dim his star of life—
"My arms receiv'd the little pair,
"The earth's cold breast, my wife.
"Forgive, thou gentle Knight, forgive,
"Fond foolish tears will flow;
"One day like mine thy heart may heave,
"And mourn its lot of woe.
"But grant, kind Heaven! thou ne'er may'st know
"The pangs I now impart;
"Nor ever feel the deadly blow
"That rives a husband's heart.

"Beside the blooming banks of Tay,
"My angel's ashes sleep;
"And wherefore should her Ardolph stay,
"Except to watch and weep?
"I bore my beauteous babes away
"With many a gushing tear,
"I left the blooming banks of Tay,
"And brought my darlings here.
"I watch'd my little household cares,
"And form'd their growing youth;
"And fondly train'd their infant years
"To love and cherish truth."
"Thy blooming Birtha here I see,"
Sir Eldred strait rejoin'd;
"But why thy son is not with thee,
"Resolve my doubting mind."
When Birtha did the question hear,
She sigh'd, but cou'd not speak;
And many a soft and silent tear
Stray'd down her damask cheek,
Then pass'd o'er good Sir Ardolph's face,
A cast of deadly pale;
But soon compos'd, with manly grace
He thus renew'd his tale:
"For him my heart too much has bled,
"For him, my darling son,
"Has sorrow prest my hoary head,
"But—Heav'n's high will be done!
"Scarce eighteen winters had resolv'd,
"To crown the circling year,
"Before my valiant boy resolv'd
"The warrior's lance to bear.
"Too high I priz'd my native land,
"Too dear his fame I held,
"To oppose a parent's stern command,
"And keep him from the field.
"He left me—left his sister too,
"Yet tears bedew'd his face—
"What could a feeble old man do?—
"He burst from my embrace.
"O thirst of glory, fatal flame!
"O laurels dearly bought!
"Yet sweet is death when earn'd with fame—
"So virtuous Edwy thought.
"Full manfully the brave boy strove,
"Tho' pressing ranks oppose;

"But

" But weak the strongest arm must prove " Against an host of foes.
 " A deadly wound my son receives,
 " A spear affails his side :
 " Grief does not kill—for Ardolph lives
 " To tell that Edwy died.
 " His long-lov'd mother died again
 " In Edwy's parting groan :
 " I wept for her, yet wept in vain—
 " I wept for both in one.
 " I wou'd have died—I fought to die ;
 " But Heaven restrain'd the thought,
 " And to my passion clouded eye
 " My helpless Birtha brought.
 " When lo ! array'd in robes of light,
 " A nymph celestial came ;
 " She clear'd the mists that dimm'd my sight—
 " Religion was her name.
 " She prov'd the chastisement divine,
 " And bade me kiss the rod ;
 " She taught this rebel heart of mine
 " Submission to its God.
 " Religion taught me to sustain
 " What nature bade me feel ;
 " And piety reliev'd the pain
 " Which time can never heal."
 He ceas'd—With sorrow and delight
 The tale Sir Eldred hears,
 Then weeping cries—" Thou noble Knight,
 " For thanks accept my tears.
 " O Ardolph, might I dare aspire " To claim so bright a boon !—
 " Good old Sir Eldred was my sire—
 " And thou hast lost a son.
 " And tho' I want a worthier plea
 " To urge so dear a cause ;
 " Yet, let me to thy bosom be
 " What once thy Edwy was.
 " My trembling tongue its aid denies ;
 " For thou may'st disapprove ;
 " Then read it in my ardent eyes,
 " Oh ! read the tale of love.
 " Thy beauteous Birtha !" —Gracious power,
 " How could I e'er repine," Cries Ardolph, " since I see this hour ?
 " Yes—Birtha shall be thine."
 A little transient gleam of red
 Shot faintly o'er her face,
 And every trembling feature spread
 With sweet disorder'd grace.
 The tender father kindly smil'd
 With fulness of content,
 And fondly eyed his darling child,
 Who, bathful, blush'd consent.
 O then to paint the vast delight
 That fill'd Sir Eldred's heart,
 To tell the transports of the Knight,
 Wou'd mock the Muse's art.
 But every kind and gracious soul,
 Where gentle passions dwell,
 Will better far conceive the whole,
 Than any Muse can tell.
 The more the Knight his Birtha knew,
 The more he priz'd the Maid ;
 Some worth each day produc'd to view,
 Some grace each hour betray'd.
 The virgin too was fond to charm
 The dear, accomplish'd Youth ;
 His single breast she strove to warm,
 And crown'd, with love, his truth.

Unlike the dames of modern days,
 Who general homage claim,
 Who court the universal gaze,
 And pant for public fame.
 Then Beauty but on merit smil'd,
 Nor were her chaste smiles fold ;
 No venal father gave his child
 For grandeur, or for gold.
 The ardour of young Eldred's flame
 But ill cou'd brook delay,
 And oft he press'd the maid to name
 A speedy nuptial day.
 The fond impatience of his breast
 'Twas all in vain to hide,
 But she his eager suit repress'd
 With modest, maiden pride.
 When oft Sir Eldred press'd the day
 Which was to crown his truth,
 The thoughtful Sire wou'd sigh, and say,
 " O happy state of youth !
 " It little reck's the woes which wait
 " To scare its dreams of joy,
 " Nor thinks to-morrow's alter'd fate
 " May all those dreams destroy.
 " And tho' the flatterer, Hope, deceives,
 " And painted prospects shews :
 " Yet man, still cheated, still believes,
 " Till death the bright scene close.
 " So look'd my bride, so sweetly mild,
 " On me her beauty's slave ;
 " But whilst she look'd, and whilst she smil'd,
 " She sunk into the grave.
 " Yet, O forgive an old man's care,
 " Forgive a father's zeal ;
 " Who fondly loves must greatly fear,
 " Who fears must greatly feel.
 " Once more in soft and sacred bands,
 " Shall love and Hymen meet ;
 " To-morrow shall unite your hands,
 " And—be your bliss complete !"
 The rising sun inflam'd the sky,
 The golden orient blush'd ;
 But Birtha's cheeks a sweeter die,
 A brighter crimson flush'd.
 The Priest, in milk white vestments clad,
 Perform'd the mystic rite ;
 Love lit the hallow'd torch that led
 To Hymen's chaste delight.
 How feeble language were to speak
 Th' immeasurable joy
 That fir'd Sir Eldred's ardent cheek,
 And triumph'd in his eye !
 Sir Ardolph's pleasure stood confest,
 A pleasure all his own ;
 The guarded rapture of a breast
 Which many a grief had known.
 'Twas such a sober sense of joy
 As Angels well might keep ;
 A joy chas'd by piety,
 A joy prepar'd to weep.
 To recollect her scatter'd thought,
 And shun the noon-tide hour,
 The lovely bride in secret fought
 The coolness of her Bower.
 Long she remain'd—th' enamour'd Knight,
 Impatient at her stay,
 And all unfit to taste delight
 When Birtha was away ;
 Betakes him to the secret Bower ;
 His footsteps softly move ;

Impell'd by every tender power,
He steals upon his love.

O, horror! horror! blasting light!
He sees his Birtha's charms,
Reclin'd with melting, fond delight,
Within a stranger's arms.

Wild frenzy fires his frantic hand,
Distracted at the sight,

He flies to where the lovers stand,
And stabs the stranger Knight.

"Die, traitor, die, thy guilty flames Demand th' avenging steel!"—

"It is my brother, she exclaims,
'Tis Edwy—Oh farewell!"

An aged peasant, Edwy's guide,
The good old Ardolph fought:

He told him that his bosom's pride,
His Edwy he had brought.

O how the father's feelings melt!
How faint, and how revive!

Just so the Hebrew Patriarch felt!
To find his son alive.

"Let me behold my darling's face
And bless him ere I die!"

Then with a swift and vigorous pace
He to the Bower did hie.

O sad reverse!—Sunk on the ground
His slaughter'd son he view'd,

And dying Birtha close he found
In brother's blood imbrued.

Cold, speechless, senseless, Eldred near Gaz'd on the deed he had done;

Like the blank statue of Despair,
Or Madness grav'd in stone.

The father saw—so Jephthah stood,
So turn'd his woe-fraught eye,

When the dear, destin'd child he view'd,
His zeal had doom'd to die.

He look'd the woe he could not speak,
And on the pale corse prest

His wan, discolour'd, dying cheek,
And silent, sunk to rest.

Then Birtha faintly rais'd her eye,
Which long had ceas'd to stream,

On Eldred fix'd with many a sigh
Its dim, departing beam.

The cold, cold dews of hastening death
Upon her pale face stand;

And quick and short her failing breath,
And tremulous her hand.

The cold, cold dews of hastening death
The dim, departing eye,

The quivering hand, the short quick breath
He view'd—and did not die.

He saw her spirit mount in air,
Its kindred skies to seek;

His heart its anguish could not bear,
And yet it wou'd not break.

The mournful Muse forbears to tell
How wretched Eldred died:

She draws the Grecian * Painter's veil,
The vast distress to hide.

And man is born to bear:
Joy is the portion of the skies,
Beneath them, all is care.

The Bleeding Rock: A Legendary Tale.

—The annual wound allur'd
The Syrian damsels to lament his fate,
In amorous ditties all a summer's day;
While smooth Adonis from his native Rock
Ran purple to the sea, supposed with blood
Of Thammuz yearly wounded.

Milton.

W HERE beauteous Belmont rears its modest brow

To view Sabrina's silver waves below,
Liv'd Lindamira; fair as beauty's queen,
The same sweet form, the same enchanting
mein;

With all that softer elegance of mind
By genius heighten'd, and by taste refin'd.
Yet early was the doom'd the child of care,
For love, ill-fated love subdued the fair.
Ah! what avails each captivating grace,
The form enchanting, or the finish'd face?
Or what, each beauty of the heav'n-born mind,

The soul superior, or the taste refin'd?
Beauty but serves destruction to insure,
And sense, to feel the pang it cannot cure.
Each neighb'ring youth aspir'd to gain her hand,

And many a suitor came from many a land.
But all in vain each neighb'ring youth inspir'd,
And distant suitors all in vain admir'd.
Averse to hear, yet fearful to offend,
The lover she refus'd she made a friend:
Her meek rejection wore so mild a face,
More like acceptance seem'd it, than disgrace,

Young Polydore, the pride of rural swains,
Was wont to visit Belmont's blooming plains,
Who has not heard how Polydore cou'd throw
Th' unerring dart to wound the flying doe?
How leave the swiftest at the race behind,
How mount the courser, and outstrip the wind?
With melting sweetness, or with magic fire,
Breathe the soft flute, or strike the louder lyre?
From that fam'd lyre no vulgar music sprung,
The Graces tun'd it, and Apollo strung.

Apollo too was once a shepherd swain,
And fed the flock, and grac'd the rustic plain,
He taught what charms to rural life belong,
The social sweetness, and the sylvan song;
He taught, fair wisdom in her grove to woo,
Her joys how precious, and her wants how few!

The savage herds in mute attention stood,
And ravish'd echo fill'd the vocal wood;
The sacred sisters, stooping from their sphere,
Forgot their golden harps, intent to hear.
Till Heav'n the scene survey'd with jealous eyes,

And Jove, in envy, call'd him to the skies.

Young Polydore was rich in large domains,
In smiling pastures and in flowery plains,

S

With

With these, he boasted each exterior charm,
To win the prudent, and the cold to warm;
To act the tenderness he never felt,
In sorrow soften, and in anguish melt.
The sigh elaborate, the fraudulent tear,
The joy dissembled, and the well feign'd fear,
All these were his; and his the treach'rous art
That steals the guileless and unpractis'd heart.

Too soon he heard of Lindamira's fame,
'Twas each enamour'd shepherd's fav'rite theme;

Return'd the rising, and the setting sun,
The shepherd's fav'rite theme was never done,
They prais'd her wit, her worth, her shape,
her air!

And even inferior beauties thought her fair.

Such sweet perfection all his wonder mov'd;
He saw, admir'd, nay, fancied that he lov'd:
But Polydore no real passion knew,
Lost to all truth in feigning to be true.
No sense of tenderness could warm a heart
Too proud to feel, too selfish to impart.

Cold as the snows of Rhodope descend,
And with the chilling waves of Hebrus blend;
So cold the breast where vanity presides,
And mean self-love the bosom-feelings guides.

Too well he knew to make his conquest sure,

Win her soft heart, yet keep his own secure.
So oft he told the well-imagin'd tale,
So oft he swore,—how shou'd he not prevail?
Too unsuspecting not to be deceiv'd,
The well-imagin'd tale the nymph believ'd:
She lov'd the youth, she thought herself belov'd,
Nor blith'd to praise whom every maid approv'd.

Alas! that youth, from Lindamira far,
For newer conquest wages cruel war;
With other nymphs on other plains he roams,
Where injur'd Lindamira never comes;
Laughs at her easy faith, insults her woe,
Nor pities tears himself had taught to flow.

And now her eyes soft radiance seem'd to fail,

And now the crimson of her cheek grew pale,
The lily there, in faded beauty, shews
Its sickly empire o'er the vanquish'd rose.

Devouring sorrow marks her for his prey,
And slow and certain mines his silent way.
Yet, as apace her ebbing life declin'd,
Increasing strength sustain'd her woman's mind.

"O had my heart been hard as his," she cried,

"An hapless victim thus I had not died:

"If there be gods, and gods there surely are,

"Insulted virtue doubtless is their care.

"Then hasten, righteous Heaven! my tedious fate,

"Shorten my woes, and end my mortal date:

"Quick let your power transform this failing frame,

"Let me be any thing but what I am!

"And since the cruel woes I'm doom'd to feel,

"Proceed, alas! from having lov'd too well;

"Grant me some form where love can have no part, [heart.

"Nor human weakness reach my guarded

"If pity has not left your blest abodes,

"Change me to flinty adamant, ye Gods;

"To hardest rock, or monumental stone,
"Rather than let me know the pangs I've known:

"So shall I thus no farther torments prove,
"Nor taunting rivals say, "she died for love."

"For sure if aught can aggravate our fate,

"'Tis scorn, or pity from the breast we hate."

She said,—the Gods accord the sad request;

For when were pious pray'rs in vain address'd?

Now, strange to tell! if rural folks say true,

To harden'd rock the stiffening damsel grew;

No more her shapeless features can be known,

Stone is her body, and her limbs are stone.

The growing rock invades her beauteous face,

And quickly petrifies each living grace;

The stone her stature nor her shape retains,

The nymph is vanish'd, but the rock remains.

Yet wou'd her heart its vital spirits keep,

And scorn'd to mingle with the marble heap.

When babbling fame the fatal tidings bore,

Grief seiz'd the soul of perjurd Polydore;

Despair and horror robb'd his soul of rest,

And deep compunction wrung his tortur'd breast.

Then to the fatal spot in haste he hied,

And plung'd a deadly poniard in his side:

He bent his dying eyes upon the stone,

And, "Take, sweet maid," he cried, "my parting groan."

Fainting, the steel he grasp'd, and as he fell,

The weapon pierc'd the rock he lov'd so well;

The guileless steel assail'd the mortal part,

And stabb'd the vital, vulnerable heart.

The life-blood issuing from the wounded stone,

Blends with the crimson current of his own;

And tho' revolving ages since have past,

The meeting torrents undiminish'd last;

Still gushing out the sanguine stream amain,

The standing wonder of the stranger strain.

Now once a year, so rustic records tell,

When o'er the heath resounds the midnight bell;

On eve of midsummer, that foe to sleep,

What time young maids their annual vigils keep,

The * tell-tale shrub fresh gather'd to declare

The swains who false, from those who constant

are;

When ghosts in clanking chains the churchyard walk,

And to the wondering ear of fancy talk:

When the scar'd maid steals trembling thro'

the grove,

To kiss the tomb of him who died for love:

When, with long watchings, care, at length oppress,

Steals broken pauses of uncertain rest;

Nay, grief short snatches of repose can take,

And nothing but despair is quite awake:

Then, at that hour, so still, so full of fear,

When all things horrible to thought appear,

Is perjurd Polydore observ'd to rove

A ghastly spectre thro' the gloomy grove;

Then to the rock, the Bleeding Rock repair,

Where, sadly sighing, it dissolves to air.

Still when the hours of solemn rites return,

The village train in sad procession mourn;

FOREIGN TRANSACTIONS.

From the London Gazette, Nov. 28.

Hague, Nov. 18.

THE effects of the late storm of the 14th instant appear, by accounts from all parts of this province, to have been much more dreadful than was at first apprehended. Commerce has suffered greatly by the many vessels lost on our coasts, near the Texel; in the Zuyder sea, at the mouth of the Maese, and more particularly on the sea-coast of Holland, which is in many places covered with wrecks and merchandise. The violence of the north-west wind (which blew on the 14th the whole day) had raised the tide in the morning to a very uncommon height; and the waters on the ebb being prevented, by the continuance of the storm, from returning, in the evening were increased to such a degree, as to occasion inundations in many parts of North and South Holland, and even in the Province of Utrecht. Among the towns partly or intirely overflowed, are those of Amsterdam, Munikendam, Edam, Horn, Dort, Rotterdam, Beverwyk, Delfhaven, and Maalsluys. All the districts in the neighbourhood of Heuden were under water, as also the country bordering on the river Y, between Haarlem and Amsterdam, and on the opposite shore of that river in North Holland, and the country lying at the mouth of the Maese near Rotterdam, particularly the islands of Blankenbourg and Roosenbourg. The force of the wind and waves was so great, that a ship at Amsterdam, bound to Petersburg, was carried over two dykes between Musden and Amersfort, and thrown to the distance of two hundred yards on the land. The dykes are damaged in many places by this tempest; but, wherever there appeared any breaches, the inhabitants, by their great diligence and activity, immediately repaired them, and by that means prevented the ruin of the country. But, notwithstanding their vigilance, the waters rise above the level of the dykes, and overflowing the country, carried away with the torrent, houses, cattle, furniture, &c. and some persons have perished. The fishing-towns also have suffered greatly by the loss of their boats. By the most exact inquiries it has been found, that the rise of the waters was, at this time, eight inches higher than they were in the year 1717. Workmen are employed in repairing the damages; and the communication between Haarlem and Amsterdam, which had been interrupted, is now open.

Paris, Jan. 6.] They write from Chénouais, that an enraged wolf had devoured or wounded, in two days, twenty-nine persons, besides a great number of cattle, in the different places through which it ran. As soon as it was known the curate of Douzy de Royal, named Chapaize, near Cluny, attended by several of his own parishioners, went in pursuit of it, but without success; but the next day the Sieur de Ghardonnay, with nine persons, after seven hours pursuit had the good fortune to kill it. This wolf was about two feet in height, in length four feet and a half, from the snout to the trump, and its under jaw was almost without teeth, and the creature is supposed to have been about nine years old.

The Sieur Joseph Seson de Menezes, governor of Fernambucca in the Brazils, in a letter to the Portuguese government, makes mention of the death of Andrew Vidal de Negreiroe, at Stara, the capital of a province of that name, at the age of 124 years, who enjoyed the use of his senses even to the last. He was superior magistrate of that city in 1772, and several times filled the place of judge, to the satisfaction of every one. He was father to thirty sons and five daughters who, with their descendants, amounted to 188, of whom 149 were alive in 1773. They lived all in one house, under the wise tuition of their progenitor, and formed a most respectable patriarchy.

St. Jago, in Guatimala, August 1.] The burning mountain, called Pacavita, seemed by earthquakes, and subterraneous noises, to threaten an eruption, which really happened on the 2d of July, at eleven o'clock at night, preceded by a most violent report; after which a lava of nitrous and sulphurous matter poured down the side of the mountain, which threw up clouds of cinders and smoak, which consumed near forty leagues of the district of St. Antonio Cuchutepeque. The town of St. Christophal Amaticlan was entirely deserted; from nine cavities in this mountain, the flaming lava continues to run to the South Sea. It is now feared that the Pecay Grande will also break out, as it is in a vast agitation, which will finish the destruction of the valley of Pan-chul, in which stands the town of St. Jago, the capital of the province.

Constantinople, Nov. 17.] The captain Pacha arrived here yesterday with his fleet, bringing with him most part of the treasure of Chiek Dahir. Ibrahim Sebak, minister to the latter, is brought in chains on board one of the ships. A chest was found at Sceyde, containing the gold and most precious jewels belonging to Chiek Dahar; this treasure was the most prevailing motive of the war which Aboudaah carried into Syria.

Leghorn, Dec. 13.] It is said that the companies of the trade of France and England, have made representations to the Empress of Russia, on account of the damage they sustained during the late war, by the capture of their ships in the Levant, and for which the court of France demands 10,000 sequins, and that of England 80,000. It is added, that the Empress has given those two representations to general Annibal to be examined, with orders, if they are found to be just, to pay what they require.

Constance, Dec. 17.] Maximilian Baron de Rodt, brother to the late Prince and Cardinal of that name, has been unanimously elected Prince Bishop of Constance.

Madrid, Dec. 18.] The last advices from Cadiz, import, that they are very busy in fitting out all the men of war that were employed in the last expedition against the Algerines; besides which two ships of the line and a frigate were arrived there from Carthage, and twelve more men of war were expected from Ferrol; all which were supposed to be intended for another expedition against those Barbarians.

Hague, Dec. 21.] His Britannic Majesty has solicited the States General to dispose of their six battalions of Scots troops for his use, to serve against the Americans towards the ensuing campaign; and in case their High Mightinesses should wish to have their standing army complete, to raise six battalions of national troops in lieu of them, for his Britannic Majesty's account. The representatives for Zealand and Utrecht are the only ones who immediately consented, but the rest seem to make various objections, amongst which the Province of Holland objected, that it is inconsistent with a commercial state to involve themselves in any quarrel, if not put to it by extraordinary exigencies. Another Province observed, that when the Scots Troops return from America, the Republic then will be burthened with the expences of the additional national troops, and will have a stronger standing army than is consistent with the constitution. Although the above request of Great-Britain seems to meet with opposition, yet as his Serene Highness the Prince Stadholder is greatly inclined to it, there is no doubt but it will be carried.

Our Politicians are astonished to find the great confidence which the Court of Great-Britain puts in that of Russia; for, as we are informed from very good authority, the auxiliary Troops which Russia has offered, are to be placed in the different Fortresses of the Electorate of Hanover; and all the Hanoverian Troops, almost to a man, are to be sent to do execution against the Americans.

Paris, Dec. 25.] The Count de St. Germain has laid the following changes in the military before his Majesty, who, it is said, has already agreed to several of them.

1. The abolition of all the Carabineers.
2. Ditto the Horse Grenadiers.
3. Ditto the two companies of Musqueteers.
4. A reduction of the Light Horse and Gens d'Arms (of the Guards) to fifty men in a company.
5. Ditto of the King's to 150 per company, instead of 400, which they now are.
6. To form three Regiments of French Guards, instead of one, and that one of them be alternately at Court; the others to guard Paris. And several other regulations.

Paris, Jan. 1. An ordinance was this day published, which grants a general pardon to all deserters, by which it is computed that upwards of twenty thousand men will return to the service. By the same ordinance it is decreed, that deserters shall not for the future be punished with death, but be sent to work at the fortifications for a longer term than their engagement in the military service.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

December 5.

THE king has been pleased to grant a charter of incorporation to the governor, &c. of Greenwich hospital, by the name of the commissioners and governors of the royal hospital for seamen in the county of Kent.

9.] A man made information at the office in Bow-street, that he had that morning been robbed of 373 guineas, which he was bringing to town to buy goods; but some suspicion arising on his examination, that he meant a fraud, he was threatened with being committed if he did not discover the truth, which so terrified him, that he ingenuously confessed that he came from Ireland with an intent to sue the hundred, being told there, that if he swore to his being robbed between sun and sun, he might recover from the hundred whatever sum he should pretend to have lost. On the high-constable of the hundred being made acquainted with this intended fraud, and declining to commence a prosecution against the man, he was discharged.

29.] Yesterday, by order of the lord mayor, the king's proclamation for the distribution of prizes, taken during the rebellion in America, was read at the Royal Exchange and at Holborn-bars by the common cryer.

An order is issued for an immediate account to be given of the number of armed vessels under forty guns, fit for immediate service, distinguishing the size of each, and the number of guns they carry.

Jan. 1.] Yesterday arrived a transport from Bolton at Dover, after a very short passage; it is is said she brings a confirmation of the taking of the Nancy, Hunter; the particulars are as follow: she stood in for a pilot, when a boat with eight men put off, and told them they would pilot them in; but no sooner had they got on board, than they drew their hangers and pistols, and insisted on carrying her into Portsmouth instead of Boston. She had on board, besides what has been mentioned, fifteen thousand stand of small arms, and a large brass mortar, upon a new construction.—A ship from London to Penfacola, is said to be taken by an armed schooner, and carried into Charles-town, South Carolina: she had on board two thousand five hundred stand of arms, two hundred and fifty barrels of gunpowder, a large quantity of blankets, and other stores, for the garrison.—And two transports laden with powder and military implement, which failed under convoy of one of the English men of war, are also said to be taken and carried into Philadelphia.

3.] This day his Majesty in council was pleased to order a proclamation to be issued, for giving a bounty of forty shillings to able bodied seamen, and twenty shillings to able bodied landmen, and ordinary seamen, to serve on board his Majesty's fleet.

12.] Yesterday morning his Majesty went to Clapham Common to review the first and second battalion of foot, lately arrived from Minorca, accompanied by his Grace the Duke of Argyle, and several other General Officers; after which they were immediately ordered to embark for America.

Orders are sent to Plymouth for an old 20 gun ship to be fitted out immediately, which is to go to the Cove of Cork, to receive on board such seamen as enter for his majesty's service.

The Triton man of war, which is now fitting out at Plymouth, and will shortly sail for America, is to take on board cloathing for 8000 troops.

MARRIAGES.

Peter Auriol Drummond, Esq; second son to his grace the archbishop of York, to Miss Milnes, only daughter of Pemberton Milnes, Esq; of Wakefield.—The Right Hon. the Marquis of Granby, to lady Mary Isabella Somerset, youngest sister to the duke of Beaufort.

DEATHS.

John Barker, Esq; at Bath, Rear Admiral of the White.—Sir Richard Spry, Rear Admiral of the White, in Devonshire.—Admiral Sir Charles Saunders, knight of the Bath, member for Heydon, in Yorkshire, Admiral of the Blue squadron, lieutenant general of the marines, and elder brother of the Trinity-House, in Spring-gardens.—The Right Hon. Thomas, earl of Cassilis, at Cullean, in Scotland, one of the sixteen peers thereof.—Robert Dods, Esq; at Edinburgh, Marchmont herald at arms.—The Right Hon. Lady Dowager Martha Chedworth, at Saville-house, Leicester-fields.—Mrs. Irwine, relict of the late lieutenant-general Alexander Irwine, and mother to the present lieutenant-general Sir John Irwine, K. B.—Mr. Thomas Weston, a celebrated comedian, of the Theatre-Royal, Drury-Lane.—John Owen, Esq; at Bath, lieutenant-general of his majesty's forces, and colonel of the 49th regiment of foot.—John Scot, Esq; major-general of his majesty's forces, and colonel of the 26th regiment of foot, at Balmorie, in Scotland.—Lieut. Col. James Prevost, colonel commandant of the first battalion of the Royal American regiment of foot.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

Carlsw, February 3.

LAST week was committed to Maryborough gaol, by the right hon. lord Knappton, Stephen Doughany, charged with delivering a threatening letter from the White Boys to Mrs. Brereton.

On Sunday night last, the 28th ult. Paul Murphy and William Kilfoyle, charged on oath with being White Boys, and assaulting Philip Connor, a messenger of the hon. house of commons, were apprehended at Ballyshanduff, near Portarlinton, Queen's-county, by a serjeant and 12 men of the militia of Mountmellick, after a most violent resistance; and next day committed to Maryborough gaol, by Jonathan Clarke, Esq; one of his majesty's justices of the peace for the Queen's-county. The readiness with which this militia attended the call, and the firmness they executed the order of the civil magistrate, deserves the warmest thanks of the public.

Last Wednesday as Mr. Henry Weeks, of Leighling-bridge, was returning from the funeral of Mr. Blanchfield, he unfortunately missed his way, and was smothered in the snow, between Castlecomer and Old Leighlin.

Cork, Feb. 3.] The Dublin post which should have arrived here on Monday night did not come in till one o'clock on Wednesday evening; and the post which should have arrived last night, did not come in till eight o'clock this morning, on account of the great fall of snow, which rendered the roads almost impassable.

Londonderry, Jan. 30.] Early on Sunday morning last a dreadful fire broke out in the house of Mr. John Ferguson, in Letterkenny, which consumed the same and three others. The wind being high, spread the flames with amazing fierceness, and no water being to be had on account of the frost, in order to save the whole town from destruction, three houses were pulled down to stop the progress of the fire. The unfortunate sufferers have lost all their goods, furniture, &c. (particularly Mr. Ferguson) to a considerable amount. What serves to aggravate their calamity is, a strong suspicion of the mischief being done designedly, and six persons, two men and four women, are committed to gaol in consequence of this suspicion.

Feb. 16.] Tuesday last two of the officers belonging to the East India Packet lately drove in here by distress of weather, set off express for Dublin, on their way to London, with dispatches of the greatest consequence. We have not, however been able to come at any certain account of their contents; but it is whispered, that affairs in India are in a very distracted situation, not only with respect to the neighbouring Nabobs, but also the company's servants, who, it is said, are much divided, and in great confusion.

Sligo, Feb. 13.] Last Friday night, about eight o'clock, a most violent storm arose here, accompanied with a heavy rain, which continued with very little intermission until twelve, during which several houses were uncovered and chimnies blown down; a quantity of corn and hay was destroyed, and the dismal effects of the storm were very visible in different parts of the country.

Near Banada, Mr. James Gallagher, a Romish clergyman, going from one village to another, was found smothered the next morning; and a poor fisherman was found dead on the road near Ballinasad, supposed to have perished in the same hurricane. We did not hear that any damage was done to the shipping in the harbour.

Carlow, Feb. 14.] On Wednesday night last a fire broke out in the dwelling-house of Mr. Neal Lawler, at Grange Mellon, in the county of Kildare, which consumed the same, with most of the effects therein.

About the hour of seven o'clock on Friday last, a Whirlwind arose, which continued till half past eleven at night, during which time it did considerable damage in Portarlinton, by blowing down several houses, and a hayrick belonging to Mr. Beauchant, that contained near seven tons, great part of which was gathered up in car loads at about half a mile distant. And at Castle Ribband near Athy, its force was so great as to entirely sweep away a new-built stable belonging to Mr. Chapman, wherein were five horses, which were killed and buried in the ruins.

Same evening, as Peter Lawler was returning to his dwelling, at Old Court, with a bundle of underwood on his back for firing, he was blown down into a deep stagnated pool, and no assistance being near, was unfortunately drowned.

D U B L I N.

Between the hours of three and four o'clock on Saturday morning, Jan. 13, the house of Mr. Beatty, Taylor, in Mary's-abbey, was perceived to be on fire, and in a short time afterwards the flames burst out with great violence through the dining-room windows. The alarm being given to the people within, and the stair-case not having taken fire they all got out. The timely assistance of two fire engines, which were properly, and with great dexterity played, prevented the flames from even reaching the bed chamber; nor was there, although the fire in the dining room raged with great fury, any other damage done, than the boards, the furniture, the joists, the windows and window frames of that apartment being totally consumed. This unlucky accident was occasioned by a woman, (who was waiting up for a gentleman, who lodged in the middle floor) having left a candle and a book which she was reading in the dining room, after she let the gentleman in, and which, through forgetfulness remaining there after every person was in bed, by some means had fallen down, and set the carpet on fire, which communicated the flames to the floor, and so occasioned an accident, which, had the night been tempestuous and the consequence not so soon prevented, would in all probability have done considerable damage. This carelessness, it is hoped, will be a warning to the public, which may be of infinite service, if properly attended to.

By a letter from Cork, dated the 29th ult. we are informed, that on the preceding night a violent gale of wind arose which did much mischief at Cove, where the transports with the troops on board (still detained there waiting for the Thunder bomb) ran foul of each other, and two men of war boats, in which were twenty-two brave fellows, were totally lost.

A small coasting sloop, in which were four men, sailed from Rochford the 26th of last month, on her voyage to Brest, but a gale of wind off shore the same night, tore her main-sail all to pieces, and continued with such violence, that she could not shape her course, but dove before it until Saturday the 4th inst. they made the land of this island, at Glasarrick, near Arklow, where they came to an anchor; the poor men had been two days without water, and to preserve their lives went on shore to get some: but while they were getting this relief, their vessel broke from her mooring, and drove to sea. Those distressed mariners by the humanity of the country people, to whom they were recommended in a written paper by the surveyor of Glasarrick (as they could not speak English) reached this city last Saturday, and presented themselves at the door of the Exchange Coffee-house, where in a few hours upwards of eight pounds were collected for them.

Two capital full length portraits in elegant gilt frames, were, the 12th inst. sent to the mayoralty-house in Dawson-street, as a present from Luke Gardiner, Esq; to the city: the pictures are, one of them of his late majesty king George the first, and the other of the late duke of Bolton, when lord lieutenant of Ireland.

We learn from Cavan, that an ox was killed there, by one Lowry, a butcher, which weighed nineteen hundred weight, and produced twenty stone weight of tallow.

By a private letter from Clonmell, we are informed, that a fire broke out in the garret of a house in said town, which consumed the same, and that a man and his wife (who was great with child) and also two of their children, perished in the flames.

Feb. 16.] A woman in Hoey's-court offering a fish-woman a less price than she liked, the latter thrust a knife into her eye, the sight whereof cannot be recovered, and cut her in the face; she was immediately secured, and given into the charge of a constable, who suffered her to escape.

19.] About eight o'clock at night, Mr. Crofton Warren was stopped in Abbey-street by two villains, who came out of Stable-lane in Capel street, and seemed to be stable boys, each having a broomstick in his hand, and robbed him of his watch. They gave him a slight cut in the forehead and made off.

Account of the Extent of our American Colonies, &c.

At a time when the eyes of all Europe are fixed on the important dispute between Great-Britain and America, and when consequences of the most interesting kind depend on the issue of the contest, it cannot be thought unreasonable to print the following account of the extent of our American colonies, and a comparative view of that of the principal countries of Europe; as extracted from authors of undoubted authority.

Nova Scotia, New-England, Pennsylvania, and New-Jersey, bounding them by the river St. Lawrence and two lakes, form a pretty equal oblong square of nine hundred miles in length, and near four hundred broad. All this on a medium makes 360,000

Maryland, Virginia, and the country through which the Ohio runs, extending on the north to the southern banks of lake Erie, and in a level line from thence to the junction of the Mississippi and Moingona, form another oblong tract, very equal, seven hundred miles long, and three March, 1776.

The History of the Female Sex: In a Series of Letters.

L E T T E R II.

Polygamy considered—The Happiness of the Conjugal State—Chastity a Restraint upon Nature—Manners of Women of various Nations.

I Asserted in my last Polygamy was an infringement of the law of nature: To prove this I urge, in the first place, the equal number of males and females as a clear indication of the will of God, that every man should be confined to one wife, and every woman to one husband. That equality which has subsisted in all countries, and at all times, is a signal instance of over-ruling providence; for the chances against it are infinite. All men are by nature equal in rank: and every man consequently is equally privileged to have a wife, which cannot be, if polygamy be permitted. Were ten women born for one man, as is falsely reported to be the case in Bantam, Polygamy might be the intention of providence; but, from the equality of males and females, it is clearly the voice of nature, as well as of the sacred scripture, 'That a man shall leave his father and mother, and cleave to his wife; and that they shall be one flesh.'

Consider, in the next place, that however plausible Polygamy may appear in the present state of things, where inequality of rank and of fortune have produced luxury and sensuality; yet that the laws of nature were not contrived by our maker for a forced state, where numberless individuals are degraded below their natural rank for the benefit of a few who are elevated above it. To form a just notion of Polygamy we must look back to the original state of man, where all are equal. In that state every man cannot have two wives, and consequently no man is intitled to more than one till every other be upon an equal footing with him. At the same time, the union of one man with one woman is much better calculated for continuing the race than the union of one man with many women. Think of a savage who may have fifty or sixty children, by different wives, all depending for food on his industry. Chance must turn out much in his favour, if the half of them perish not with hunger. How much a better chance for life have infants who are distributed more equally in different families! Polygamy is attended with an effect still more pernicious, with respect to children of the most opulent families. Unless affection be reciprocal and equal, there can be no proper society in the matrimonial state, no cordiality, nor due care of offspring. But such affection is inconsistent with Polygamy. A woman in that state, far from being a companion for her husband, is degraded to the rank of a servant, a mere instrument of pleasure and propagation. Among many wives there will be always a favourite: The rest turn peevish; and, if they resent not the injury against their husband, and against their children, as belonging to him, will at least be disheartened, and neglect them altogether. At the same time fondness for the favourite wife, and her children, makes the husband indifferent about the rest, and woeful is the condition of children who are neglected by both parents. To produce such an effect is certainly not the purpose of nature.

It merits peculiar attention, that providence has provided for an agreeable union among all creatures who are taught by by nature to pair. Animal love among creatures who pair not is confined within a narrow space of time: While the dam is occupied about her young animal, love lies dormant that she may not be obstructed from her duty. In pairing animals, on the contrary, animal love is always awake: Frequent enjoyments endear a pair to each, and makes constancy a pleasure. Such is the case of the human race, and such is the case of wild birds. Among the wild birds that build on trees, the male, after feeding his mate in the nest, plants himself upon the next spray, and cheers her with a song. There is still greater pleasure provided for the human race in the matrimonial state, and stronger incitements to constancy. Sweet is the society fitted for each other, in whom are collected the affections of husband, wife, lover, and friend, the tenderest affections of human nature. Public government is in perfection, when the sovereign commands with humanity, and the subjects are cordial in obedience. Private government in conjugal society arrives at still greater perfection, where husband and wife govern and are governed reciprocally with intire satisfaction to both. The man bears rule over his wife's person and conduct: she bears rule over his inclinations: He governs by law, and she by persuasion. Nor can her authority ever fail where it is supported by sweetness of temper, and zeal to make him happy.

The empire of the women is an empire of softness, of address, of complacency: Her commands are caresses; her menaces are tears. She ought to reign in the family like a minister in the state, by making that which is her inclination bejoined to her as her duty.

The late queen of Spain was a woman of singular prudence, and of solid judgment. A character of her, published after her death, contains the following passage: 'She had a great ascendancy over the king, founded on his persuasion of her superior sense, which she showed in a perfect submission to his commands; the more easily obeyed as they were commonly, though to him imperceptibly, dictated by herself. She cured him of many foibles, and, in a word, was his Minerva under the appearance of Mentor.'

The God of nature has enforced conjugal society, not only by making it agreeable, but by the principle of chastity inherent in our nature. To animals that have no instinct for pairing chastity is utterly unknown; and to them it would be useless. The mare, the cow, the ewe, the she goat, receive the male without ceremony, and admit the first that come in the way without direction.

Neither have tame fowl any notion of chastity; they pair not, and the female gets no food from the male, even during incubation. But chastity and mutual fidelity are essential to all pairing animals; for wandering inclinations would render them negligent in nursing their young. Wild birds pair, and they are by instinct faithful to each other while their young require nurture. Chastity and human fidelity in matrimony are equally essential to the human race, and equally enforced by the principle of chastity, a branch of the moral sense.

Nor is chastity confined to the matrimonial state. Matrimony is instituted by nature for continuing the species; and it is the duty of a man to abstain from animal enjoyment except in that state. The ceremonies of marriage, and the causes of separation and divorce, are subjected to municipal law. But, if a man beget children, it is his duty to unite with the mother in taking care of them; and such union is matrimony according to the law of nature. Hence it is that the first acts of incontinence, where enjoyment only is in view, are always attended with shame, and with a degree of remorse. At the same time, as chastity in persons who are single is only a self duty, it is not so strongly enforced by the moral sense, as chastity is in married persons, who owe to each other mutual fidelity. Deviations accordingly from the former make a less figure than from the latter. We scarce ever hear of adultery among savages; though among them incontinence before marriage is not uncommon. In Wales, even at present, and in the Highlands of Scotland, it is scarce a disgrace for a young woman to have a bastard. In the country last mentioned the first instance known of a bastard child being destroyed by its mother through shame is a late one. The virtue of chastity appears to be there gaining ground, as the only temptations a woman can have to destroy her child is to conceal her frailty. The principle of chastity, like that of propriety, or of decency, is but faint among savages, and has little of that authority which it acquires among polished nations, before they are corrupted by luxury. We shall have occasion to see afterwards, that even the great duty of justice is but faint among barbarians, and yields too readily to every irregular impulse, till the moral sense acquires full maturity. Bougainville reports, that, in the island of Otaheite, or king George's island, a young woman is free to follow her inclinations; and that her having had many lovers gives her not the less chance for a husband.

Chastity is no doubt a restraint upon nature; and therefore, if shame be removed by making it lawful to obey the appetite, nature will prevail. In the year 1707, a contagious distemper having carried off a large proportion of the inhabitants of Iceland, the king of Denmark fell upon a device to re-people the country, which succeeded to a wish. A law was made authorising young women in that island to have bastards even to the number of six, without wounding their reputation. The young women were so zealous to re-people their country, that, after a few years, it was found proper to abrogate the law. Modesty is by nature intended to guard chastity, as chastity is to guard matrimony: And modesty like chastity is one of those delicate principles that make no great figure among savages. In the land of Jesso, young women sometimes go naked in summer: If, however, they meet a stranger, they hang the head and turn away through shame.

Nature here is their only instructor. Some savage tribes have so little notion of modesty as to go entirely naked. Regnard reports, upon his own knowledge, that in Lapland man, woman, and child, take the hot bath promiscuously, and are not ashamed to be seen in that condition, even by a stranger. As this appeared singular, I took an opportunity to mention it to Dr. Solander, who made more than one visit to that country. He said that Regnard's report might be true, but without any imputation on the modesty of the Laplanders; for that their place of bathing is always so dark that nothing can be seen. He added, that the females in Lapland, both married and unmarried, are extremely chaste. The inhabitants of Otaheite, though otherwise a good sort of people, seem to have as little notion of modesty as of chastity. We have Bougainville's authority, that they frankly offered their young women to the French, and were greatly surprised, when they declined performing in public. The women of New-Zealand are both chaste and modest. In Lieut. Cook's voyage round the world it is reported that he stumbled upon some of them naked searching for lobsters in the sea, and that they were in great confusion for being seen in that condition by strangers. But now, if pairing in the strictest sense be a law of nature among men, as among some other animals, how is Polygamy to be accounted for, which formerly was universal, and to this day obtains among many nations? I am reduced to no dilemma here: Polygamy is derived from two sources: First, from savage manners, once universal; and, next, from voluptuousness in warm climates, which instigates men of wealth to transgress every rule of temperance. These two sources I propose to handle with care, because they make a great part of the History of the Female Sex; and I shall accordingly fully consider them in my next.

A Sketch of the late Epidemic Disease, as it appeared in London. By Doctor Fothergill.

ABOUT the beginning of the last month, it was mentioned to me in many families, that most of the servants were sick; that they had colds, coughs, sore throats, and various other complaints.

In the space of a week these complaints became more general; few servants escaped them, especially the men, who were most abroad: many of the other sex, likewise, and people of higher condition, were attacked; nor were children wholly exempted.

The disease, which had hitherto been either left entirely to itself, or had been treated with the usual domestic medicines appropriated to colds, now claimed the attention of the faculty, and, for the space of near three weeks, kept them for the most part universally employed.

Most of those whom I saw, were seized (and often so suddenly as to be sensible of the attack) with a swimming or slight pain in the head, a soreness of the throat, and all over the body with a sense of coldness, particularly in the extremities. A cough soon followed, a running of the nose, watery eyes, slight nausea, frequent calls to make water, and some were seized with a diarrhoea.

More or less of feverish heat, inquietude, pain about the breast, præcordia, and in the limbs, soon succeeded, but in various degrees. Many were capable of continuing in their usual occupations under these symptoms; others were obliged to submit to confinement; and not a few to their beds.

The tongue was always moist; the skin seldom remarkably hot or dry; the pulse often full, quick, and harder than one would have expected from such a temperature of the skin.

Several were seized with a diarrhœa: the stools were always black, or of a deep yellow colour; and so were those, for the most part, which were procured by purgative medicines.

In a few days every complaint abated, except the cough, this continued the longest of all the symptoms, and, in the fore part of the night, was exceedingly troublesome and vexatious; towards morning generally came on a sweat and easy expectoration.

Those who were seized at first with very copious desfluxions from the nose and the fauces, or had a plentiful and spontaneous discharge of black bilious stools, or made large quantities of a high coloured urine, or sweated profusely, of their own accord, a night or two after the seizure, soonest grew well.

In many cases it was necessary to take away some blood, the condition of the pulse and vehemence of the cough making it necessary. The blood was almost uniformly fizy, representing a flat cake of yellow tallow, floating in a deep yellow serum. Very few instances occurred where the size formed that cup like appearance which occurs in most of the genuine inflammatory disorders.

By warmth, diluting, cooling liquids, mild diaphoreticks, gentle and repeated purgatives, the disease for the most part soon gave way, in subjects otherwise healthy. Sometimes it was necessary to repeat the bleeding; sometimes blisters became necessary and were serviceable in abating the cough, which was the last of all the symptoms that gave way; after the necessary evacuations, anodynes for the most part had very salutary effects.

In many instances the disease assumed the type of an intermitten towards its decline: the bark however did not generally succeed in curing it. The symptoms, as often happens in bilious disorders, were sometimes aggravated by this medicine. A few doses of some mild catharticks most commonly removed it effectually.

Many who neglected themselves and went abroad with the distemper upon them, frequently got additional colds, and brought on a fever of the most dangerous kind; a few died phrenetic.

Ancient, asthmatic persons, were likewise great sufferers for the most part; a peripneumonick fever came gradually on, which often terminated fatally; and of those who did recover, their amendment was slow, and medication difficult.

And indeed it appeared that very few persons wholly escaped the influence of this morbid attack: for it seemed to aggravate every present malady.

It proved fatal likewise to several very young children, disposing them to violent coughs or diarrhœas.

Perhaps, however, there is scarcely an instance to be met with, of any epidemic disease in this city, where so many persons were seized, and in so short a time, and with so little comparative mortality.

Though attempts to ascertain the cause of epidemics are for the most part more specious than substantial, it may not be improper to mention a few facts that gained my attention; to others many more may have occurred, and worthy to be recorded. During the greatest part of the summer, in that part of the country where I then was (Cheshire) the air was of the most equal temperature I ever knew. In the space of two months the quick silver in the thermometer once rose to 68, once fell to 56; but for six weeks together, it kept between 60 and 66 continually, day and night.

The barometer did not vary much more. The weather was during this time very changeable, much inclining to wet; and though it rained more or less almost every other day for six weeks, yet upon the whole no unusual quantity of rain fell: it sunk into the ground as it fell, and made the earth very soft and miry; but seldom swelled the brooks, or occasioned floods.

During this time, horses and dogs were much affected; those especially that were well kept. The horses had severe coughs, were hot, forbore eating, and were long in recovering. Not many of them died that I heard of; but several dogs.

To the consideration of the faculty in this city, is this sketch of the least epidemic submitted, with all due deference; and with a request, that, if the observations they have made do not correspond with this recital, they will be pleased to communicate their remarks while the remembrance of the facts are recent; in order that as exact an account of this disease as possible may be transmitted to our successors.

If those physicians in the country, into whose hands this essay may come, will be so obliging as to mention the time when this epidemic made its appearance in their neigh-

neighbourhood, and wherein it differed from the preceding sketch, either in the symptoms, or the method of cure, they will likewise contribute to the same good purpose. The united observations of the faculty at large must greatly exceed the utmost efforts of any individual, however warmly he may be disposed to promote the utility of his profession.

Of the Ague and Intermittent Fever. By John Cook, M. D.

AN ague is the seizure of a cold fit, followed by a hot one, which after some hours, more or less, goes off with a sweat. When the coldness, or shivering, is scarce perceptible, but only a little yawning, and stretching of the limbs, and body, introduces the hot fit; it is then an intermittent fever, which is only a lower degree of the other, but often times hinders a cure.

According to the different distance of time, between the return of the fits, they are variously denominated: Quotidian, if come on every day; and double quotidians, if twice a day. Tertians, if each other day; and if it returns twice that day, it is a double tertian; and a quartan ague, if it returns every third day inclusive, if twice the same day, a double quartan.

The external, or remote causes of agues are, catching cold; getting wet, living, or lying in too damp a place. The ill state of the air; as in low lands, and marshes, or any thing else that obstructs perspiration; or whatever by overloading the juices with a lentor retards their motion, or creates a fever in the blood.

The internal, or proximate cause, is the viscosity of the arterial fluid, as is plain from the sudden seizure of a cold fit of an ague, upon too freely drinking large draughts of cold liquors, when exceeding hot, and in a violent sweat, from previous hard exercise. What suffers here so suddenly, but the bad blood? and from sudden loss of blood from phlebotomy or otherways.

This soon produces a lax state of the solids too, and both together weaken the vibrations of the vessels, and cause the reiterated fits, and long continuance of such agues, and intermittent fevers, with all the various symptoms attending the same.

The usual symptoms are,—at first, coldness, shiverings, stretchings, beginning in the joints, and thence creeping all over the body, attended with a small, slow pulse; heavings, dulness, drowsiness, dashing pains in the extremities; retching and vomiting; with great pain in the loins; paleness in the face, winking of the eyes, quick involuntary motion of the under jaw. Next, in the hot fit, an inward heat; quick and strong pulse; great thirst, short breathing; watchfulness, pain of the head; pale or red urine; and last of all, sweat universal.

A vernal ague, or one in the spring, is easily cured, and then the cold bath secures the patient from any return; but an autumnal ague is often difficult to cure, it generally fatiguing the person a long time, even for six months. In old people, and those of a bad habit of body it is very bad; as also if complicated with any chronic disease; it killed the aged, as it did that pedantic and arbitrary prince king James the First.

Cuticular eruptions in the skin; breakings out on the lips or nose; the hemorrhoidal flux, black and concocted urine, succeeded by a looseness; a swelled belly in children, and swelled legs of adults, are all good signs of its leaving the patient, being so many critical discharges; and it is observable, no body ever dies of an ague; but in the cold fit, during the shaking, by an oppression of the spirits, and want of strength sufficient to raise the fever again, and keep up the motion of the heart.

Their diet both in meat and drink, should be generous and warming, for an ague is not to be starved; but all salt, slimy, and high-dried substances, and malt liquors must be avoided. Thus, mustard, horse radish, red wine, and all aromatics are very proper, and what is remarkable, after all other things have proved unsuccessful, it has been found from experience, that a removal from a chill air to a warmer, has alone performed the cure of an ague at last.

The cold bath is one of the best things that can be used for the cure of this dull distemper; or to keep it off from returning again after it is cured, having stopt the fits first by the bark. But not to be used in winter, for fear of chilling too much the small natural heat, unless near a warm bed, to be clapt between the blankets directly; but by no means by very ancient, or debilitated persons.

The bark is oftentimes blamed wrongfully, in that it does not perform miracles, or answer to the capricious humours of unreasonable men. That is, always to cure so effectually as that the disease disease shall not return again. I wonder what other medicine else will; it is enough, and sufficient surely, if it cures while taking, therefore, if the blood, after forbearing the bark, assumes its former viscosity again, the bark is not to be blamed for that, but only repeat it again, and see if it does not repeat the cure. Wherefore in about a week after the first cure, repeat the cortex, and again in two weeks after that, and so you may prevent a relapse, and let the bark have fair play. Which method, with a course of steel, bitters, and cold bath, it is almost impossible such sluggish fevers should return; the cause being so entirely overcome; and I am sure the fault is not in the doctor, but in the patient; proceeding from some neglect, or mistake, in punctually prosecuting his orders, thro' diffidence, or oblatinacy.

The cure is best, and soonest produced by gentle emeticks, and the Jesuits Bark; for neither bleeding, nor purging are proper here, as they would chill the poor blood too much, which is cold and rapid enough already; nor is any one medicine given in the fit observed to contribute any thing towards the cure. Baglivi says, while the feverish shivering and cold shakes the whole skin, then the distilled oil of cloves anointed on the upper region of the belly relaxes the shiverings every where. Pisa recommends a draught of the juice of lemons, with sugar and a little water given several times hot, about the beginning of the fit. This cured the disease as a diuretic. I mention these things for trial, if any have a mind to make the experiment. For my own part, I think lying between hot blankets, and drinking plentifully of some weak warm liquids, such as sack, or white wine whey, or sage tea, with a little wine in it, is the best way to shorten the cold fit. Avoid hot or spirituous stimulators, least should raise the subsequent fever higher than you would afterwards be willing to bear, and perhaps not without hazard too, and of rendering the fever inflammatory.

An ounce or two of emetic wine, called Vinum Benedictum, given to such as are strong enough to bear such rough vomits, two or three hours before the setting in of the third fit, will often cure a tertian, and so does any brisk vomit sometimes. I admire, Morton should say, that antimony diaphoretic given a little before the fit, sometimes removes it; whereas Boerhaave despises this preparation, looking upon it as a dull, insipid, and insignificant earth, not acting even as an absorbent, or any other way: yet however Helvetius extols it for the small-pox. Surely, here lies some mistake among them; and bad is the case where doctors differ.

Salt of wormwood, is reckoned a good febrifuge; so are the flowers of sal armoniac; also camomile flowers, the very best among vegetables, but the single flowered sort are strongest, as they contain most oil, and sometimes preferable to the bark itself, when it cannot, and may not be safely given. Spirit of sal armoniac is accounted a specific by some.

Intermittents where they become chronic make way for various dangerous distempers; as jaundice, asthmas, dropsies and the like. The Peruvian bark excites no sweating, but is a specific, where too plentiful; corrects all manner of concoctions without any sensible evacuation, but by encreasing insensibly, carries off the cause: Wherefore it is so valuable a drug, and the discovery thereof, one of the greatest blessings lately bestowed upon mankind; there being now many well, and walking, without the use of which, their bodies would have been long ago a lying in the dust, and mouldering in their graves.

I had once a mind to give here an account of the time, and occasion of the first discovery and use of the bark; the alteration it has since undergone; with the several other diseases it is a specific for; but as I bethought myself it would protract this article too much, which is long enough already without it. I perhaps may make it a distinct article by itself; to satisfy the curious, and to improve its practice.

Thus far of general remarks and directions, now let us come to particulars. First, men in all agues, and intermittents, begin the cure with an emetic to cleanse the prima via, and prepare the stomach for the better reception, and retention of the bark. Sometimes a repetition of an emetic just before the onset of the fit, for a few times, will carry the illness off, without any other medicine at all; one scruple, or half a dram at most, is a sufficient dose of the powder of ipecacuanha, at a time; work it off, after it has operated once of itself, and not before, with carduus, or camomile-tea, lest it should take to the downwards by being too soon diluted in the stomach, and so prove purgative. When the sweating fit is over, the the fever abated, and the pulse becomes calm again, begin to take of the bark, half a dram, or a whole one, with twenty or thirty drops of acid elixir of vitriol in each dose, every three or four hours, according to the distance between the fits, mixt up smooth in a glass of red wine, or brandy and water. The brandy will prevent its making you sick sometimes better than the wine, and if it proves purgative, add some powder of cinnamon, and ten or sixteen drops of liquid laudanum in every dose, or in the evening one before bed-time at least. Bark should never be taken without elixir of vitriol, being proper upon its own account, as it is an astringent, and a good juccedaneum to the cortex, besides, making it go farther, and adding a greater efficacy to the same. Some can swallow the bark best by way of bolus.

If the ague be an autumnal one, proper purgation with senna or rhubarb, or tindura sacra, will be highly proper, first, by reason of the contracted foulness of the blood and juices, to prepare the body for the rough bark, which otherways would rather obstruct the vessels, than cure the illness: Wherefore it is safest also to see two or three fits over first, before you administer the cortex.

If the bark be good, fresh, and finely pulverised, which it should always be to depend upon it, six drams taken in the interval of two fits are generally sufficient to stop a spring ague, and an ounce, to put off the fit of an autumnal one. But although this small quantity may stop the fits for the present, yet to prevent their return, the bark must be continued for some time, which prevents a relapse, or the blood will gradually return to its former viscid state again, and consequently the ague too depending thereon.

The neglect of this precaution, and its consequence, makes many slight the cortex, whereas it is one of the greatest gifts a sickly man ever met with; wherefore to mend the mistake, let a dose of it be taken twice or thrice a day for the first week the fit is stoppt; and once a day for another week, and then once in three or four days for a month, and that will perform what you want of it: prevent a relapse.

If nothing you can add to the powder will prevent its speedily running through you, as sometimes it so happens; give the bark in decoction, for all bare infusions are too weak, whether hot, or cold, as not being able to extract its rosin sufficiently. If it purges even then, after the addition of cinnamon, and laudanum, lay it quite aside, as improper, as nature, the best director, recoils so much against it, and use Dr. Fuller's pulvis febrifugus, composed of camomile flowers, antimony diaphoretic, and salt of wormwood, and his bark glyster.

Plasters, cataplasms, blisters, and glysters, may all be employed sometimes to very good purposes in this case, and bark waifcoats, especially to children.

As for example, thus: Take of fine powder of best bark, one ounce; camphire pounded, one dram, spiders webs as many as you can get with a sufficiency of Venice turpentine, or mithridate, work them up into the consistency of a plaster, to be spread on dimety or leather, and applied all over the belly; around the wrists, and to the soles of the feet. For young children, use Dr. Pye's bark waifcoat, that is, an ounce or two of the said powder, by the assistance of wool scattered and quilted between two pieces of thin linen, ingeniously invented by him, and charitably communicated to the public.

A glyster may be composed thus: Boil an ounce of powdered bark in ten ounces of water, and as much sack, till half is wasted; to the strained liquor add a dram of Venice treacle, and one of diascordium, made without honey, and force it milk-warm up the body, by way of glyster, as soon as the fit is gone off, and repeat it three or four times a-day. In case of a looseness, add astringent root to the decoction, or cinnamon, dried roses, relaxative pomegranate peel, or the like, and after the liquor is strained off, add powder of bole armoniac, and liquid laudanum, twenty or thirty drops.

The simple bark alone, will generally cure common agues, but in very old and obstinate ones, bitters and steel, with previous purging, will effect the purpose, which otherwise would fail.

Here it is well worth observing, that the Jesuits bark consists of three different and distinct parts, a resinous, a saline, and a woody principle. The last of which has no manner of virtue, as a medicine at all, but proves often hurtful to the constitution, and is the cause of those bad effects the bark is often, and not unjustly blamed for. The sick fits, purgings and stuffings up, being owing to this rough, liginous, and undigestable chaff; and yet I have known some who could swallow half an ounce at a time, without the least inconveniency following it, and have stopt their agues in a hurry.

The whole virtue of the simple drug resides in its rosin and salt; both which, with a little juice, may be commodiously extracted, and artificially joined together in an elegant liquid, or solid extract, without that chaffy obstructing part, so as to be administered with all the desirable safety, pleasure and advantage.

The common extracts made from bitter white-wine, or rectified spirits alone, are not the thing required, those two menstruums separate, touching only a single principle of the bark, leaving the other remaining in the wood as it was: the saline part being best taken up with weak white-wine poured upon the powder, and digested some days therewith after that the rosin has been totally extracted by strong spirits of wine, then both these two different liquors or tinctures may at last be very nicely combined by the interposition of sugar; an ounce of this preparation taken two or three times a-day, where the bark is proper, is an excellent medicine, as is Dr. Huxam's tincture, a proportion thereof also. But of this, and of the bark itself, and the many uses it is good for, I may probably send you hereafter.

I will conclude now with this one remark, a very general one, that may be observed at the end of many fevers of several sorts, and that is this, even after the pulse in the wrist stops, there is no fixing the departure of the patient to a certain hour, or exact time of going off this stage of life; some dying before I got home, though but a short way; and others I have known live out a 'day or two, as cold as if dead all the time, and yet sensible; so secret and remote from our senses are the vital springs of life. A low pulse with a dry tongue and pale urine are mortal signs.

Your humble Servant,
JOHN COOK, M. D.

Memoirs of the late Robert Carteret, Earl of Granville, hereditary Bailiff of the Isle of Jersey.

THE father of this nobleman was one of the last British worthies. His own merit raised his family to the honours of the peerage. The Carterets of St. Ouen, in the Isle of Jersey, though distinguished by no other titles than their valour and their loyalty, if March, 1776.

fued from an ancient race of Norman heroes. The annals of the little spot whither they had been transplanted for several centuries past, make an honourable mention of their glorious deeds, which recommended them to the favour and confidence of the monarch victorious in the fields of Agincourt, and the sceptered Tudors. They have filled for many generations, the first civil employments of Jersey, and the people revered them as their protectors and their defenders.

The administration of my lord Carteret in Ireland, ranks him among the most beneficent governors that ever ruled over that nation, who still hold his memory in the highest veneration. He was the friend and patron of the Swifts, the Addisons, and all those geniuses from whom the reign of queen Anne derives, perhaps, a glory more permanent than from the transient splendor of her victories. His talents, his public virtues, and his eminent services both to the state and the house of Brunswick, engaged George I. after his accession to the British throne, to raise this nobleman to the dignity of an earl. George II. made him one of his principal secretaries of state; and he presided till his death, with equal success and reputation in the councils of that sagacious sovereign, whilst the English fleets and armies gave laws to the universe. He was a fine gentleman, a polite scholar, and a great statesman: with him arose and died the glory of the Carterets.

The late earl, his only son and successor, was rather deficient in his intellects; fond of low company, profuse, fickle, and debauched. Though he had travelled in France, that country celebrated for elegance of manners, and brilliancy of dress, imitated by all its neighbours, lord Carteret appeared constantly in the mean garment of a groom or a coachman, shunning his equals, and rioting in taverns with pimps and prostitutes. The conclusion of his inglorious amours, was a Fleet marriage with one Molly Paddock, a woman of vile extraction, bold, loose and vulgar. She was the superintendent of a bagnio when his lordship began an acquaintance with her, and though the charms of her person were no more attractive than those of her mind, (being coarse, short and clumsy) he gave her the preference above the stale beauties of this seminary of anti-vestals. His noble parent, who had done every thing in his power to reclaim reclaim him from disgrace and infamy, receiving intelligence of a match that reflected an indelible reproach upon his family, disowned and abandoned him; allowing him merely what was necessary for food and raiment. With this scanty pension, lord Carteret could not afford long to drink Burgundy and claret to excess: his creditors' impatience being worn out, and the bailiffs growing troublesome, he threw himself within the verge of the court of green cloth, with his wedded dame. It does not appear that she was faithless to him after marriage; and if she could not behave with dignity, at least she appeared with decency. My lord walked regularly every day four or five hours in the mall of St. James's-park, and now and then joined conversation with servant-maids, street-walkers, and needy adventurers: no gentleman was ever seen with him, thinking it beneath them to associate with such a character. He wore commonly a large coachman's hat, with the flaps down, a jockey striped waistcoat, and his garters below his knees.

When he had money enough to invite three or four hungry parasites to dine with him, they remained in his lordship's company 'till about one o'clock, that he went to bed, scarce ever sober. He spoke French fluently, but was in other respects extremely illiterate, as he never read any thing but the jockey's calendar. He lived eight or nine years in this contemptible indolence and obscurity.

After the death of his father, he resided chiefly at his country-seat in Bedfordshire; where he entertained all the grooms and jockeys of the country without any change in his dress and manners. The jolly countess survived but a little time her additional title and fortune. He seldom attended the house of peers, and when he came to London, it was to diversify his amours, always in the humble and despicable class of chamber-maids and women of pleasure.

In him is literally extinct the lustre of his family, of which he was the last. He had been long sunk into oblivion, and dead to the polite world, before he paid the last debt to nature.

A Letter from General Lee to General Burgoyne.

Camp on Prospect Hill,

Dear Sir,

Dec. 1, 1775.

AS I am just informed you are ready to embark for England, I cannot refrain from once more trespassing on your patience. An opportunity is now presented of immortalizing yourself as the saviour of your country. The whole British empire stands tottering on the brink of ruin, and you have it in your power to prevent the fatal catastrophe; but it will admit of no delay. For heaven's sake, avail yourself of the precious moment; put an end to the delusion: exert the voice of a brave, virtuous citizen, and tell the people at home that they must immediately rescind all their impolitic, iniquitous, tyrannical, murderous acts; that they must overturn the whole frantic system, or that they are undone. You ask me, in your letter, if it is independence at which the Americans aim? I answer, No! the idea never entered a single American's head until a most intolerable oppression forced it upon them. All they required was to remain masters of their own property; and be governed by the same equitable laws which they had enjoyed from the first formation of the colonies. The ties of connection, which bound them to their parent country, were so dear to them, that he who would have ventured to have touched them, would have been considered as the most impious of mortals; but these sacred ties, the same men who have violated or baffled the most precious laws and rights of the people at home, dissipated or refused to account for their treasures, tarnished the glory, and annihilated the importance of the nation; these sacred ties, I say, so dear to every American, Bute and his Tory administration are now rending asunder.

You ask whether it is the weight of taxes of which they complain? I answer, No; it is the principle they combat, and they would be guilty in the eyes of God and men, of the world present, and all posterity, did they not reject it; for if it were admitted, they would have nothing that they could call their own. They would be in a worse condition than the wretched slaves in the West India islands, whose little peculium has ever been esteemed inviolate. But wherefore shall I dwell on this? Is not the case of Ireland the same with their's? They are subordinate to the British empire, they are subordinate to the parliament of Great-Britain, but they tax themselves. Why, as the case is similar, do not you begin with them? But you know, Mr. Burgoyne, audacious as the ministry are, they dare not attempt it. There is one part of your letter which I confess I do not not thoroughly understand. If I recollect right, for I unfortunately have not the letter by me, you say, that if the privilege of taxing themselves is what the Americans claim, the contest is at an end. You surely cannot allude to the proposition of North. It is impossible that you should not think with me and all mankind, that these propositions are no more or less than adding to a most abominable oppression, a more abominable insult. But to recur to the question of America's aiming at independence. Do any instructions of any one of the provinces to their representatives, or delegates, furnish the least ground for the suspicion? On the contrary, do they not all breathe the strongest attachment and filial piety for their parent country? But if she discard all the natural tenderness of a mother, and acts the part of a cruel step-dame, it must naturally be expected that their affection ceases; the ministry leave them no alternative, aut servire, aut alienari jubent; it is in human nature, it is a moral obligation to adopt the latter; but the fatal separation has not yet taken place, and yourself, your single self, my friend, may perhaps prevent it. Upon the ministry, I am afraid, you can make no impression; for to repeat a hackneyed quotation:

“They are in blood

“Stepp’d in so far, that should they wade in more,

“To return wou’d be as tedious as go o’er.”

But if you will at once break off all connections with these pernicious men, if you will wave all consideration but the salvation of your country, Great-Britain may stand as much indebted to General Burgoyne as Rome was to her Camillus. Do not, I intreat you, my dear Sir, think this the mad rhapsody of an enthusiast, nor the cant of a factious, designing man; for in these colours, I am told, I am frequently painted. I swear by all that’s sacred, as I hope for honour and comfort in this world, and to avoid misery in the next, that I most earnestly and devoutly love my native country; that I wish the same happy relation to subsist for ages betwixt her and her children, which has raised the wide arch of her empire to so stupendous and enviable a height; but at the same time I avow, that if the parliament and people should be depraved enough to support any longer the present ministry in their infernal scheme, my zeal and reverence for the rights of humanity are so much greater than my fondness for any particular spot, even the place of my nativity, that had I any influence in the councils of America, I would advise not to hesitate a single instant, but decisively to cut the gordian knot, now besmeared with civil blood.

This I know is strong, emphatic language, and might pass with men, who are strangers to the flame which the love of liberty is capable of lighting up in the human breast, for a proof of my insanity; but you, Sir, you, unless I have mistaken you from the beginning, will conceive that a man in his sober senses may possess such feelings. In my sober senses, therefore, permit me, once more, most earnestly to intreat and conjure you to exert your whole force, energy, and talents, to stop the ministry in this their headlong career. If you labour in vain (as I must repeat I think will be the case) address yourself to the people at large; by adopting this method, I am so sanguine as to assure myself of your success; and your public character will be as illustrious as your personal qualities are amiable to all who intimately know you. By your means the colonists will long continue the farmers, planters, and shipwrights of Great-Britain; but if the present course is persisted in, an eternal divorce must inevitably take place. As to the idea of subduing them into servitude, and to indemnify yourselves for the expence, you must be convinced, long before this, of its absurdity.

I should not, perhaps, be extravagant, if I advanced, that all the ships in the world would be too few to transport force sufficient to conquer three millions of people unanimously determined to sacrifice every thing to liberty; but if it were possible, the victory would be not less ruinous than the defeat. You would only destroy your own strength. No revenue can possibly be extracted out of this country. The army of placements might be increased, but her circuitous commerce, founded on perfect freedom, which alone can furnish riches to the metropolis, would fall to the ground. But the dignity of Great-Britain, it seems, is at stake. Would you, Sir, if in the heat of your passion you had struck a simple drummer of your regiment, and afterwards discovered it unjustly, think it any forfeiture of your dignity to acknowledge the wrong? No, (I am well acquainted with your disposition) you would ask his pardon at the head of your regiment.

I shall now conclude (if you will excuse the pedantry) with a sentence of Latin: "Iustum est bellum quibus necessarium, et pia arma quibus nulla, nisi in armis, relinquatur spes." I most sincerely wish you a quick and prosperous voyage; and that your happiness and glory may be equal to the idea I have of your merits, as I am with the greatest truth and affection yours,

Histories of the Tete-a-Tete annexed; or Memoirs of P—— M——, Esq; and Miss Clara H——d.

THE hero of these pages is nearly related to a noble family, the title of which is now in litigation with a certain lady as remarkable for her generosity as her em-bon-point. Mr. M——, after having finished his studies, went abroad, and visited several courts of Europe; his amiable manners and agreeable address recommended him to the attention of several princes of Germany, and even crowned heads. The king of Prussia particularly distinguished him, and he was often of that monarch's private and hunting parties. He also visited the celebrated Mons. de Voltaire at Ferney, and was there entertained in a philosophical manner by that great genius. At home he was greatly esteemed by all his acquaintance. In conversation he is facetious without being severe, and is lively and vivacious without frivolity.--- These recommendations made him a great favourite of the ladies, and his company was courted and solicited on all hands. He had hitherto secured his heart, notwithstanding the many female snares that were thrown out to entrap him. At length, however, the little god prevailed, and he found himself a victim to the charms of Miss Y——g, a celebrated toast, whose sole ambition was conquest, and who, like a salamander, could remain unscorched amidst the most ardent flames. When her lovers talked to her about the tender passion, she rallied them upon their weakness, in giving way to idle whims. As she had a numerous train of admirers, she played them off one against the other, in the stile of a high-finished coquette; and though she did not appear to entertain a partiality for any particular lover, she frequently brought them to the point of cutting one another's throats through mere jealousy.

Mr. M——, after dangling some months, without finding he had made the least impression upon his mistress's affections, resolved en philosophe, to attempt surmounting his passion by absence. He accordingly set off for a tour round England, taking the different watering-places in his way. He reached Tunbridge, at a time there was a great concourse of company; and though, for some days, he could not enter into the spirit of the place, by degrees variety of objects, and different amusements, in some measure alleviated the pain he had felt for his unkind mistress. He arrived at Brighthelmstone in the height of the season, and here meeting with several of his acquaintance, he passed his time very agreeably, and almost forgot Miss Y——g, and all her female artifices. When he had so far recovered his reason, he was informed of her arrival at Brighthelmstone: this news made him resolve immediately to depart, and he set off that very afternoon, to avoid meeting her at the rooms, when she would have renewed all his anxiety, and his tour have proved of no kind of efficacy. After reaching Southampton, he was informed by a letter from a friend, that Miss Y——g was playing her old game, and had intimated to a confidante, that she was a little mortified Mr. M—— had escaped the influenza of her charms, as she would have reduced him to his former state of captivity.

Upon Mr. M——'s return to the capital, after a tour of above three months, he found the tranquility of his mind perfectly restored. He soon after heard that Miss Y——g had, notwithstanding all the proofs she had given of her heart being invulnerable, fallen a prey to a fortune-hunter, whose sole recommendation was his impudence. He harassed her wherever she went, day and night he teased her into compliance, and at length she gave him her hand to avoid his importunities. It cannot be supposed that Mr. M—— did not feel a secret gratification in the Hibernian so completely avenging his cause. He was sorry, however, to hear the sequel of Miss Y——g's indiscretion. Her husband proved an errant sharper, who, after stripping her of all he could seize, left her to lament her folly, and repine at the many good matches she had with scorn and ridiculous female pride rejected. Her vanity was so mortified by the epigrams and lampoons which flew about at her expence, that she resolved to retire to the continent, and pass the remainder of her days in the most reclusive manner in a convent. Thus terminated the career of this tyrannical beauty, whose arbitrary reign formed a remarkable remarkable epocha in the annals of the beau monde.

About this time the affair of lady G——r began to transpire, when George S——n brought the first news of it to Arthur's, and Mr. M——s having in his pocket the letter of Miss Y——'s surrender to Capt. M——y at Bright-helmstone, it was universally pronounced by the contrast of these two extraordinary female characters, that Woman was a Riddle, as the bills of Drury-lane house that day testified.

Mr. M—— having obtained the post of d—y r—r of R——d P—k, he passed the greatest part of his time in the pleasant villa officially allotted him. In this calm retreat he had time to make researches of a philosophical kind, and he passed a whole summer in the company of the best authors in most arts and sciences. Neither was classical or polite literature overlooked, and he renewed his former intimacy with all the great geniuses ancient and modern. This, Mr. M—— declares, was the most agreeable period of his life; having laid aside all the parade and etiquette of courts, his time glided away in philosophic ease and meditation.

Some family business calling him to town the ensuing winter, he renewed his former gaiety, and appeared with his usual éclat at all the public places. He constantly attended the theatres whenever a new piece, or a new performer was announced in the bills. Mr. M—— had never yet seen our heroine off or on the stage, though she had performed the preceding summer with tolerable success, at Mr. Foote's theatre in the Haymarket, particularly in the part of Calista in the Fair Penitent; but as this was during Mr. M——'s retirement at R——d P—k, he had no opportunity of seeing her. Miss H——d was now engaged at Drury-lane for the winter season, and promised to be an ornament to the stage. Our hero was struck with the elegance of her figure, and the symmetry of her features; he learnt that she was not among the number of those obdurate fair ones, who let a swain sigh for years at their feet, without obtaining any hopes of relief. He easily procured an introduction to this disciple of Melpomene, and soon insinuated himself so far into her good graces, that a treaty of mutual affection ensued, to the satisfaction of both parties.

It is necessary that we should here give a sketch of the life of our heroine, previous to this connexion. Her father and mother moved in a very humble sphere, and if fame says true, their abode was for some time subterraneous. Her mother was a dealer in oysters, and Clara was the vender at the coffee-houses near Temple-bar. A pretty girl, remarkably neat in her apparel, in such a station, never fails attracting the attention of the young fellows who close their evenings at Nando's or Ander-ton's. Our heroine might, with strict impartiality, claim the pre-eminence over all the trade, in that, or perhaps any other, part of the metropolis. A young student in the law, who had frequently said civil things to her at the coffee-house, sent for her one evening to his chambers: whether she was unsuspecting of his design, or she was armed for the event, cannot be ascertained, but she waited upon him agreeable to the mandate. We shall not describe the interview, but content ourselves with relating that she was soon an inmate of his chambers, and acted in the double capacity of a housekeeper and companion. Her natural turn for gaiety was now in a great measure gratified; she dressed genteelly, and appeared at public places, and in particular at the play-house. She had a natural turn for dramatic representations, and probably this predominant disposition might not a little have influenced her late conduct. She had also access to her lover's library, and as he had all the best dramatic writers, they were her chief amusement when at home, and during the hours of her friend's being engaged in business. At his leisure, she would repeat speeches to him, and he would correct any inaccuracies in her pronunciation; by which means she attained a tolerable delivery, and rehearsed some parts better than many female candidates for the stage.

Thus passed a whole winter to their mutual satisfaction. In the spring the young advocate was called upon the northern circuit, and Clara was left at home to take care of his chambers. This being rather a melancholy situation, she frequently walked out with an acquaintance she had made with a female in the same predicament as herself. Ranelagh and Vauxhall being now opened, they failed not frequently to visit. Two fine women, entire new faces upon the town, excited the attention of all the gay young fellows, who soon discovered in what line they moved. Captain D——n and Mr. L——g soon fool got introduced to them, and recommended their suits so well, that the ladies became joint confidantes in their infidelity. The red coat fell to Clara's lot; and it is well known among the demi-reps of taste, that there is much difficulty in resisting a cockade and a handsome fellow.

Upon Mr. G——'s return from the circuit, he thought he perceived a very great difference in Clara's behaviour; her coolness gave him suspicions that a rival had, in his absence, supplanted him in her affections. Jealousy excited his attention to trace, if possible, the happy man. He was but too successful for his own repose: He intercepted a letter, which revealed the whole mystery—Mr. G——'s fondness for Clara had not diminished, and he was very unhappy in making the discovery. He had, however, the fortitude to dissolve the connexion, and she, for the present, was well pleased at the disunion, as she entertained a much stronger penchant for the captain than the counsellor. A few weeks opened her eyes; she found her gallant was in great distress, and a short time lodged him in a lock-up-house. She could now receive no assistance from him, or afford him any relief—Clara had only her stock of charms to subsist on, and it was now necessary she should bring them to market.

Capt. H——k was the first that fell to her lot in this pursuit; but he was not in a state of affluence, and depended chiefly upon the ladies for his support. He could not, however, resist Clara, and in time she completely exhausted his purse.

The summer season coming on, and the Capt. in the country, it was necessary to think of some other supplies; but the ways and means were not so readily hit on. After ruminating for some time, she resolved to call her theatrical powers into play; and being introduced to Mr. Foote, he judged Miss H—— would be an acquisition to his company, as his forces were then but weak.

She appeared (as we have already mentioned) in the part of Calista, and with such success, as to bring several good houses. In a word, her theatrical merit was considered sufficient to admit her amongst the Drury-lane company, where our hero first saw her, when Miss H——'s charms struck him so forcibly, that he resolved to form an acquaintance with her. A few weeks effected the design; and at the end of the season, he took her down to his villa, near R——d. Here she has resided almost ever since, except upon some short excursions to the capital.

She has given up her dramatic pursuits since she formed this alliance, at the request of our hero, who is fearful that the same charms which made so strong an impression upon him, may operate with equal force on some other admirer, when she appears with all the attractions of stage ornament.

They pass their time very agreeably in this retreat, seeing but little company: they nevertheless find resources of amusement in their own conversation, books, and rural diversions. It is, therefore, probable, that an union formed upon so permanent a basis, may be of long duration.

Virtue rewarded: A Pastoral Tale: From the German of Gessner.

GLICERA was beautiful and poor. Scarce had she the numbered sixteen springs, when the lost the mother who had brought her up. Reduced to servitude, she kept the flocks of Lamon, who cultivated the lands of a rich citizen of Mitylene.

One day, her eyes flowing with tears, she went to visit her mother's solitary tomb. She poured upon the grave a cup of pure water, and suspended crowns of flowers to the branches of the bushes she had planted round it. Seated beneath the mournful shade, and drying up her tears, she said, 'O thou most tender of mothers, how dear to my heart is the remembrance of thy virtues! if ever I forget the instructions thou gavest me, with such a tranquil smile, in that fatal moment, when, inclining thy head upon my bosom, I saw thee expire;—if ever I forget them, may the propitious Gods forsake me! and may thy sacred shade for ever fly me! It is thou that hast just preserved my innocence. I come to tell thy manes all. Wretch that I am! Is there any one on earth to whom I dare open my heart?

Nicias, the Lord of this country, came hither to enjoy the pleasures of the Autumn. He saw me; he regarded me with a soft and gracious air. He praised my flocks, and the care I took of them: he often told me that I was gentle, and made me presents. Gods! how was I deceived! but in the country who mistrusts? I said to myself, How kind our Master is! May the Gods reward him! All my vows shall be for him: 'tis all that I can do; but I will for ever do it. The rich are happy, py, and favoured by the Immortals. When bountiful, like Nicias, they deserve to be happy. This to myself I said, and let him take my hand, and press it in his. The other day I blush'd, and dared not look up, when he put a gold ring upon my finger. See, he said, what is engraved on this stone? A winged child, who smiles like thee; and 'tis he that must make thee happy. As he spoke these words, he strook my cheeks, that were redder than the fire. He loves me; he has the tenderness of a father for me: How have I deserved so much kindness from a Lord, and so rich and powerful? O, my mother, that was all thy poor child thought. Heavens! how was I deceived! This morning he found me in the orchard; he chuck'd me familiarly under the chin. Come, he said, bring me some new-blown flowers to the myrtle-bower, that I may there enjoy their sweet perfumes. With haste I chose the finest flowers; and, full of joy, I ran to the bower. Thou art, he said, more nimble than the Zephyrs, and more beautiful than the Goddesses of flowers. Then, immortal Gods! I yet tremble at the thought; then he catch'd me in his arms, and pressed me to his bosom, and all that love can promise, all that is soft and seducing, flow'd from his lips. I wept; I trembled. Unable to resist such arts, I had been for ever lost. No, thou wouldst no longer have had a child, if thy remembrance had not watch'd over my heart. Ah! if thy worthy mother had ever seen thee suffer such disgraceful caresses! That thought alone gave me power to force myself from the arms of the seducer and fly.

'Now I come; O with what comfort is it that I still dare! I come to weep over thy grave. Alas! poor and unfortunate as I am, why did I lose thee when so young. I droop like a flower, deprived of the support that sustain'd its feeble stalk. This cup of pure water I pour to the honour of thy manes. Accept this garland! Receive my tears! May they penetrate even to thy ashes! Hear, O my mother, hear; 'tis to thy dear remains, that repose beneath these flowers, which my eyes have so often bedewed; 'tis to thy sacred shade I here renew the vows of my heart. Virtue, innocence, and the fear of the Gods, shall make the happiness of my days. Therefore poverty shall never disturb the serenity of my mind. May I do nothing that thou wouldst not have approved with a smile of tenderness, and I shall surely be, as thou wast, belov'd of Gods and men: For I shall be gentle, modest, and industrious. O my mother, by living thus, I hope to die like thee, with smiles and tears of joy."

Glicera, on quitting the place, felt all the powerful charms of virtue. The gentle warmth that was diffused over her mind sparkled in her eyes, still wet with tears. She was beautiful as those days of Spring, when the sun shines through a transient shower.

With a mind quite tranquil, she was hastening back to her labour, when Nicias ran to meet her, 'O Glicera! he said, and tears flowed down his cheeks, I have heard thee at thy mother's tomb. Fear nothing, virtuous maid! I thank the immortal Gods! I thank that virtue, which hath preserved me from the crime of seducing thy innocence. Forgive me, chaste Glicera! Forgive, nor dread in me a fresh offence. My virtue triumphs through thine. Be wise, be virtuous, and be ever happy. That meadow, surrounded with trees, near to thy mother's tomb, and half the flock thou keepest, are thine.'

May a man of equal virtue complete the happiness of thy days! Weep not, virtuous maid! but accept the present I offer thee with a sincere heart, and suffer me from henceforth to watch over thy happiness. If thou refusest me, a remorse for offending thy virtue will be the torment of all my days. Forget, O vouchsafe to forget my crime, and I will revere thee as a propitious power that hath defended me against myself.'

To the Publisher of the Hibernian Magazine.

SIR,

AS I wish to contribute to your useful magazine, and as I find several persons are desirous of knowing from whence is derived that horrid custom of throwing at cocks, I have sent you the following, which I have lately read.

SOPHIA.

"When the Danes were masters of England, and lorded over the natives of this island, the inhabitants of a certain great city, grown weary of their slavery, had formed a conspiracy to murder their master in one bloody night; and twelve men had undertaken to enter the town house by a stratagem, and seizing the arms, surprise the guard which kept it, at which time their fellows upon a signal given, were to come out of their houses, and murder all opposers; but when they were putting it into execution, the unusual crowing and fluttering of the cocks about the place they attempted to enter at, discovered their design, upon which the Danes became so enraged, that they doubled their cruelty, and used them with more severity than ever. Soon after they were delivered from the Danish yoke, and to revenge themselves on the cocks for the misfortune they involved them in, instituted this custom of knocking them on the head on Shrove Tuesday, the day on which it happened. This sport, though, at first, only practised in one city, in process of time became a natural divertisement, and has continued ever since the Danes first lost this island."

The Signification of some of our antient Titles of Honour, Dignity and Office.

King.

THIS is an abridgment of the antient Tuetonick word cuning, or, as it is sometimes written, cyning. The letter C being founded and used as K. Our ancestors contracted cuning into one syllable, and made it king, which signifies a man singularly valiant. Certain ~~was~~ that the kings of most nations were antiently elected by the people for their superior valour and strength, as being the most fit to defend and govern.

Queen.

As in the Tuetonick language Cuning was the name of the chief man, Cuningina was that of the principal woman.

The word Queen, however, is very antient, and was used by our Saxon ancestors, who wrote it Qænen. In the antient Danish tongue, Qæna signified a woman, or a wife.

Prince.

It is derived from the Latin word Princeps; but our ancestors used the word Furist, which implies first or chief, and seems to be a contraction of the Tuetonick word Furistan, which bears a like import.

Duke.

From the Latin word Dux, which signifies the leader or conductor of an army; but our ancestors used the name of Heretoga. Here, in the Tuetonick, signifies an army, and toga, to draw, or train forward.

Earl.

It is an abbreviation of the antient word Bar-ethel, which was first of all abridged to Bar-el. It signifies of noble honour, and is nearly of the same import with Comes in Latin, Count in French, and Grave in Dutch.

Lord.

The derivation of this word is as singular as the title is honourable. In the times of remote antiquity it was written Hlaford and Laforð. Now blaf, or laf, (from whence our modern word loaf) signified bread, and ford, one who gave. Laforð, therefore, or, as we now write it, Lord, implies a giver of bread. It has been the custom in England for many ages, for persons of great wealth to distinguish themselves by their hospitality and benevolence; and to the honour of the present age it ought to be recorded that this laudable custom is yet far from being forgotten, or neglected.

Lady.

Two hundred years ago this was the title of all women, from the wife of the knight to the wife of the king. By modern usage it is become the complimentary name of almost every woman but those of the lowest ranks.—It was antiently written Hleafsdian, or Leafsdian; afterwards Lafely, and lastly, Lady. It signifies a bread-server: and it appears that as the Laforð did allow food to be given away, the Leafsdian attended to see it served. Hence, perhaps, arose the practice, throughout this country, of the mistresses of families carving, and serving their guests at table, which is not practised in any considerable degree, in any other kingdom of Europe.

Knight.

This title of dignity was antiently written Cniht, and implied a servant. In the modern Teutonick it is written Rider, and answers to the Latin word Eques, and the French Chevalier, and may be Englished A horseman. It seems to be a probable conjecture that knight became an honourable name among our ancestors, from the knights who are admitted to the immediate service of the king, and had the honour to ride with him. There are persons called knights, who are not properly so, as our Knights of the Shire, who are representatives of the counties, and who, probably, take the title from the dignity of the trust which is reposed in them.

A Maxim.

TO secure to the old that influence which they are willing to claim, and which might to much contribute to the improvement of the arts of life, it is absolutely necessary that they give themselves up to the duties of declining years; and contentedly resign to youth its levity, its pleasures, its frolics, and its fopperies.—It is a lifeless endeavour to unite the contrarieties of spring and winter, and unjust to claim the privileges of age, and retain the playthings of childhood.

The Character and Conduct of the female Sex, and the Advantages to be derived by young Men from the Society of virtuous Women. A Discourse in three Parts, delivered in Monkwell-street Chapel, January 1, 1776, by James Fordyce, D. D. (Continued from p. 119.)

P A R T II.

IT is worthy of remark, that the most Divine Instructor ever known upon earth, scrupled not to commend, in the strongest terms, and on the gravest occasions, the upright and the penitent amongst his female as well as male attendants. The Son of God, my brethren, deemed it not beneath his own dignity, or unbecoming the profession of a religious teacher in general, to descend into common life, and address all characters and classes, through whatever diversity of circumstances or manners, with a minuteness and a freedom, which could indeed offend none, but the malignant, the illiberal, or the prejudiced. Nor was He at a loss to discover, any more than slow to approve in the kindest style, laudable and excellent dispositions in numbers of the other sex. I go farther, and say, that this sex, so much depreciated in these days, he was pleased to honour with a particular share of his attention and zeal.

His approbation, it is true, was always regulated by a just distinction of characters; neither did he fail to reprehend, where it became necessary, his firmest adherents, or his dearest friends. The same voice, that celebrated the wisdom of Mary, reproved the anxiety of Martha. Our Saviour was well aware, that applause and admonition are equally the language of friendship, as occasion is given for either. He never was backward to bestow the first when merited, and to bestow it openly, frankly, affectionately; as, on the other hand, his regard for those that loved him was too enlightened, and too pure, to permit his withholding the last, when any part of their behaviour rendered it requisite. Yes, my fellow christians, our Master was alike superior to that littleness of soul which commends reluctantly, with cold reserve, or political caution, and to that servility or cowardice which remains silent when virtue and faithfulness call to speak out.

be afraid or ashamed to express, in the most public manner, his respect for the more deserving of the female sex; to encourage by applauding their virtues, or, by admonishing them, to correct their faults; to enter into the detail of human conduct in speaking to human beings, or to draw without disguise the picture of a dissipated and debauched age, whose reformation it is his duty to promote by all possible means, at whatever hazard of ridicule from the satirical, of censure from the contracted, or of calumny and abuse from the false and the malevolent? Against the miserable, but unwearied, efforts of such minds, the proper armour is a good conscience, joined for the most part with a calm contempt.

As for ourselves, indeed, we do not think it requires much fortitude to confess our having felt an early predilection for good and amiable women. It proceeded from an early observation of the modesty which always adorns their deportment, of the elegance and vivacity which often distinguish their conversation, and of that delightful interest which the tender affections, and attractive manners, found among the most valuable of the sex, are peculiarly adapted to create in hearts of the least feeling. Nor has our opinion in their favour, or our attachment to their society, been lessened, by longer experience, in any greater proportion than there is reason to apprehend the pleasing sensibilities, and flattering ideas, of youth on most other subjects, will naturally be lowered in the progress of life.

It is certain, that all advantages are not to be secured together. If superior degrees of inward tranquillity and self-possession are gained, when inclination and fancy become more cool, the objects of the latter will seldom appear so captivating to the soul as they were wont. Though their intrinsic merit may not be at all abated, they will scarcely strike the intellectual eye with the same lively lustre.

It must also be acknowledged, that, as we advance through the world, wider views, more opportunities, and maturer judgments, with a variety of unexpected events and unimagined circumstances, often painful, sometimes deplorable, lead to mortifying discoveries concerning a number of characters in both sexes: neither can it be thought wonderful, if in the present condition of our nature we should not find very many, who are capable of bearing a close acquaintance or severe inspection.

When awakened from our youthful dreams of unbounded confidence, and of admiration flaming to enthusiasm, what remains for us, but to be more moderate in our expectations, more reasonable in our regards, and to cultivate that spirit of mutual forbearance which is so becoming in imperfect beings, so necessary to our peace, and so noble a branch of christian virtue? But how seldom are these maxims observed!

Offended by frequent disappointment in persons as well as things, men are prone to conceive disgust at those about them, instead of laying the blame on their own too sanguine hopes; and in the impatience of disapprobation, occasioned by particular instances of vice or folly, to exchange their former partiality for a less happy extreme, that of general suspicion and unlimited satire. In the mean time they forget to consider, that others are detecting frailties and failings in themselves, which, unless they meet with kinder allowance than they often make where their neighbours are concerned, must excite similar disaffection, and beget an asperity of reproach which they are ill able to support.

Mournful, alas! would be the situation of mortals, were even the best of them to be tried by the strict rules of unerring rectitude; were no allowance to be made for temptations and imbecilities, from which it does not appear that human resolution, or human vigilance, has ever yet proved an universal preservative. But are none of you, gentlemen, disposed to exact from the other sex a degree of perfection, which you hold yourselves excused from attempting? I fear it is but too common for men, in the pride of their hearts, to pronounce women the weaker vessel, not in the favourable sense of St. Paul. But pride is always accompanied with injustice: for at the same moment that they pique themselves on their own superiority, they demand from this weaker vessel a strength, of which they judge it unnecessary to set the example.

That Providence designed women for a state of dependence, and consequently of submission, I cannot doubt, when I consider their timidity of temper, their tenderness of make, the many comforts and even necessities of life which they are unable to procure without our aid, their evident want of our protection upon a thousand occasions, their incessant study, at every age, in every state, by every means, to engage our attention, and insure our regard. But if this be true, is it noble in us, is it generous, is it manly, to look upon them with a supercilious eye, or, because they are in our power, to exult in their debility? If to raise a fallen enemy be the part of a hero, what is it to triumph over a confiding friend, to insult those who throw themselves on our patronage, or to return the coldness of neglect, where there are so many claims to compassion, observance, and affection?

Did I find the softer sex abused only by the coarsest and lowest of ours, by men who approach to brutes or to barbarians, it were less astonishing. But what am I to think, when I frequently find men of education and politeness, elegant scholars, and pleasing companions,—when I find them too departing at once from the gentleness and elevation of humanity, and disgracing their accomplishments, by wantonly involving even the best women in their unbounded satire against the female race, and, as far as in them lies, sacrificing to wit and merriment the reputation of defenceless creatures, who are not present to vindicate themselves, and have not power to punish their traducers? But the truth is, he who has not happened to witness such cases, will hardly believe what cruelties of this kind are often committed by those who join not principle to cultivation.

It is somewhat remarkable, that the greatest lampooners of the women have been often their greatest dupes. Dissatisfied with gratifications which their reason never could approve, they are willing to shift off the reproach on the partners of their folly, and take revenge on others for consequences which they should charge upon themselves. “The woman whom thou gavest to be with me,” said the first man, “she gave me of the tree, and I did eat.” Unhappy Adam! where was thy fairness, where was thy decency, in casting the load of blame, partly on thy companion, and partly on thy Creator; on that companion whom he gave to thy guardianship and direction; on that Creator, from whom thou hadst but a little while before received her with gratitude and transport?

Do we mean, by this, to excuse the first woman, or, by aught we have said or may say, to flatter any of her daughters? We do not. The language that would

would justify transgression, the praise that instead of cherishing merit would foster conceit, the incense that is offered to beauty or youth, to external advantages or superficial acquirements; instead of being kept sacred to the divinity of virtue, we detest and despise. At the same time we have no conception that the natural, easy, and reasonable expressions of well deserved and well-directed approbation can ever be incompatible with prudence, or with piety; or yet that compassion "for the weak, "and for them that are out of the way," can be justly condemned by the strictest casuistry. We appeal from unfeeling bigots, and savage detractors, to their Divine Philanthropist in our text: "Now Jesus loved Martha, and her sister." And elsewhere we learn, that as he justified and commended the sister in the most explicit manner for her fixed and humble attention to his instructions, so, when he blamed the too anxious, though not indelicate Martha, he performed that less pleasing task with a meekness worthy of himself. Is there not something peculiarly mild, a certain sweetness of reproof, in the very repetition of her name? "Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things."—I think I behold this good creature covered with amiable confusion, at a rebuke, from her master and her friend, thus tenderly conveyed. Her excessive hurry and solicitude, in preparing for the entertainment of her guests, not only produced some warmth and discontent on the subject of her excellent sister, but threw her into a restless agitation of spirit, resembling the state of a person in a tumultuous crowd, where so many are pressing upon him, that he can scarcely stand his ground; for this, it has been observed, the original word seems to import: and by the same means she lost an important opportunity of religious improvement. How often does the soul suffer by the intrusion of little cares! It is plain however that honest Martha, as well as happy Mary, was, notwithstanding a considerable diversity of disposition, sincerely pious and attached.

A propensity to devotion, and a warmth of affection, have in all ages, if I mistake not, been found most frequently among women. Witness the spiritual assemblies, the domestic intercourses, the history and poetry of different nations, whether antient or modern. Have not women been commonly remarked to constitute much the greater number of worshippers? Have not women been often particularly eminent for filial and parental duty? Do not the records of human actions through successive periods, and those representations of human characters which have been founded on them by the tragic and the epic muse,—do not they abound with examples of transcendent piety and generosity in the female sex, of extraordinary sacrifices made by women, I say by women, to the interests of Heaven, to the cause of truth, to the happiness of their country, to virtuous love, to honest fame, to the finest and noblest feelings of the heart?

To style such piety superstition, and such generosity romance, is indeed customary with those who esteem it smartness to turn into ridicule whatever is most respectable or sacred. The Athenian sage himself was held up as an object of laughter: but did he deserve it? Even the world's deliverer was in contempt called "The friend of publicans and sinners:" but is he the less entitled to our love and veneration? Wherever I discern the image of his gentle and elevated virtues, shall I forbear to admire it, because it is mistaken by the prejudiced, or dishonoured by the profane?

That many women have been superstitious, and many romantic, even to distraction, we readily acknowledge, though we do not think that examples of either remarkably abound in the present age. But where is the wonder if particular minds, weak by nature, or enfeebled by disease, or depressed by misfortune, or, should none of these be the case, contracted by a narrow education, alarmed by the dismal representations of some well-meaning preachers and writers, or "led captive by the sleight of men who lie in wait to deceive," and take advantage of tender spirits and apprehensive imaginations;—where, I say, is the wonder, if such minds become a prey to religious terror and despondence; or if those amongst them, who escape so dreadful a situation, yet lose the enjoyment of life, by mistaking gloom for piety? Have we not seen men as well as women often labouring under the same mistake, and sometimes driven to despair and madness from the same causes?

I would likewise ask, can it excite surprise, if passions constitutionally ardent, unrestrained by authority, unenlightened by instruction, encouraged by habitual idleness and fashionable amusements, inflamed and instigated by flatterers, companions, books, occasions, of the most dangerous kind, are frequently carried to an excess destructive of all sober thought thought and internal serenity, even when reputation and decorum are preserved? Instead of thinking it strange, that this should occur so often amidst such a combination of snares, I cannot for my part but admire that it is not yet more common. The swarms of foolish and of worthless novels, incessantly spawned by dull and by dissolute scribblers, and with unwearied industry disseminated from our Circulating Libraries, were alone sufficient to swallow up, amongst the young and gay, all sober reflection, every rational study, with every virtuous principle; and to introduce in their room impure ideas, extravagant desires, and notions of happiness alike fantastic and false. By the influence of those productions on ungarded readers the whole system of life seems converted into romance; and nothing is regarded as worth a thought, which does not promise to gratify inclination, to cherish vanity, or to lead that wild and restless adventurer, Juvenile Fancy, through a fairy land of astonishment and rapture.

Of the hapless creatures that have lost their character, how small is the proportion to the whole sex! But while those wretched wanderers strike the eye of observation by the peculiar infelicity of their case, the numberless women who never deviated are overlooked and forgotten; just as a few frayed sheep engage the attention of the traveller, who stops not to contemplate the large flock from which they are parted.

When I consider the younger part of the female world as now placed in a state of society, where pleasure and show, with the wealth that procures them, are become the chief, almost the only objects; where those better sentiments that should counterwork their operation are derided by the profligate, and neglected by the thoughtless; where celibacy is in fashion amongst men of all ranks, and libertinism amongst women of the highest; it appears to me, that the irreproachable behaviour still found in such numbers, under such circumstances, discovers a force of resolution, and a feeling of decency, which deserve no common praise. In this view, surely, it becomes the generality of our sex to bow with respect before the superior presence of female propriety and fortitude.

In relation to women of a different class, give me leave to ask, who are usually the authors of their ruin and infamy? Who, but the very wretches that suspect and upbraid the sex on their account? Matchless effrontery! Not satisfied with casting the first stone at the poor offenders, whom they themselves have contributed to mislead, they presume to glance it on the innocent by-standers! And by what means are those unhappy beings I speak of most frequently undone? By what other, than an artful and unwearied application to their desire of pleasing the men? A desire which, like the other kind affections implanted by nature, would under just regulation produce the best effects, and which that female, who should profess herself not to feel, would deservedly incur the suspicion of falsehood or ignorance, affectation or insensibility. Unprincipled as are the majority of our sex, and ungarded as are too many even amongst the virtuous of the other, it is indeed often unfortunate when this desire proves very strong.

Far be it from me, to defend the cause of those women, who have forfeited that virtue, without which they are lost to society, to character, to happiness. But with regard to the greater part of them, is it not some mitigation of their guilt, and should it not obtain some compassion for their frailty, that their natural solicitude to engage the attention and tenderness of the men has been turned into a handle for their destruction? Their fond imaginations have been set on fire by obsequiousness, and courtship, and adulation, and promises, and protestations, and presents, and vows, without end. And all the while, perhaps, they have been without a parent to protect, or a friend to warn them. Of those who have parents, and friends as they are called, how few are the happier for that circumstance! how many are much the more to be pitied! those very persons, God knows, being frequently so worthless, as to encourage, if not to instruct them in vice and impiety.

That women, who have gone astray, should sometimes run to excesses, beyond the ordinary limits of male transgression, may perhaps be accounted for from the vivacity peculiar to the sex; from a wish to escape, by the violence and rapidity of their career, that reflection which men have many more ways of eluding; and, may we not add, from that passion for attracting notice by some means or other, which, after bursting the bounds of duty and decorum, hopes to effect its purpose by singularity in wickedness, and audacity of manners? Is it not also possible, I speak it with caution, that Providence, ever intent on extracting good good from evil, may, by giving "them over to a reprobate mind," permit such flagrant indecency, in order to deter the innocent from a path which, once entered, might lure them on to the last extreme of depravation?

Much is said about vanity in women. And are you sure, my young men, that those who say it are always themselves remarkable for modesty? Have you never heard such censures from fops and fribbles, a race of creatures not to be surpassed in conceit by the silliest girl that ever issued from a foolish boarding-school? The illusions of self love are often merely subjects of ridicule: but when human beings confidently reproach the characters of others with those very follies which are conspicuous in their own, and which, let it be observed, they are hourly labouring by their example, conversation, and encouragement, to propagate; we then smile, pity, despise, and condemn; at once.

To whatever cause the difference is owing, good-nature will forgive a female, who appears to be fond of her person or dress, much more readily than a man who betrays the same weakness. Perhaps, indeed, this indulgence to the other sex is at the bottom a compliment to our own: perhaps, gentlemen, we are willing, on such occasions, to make more allowance for the imbecility of those who were formed to delight us, not so much by an emulation of intellects, as by external graces and decorations, united with the softer virtues of the heart, and the sprightlier charms of the fancy. Neither does it require any extraordinary candour to reflect, that female education is too often directly calculated to feed and flatter female vanity.

Is it not well known, that most girls are from their childhood told every day of beauty, and ornament; and the pains to be taken about both? Do they not manifestly discover, in most of the women with whom they converse, a perpetual anxiety on those articles; and in many of the men, a perpetual proneness to admire and extol the sex, exactly in proportion to their outward attractions? Are not their very play-things so decked out, as often to inspire the love of show and embellishment, along with their earliest, and even their best impressions; those, I mean, that are connected with kind affection and tender care? And when they grow up to partake in the pleasures of company, to attend on public diversions, and to engage in fashionable reading, what do they generally find in all these, but eternal marks of attention to appearance and splendor? They cannot even walk the streets of a country town, without having their eyes caught by the exhibition of gaiety and finery in almost every window. As for the metropolis, what is it else but the general mart of all that can propagate admiration of an outside, or, if you will, one intire and enormous scene of enchantment, where fashion, opulence, and ostentation, are incessantly practising their witchcraft? From thence the incantation is every where diffused; and hardly any where are found parents, or teachers, possessed of talents and principles proper to oppose its influence. In reality, how few mothers or mistresses at present are either qualified, or solicitous, to form in the youth of their sex, a taste for the decent and the simple, and at the same time the elegant and the graceful, in looks, in attire, in air, in demeanour; and to imprint upon them a conviction, that all exterior recommendations should ever be regarded as subordinate to "the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit," of an improved and pious mind! When these things are considered, can you wonder, if many women appear fantastic, frivolous, vain?

After all, we pretend not to deny, that the love of dress, and an habitual study of personal attractions, are closely interwoven with the female character. That they are so, seems evident from the history of all nations and ages, whether polished or barbarous. And from this very circumstance we conclude, that they are originally prompted by nature. Nor have we any doubt that, under right direction and within due bounds, they are adapted to answer important purposes in society, by contributing to engage the notice and regard of men; by employing the powers of industry, of imagination, and of taste; by softening the cares, enlivening the toils, appointed for the tender sex; and by supplying many amusements suited to the state of humanity at large, as a scene of labour, frailty, and suffering.

Like other tendencies, indeed, they may now and then give away to such as chance to be stronger. Disgust at the world, austere systems of religious mortification, vehement pursuits of different kinds, and sometimes perhaps a high strain of philosophic refinement, may render a few females much less solicitous about the decent arts of decoration, and the honest allurements of a pleasing appearance. But are they, on that account, count, entitled to much more esteem? Those men who think naturally, will scarce allow it. In the company of young women, we are by no means angry if they should take some pains to recommend themselves by an agreeable outside.

I said, Some pains: for, if their endeavours this way are too strong, too anxious, or too apparent; if they are at great expence of time, or money, or attention, in what relates to their exterior; if ornaments of a higher order, and the more valuable concerns of life, are neglected for it, or but slightly regarded; they will probably miss their aim, with the more discerning part of our sex. The coquet, the flatterer, the fine lady, may sometimes indeed divert them for an hour, but will hardly excite sincere or permanent complacence, the respect and attachment of the soul.

But do not sensible, do not estimable women too frequently betray a passion for the mode, and an ambition of being admitted on the score of external qualities, which we only excuse in the fools of the sex, or in girls of fifteen? It cannot be dissembled; it is much to be regretted. What pity but those women could be persuaded to cultivate a more lively sense of religion, and a nobler spirit of liberality! They would then rise above such weakness: they would then experience an elevation and a joy of the best kind, in sacrificing the folly and parade of life to intellectual pursuits and charitable deeds: and let me tell them, they would then stand several degrees higher in the opinion of the worthiest men. How often they now suffer in that opinion, they seem not to be duly aware.

There are not perhaps upon earth many objects of more dignity or attraction than that female, who, though endow'd with beauty, and skilful in dress, yet discovers nothing conceited on either score, no conscious attention to herself when taken notice of for either; but, while she is too sincere to disavow any advantage she has received from nature or education, behaves with composure, ease, and courtesy, nor ever forgets, that such qualities, with virtue and piety, knowledge and sense, are alone of solid value.

But peradventure it will be asked, do not many women betray upon other points an intoxication of vanity, which no candour will be able to pardon? Are there not many, for example, possessed with a notion, that almost every man is in love with them, who seems pleased with their sentiments, or flattered by their smiles, or disposed to say obliging things in their company, or perhaps to do good-natured ones without a single profession of regard? It is shamefully true. Indelicate and despicable creatures! We blush on your account; nor will we offer the least apology for so extravagant a conceit, for a delusion so very gross. Had you either prudence or penetration, or becoming modesty, you would beware of construing into a serious passion even a thousand complimentary speeches, or yet a thousand warm protestations of I know not what esteem, attachment, and zeal, or indeed any possible assiduities, or appearances of tenderness, where the matter goes no farther; and would rely ultimately on no evidence of settled affection, but an explicit declaration, and a direct address. Not that I would utter, God forbid I should, a word in excuse for those of our sex, that habitually or deliberately indulge themselves in a behaviour, which they cannot be long ignorant is too apt to be dangerously mistaken by young women. Gracious heaven, that any one should thus play with the peace and happiness of the very persons, whom manhood and generosity ought to protect! Little will it avail to plead, that you had no intention, when the mischief is done, when a fond unguarded heart is inveigled, when a fountain of bitterness, that may never cease to flow, is opened in a breast, perhaps in more than one breast, whose chief, or it may be whose only, fault was believing you to be in earnest. Learn, ye credulous fair! oh learn to trust your heart with no man who does not tell you plainly that he has given you his, with a resolution to give you his hand too, as soon as his situation shall permit.

With respect to those selfish and forward females, who catch with eagerness at the least semblance of regard on the part of some male acquaintance, as a pretext for claiming the matrimonial connexion, we cannot help saying, that we abhor alike their meanness and their impudence; that they trespass on all the rules of decent reserve, and maiden dignity; and that they often repress, in the minds of discreet men who know them, many pleasing propensities towards better women, lest these also should be found mercenary and base.

If a wish to possess the heart of some worthy man, co-operating with the partiality which most persons have for themselves, selves, shall induce a woman to conclude too hastily, that such a man is attached to her; it would be decent at least to conceal a persuasion, which women of prudence and delicacy will ever be slow to entertain. To entertain it rashly, we have seen, is always wrong, and frequently pernicious. We now subjoin, that to declare it bluntly is both unwise and contemptible. But then we should remember, that the same behaviour is chargeable on many men. I am particularly concerned for women of sentiment, when I consider how often their good-breeding is put to the trial in the presence of coxcombs, whom their good sense cannot but despise; lest common civility should, with such presumptuous fools, pass for fondness. Surely, gentlemen, one of the last things a man of sense and modesty will suspect is, that a woman is enamoured of him.

Such suspicions indeed properly belong to fribbles, witlings, and libertines. With what triumph have we heard them repeat, in the words of the poet, that "every woman is at heart a rake!" In this uncharitable system they think themselves sufficiently supported, by the conduct of those females who have, from a state of sobriety, whether real or affected, fallen into known and scandalous deviations; as if, there were in truth no more virtue among the rest, how dextrously soever they may save appearances.

That the sex in general are artful, the men I speak of have been at much pains to propagate; and this opinion has, I know not how, gained ground amongst numbers from whom we might expect more fairness and impartiality. That women of little worth, and low capacity, are often cunning; and that individuals, possessed of better talents, often degrade and pervert them to the concealed pursuit of power, of lucre, or of mischief, we are far from denying. Nor is it to be disguised, that too many women of elegance and sense have submitted to a piece of deceit, on which the very best friends of the sex must ever reflect with grief and amazement; I mean, Sirs, that of vowing at the altar of God unceasing love and honour to men, for whom it is not possible that sense or elegance should entertain either sincere affection or esteem; to men so flagrantly profligate, so palpably insignificant, or so exceedingly disagreeable, that all the world must be convinced such sacrifices of understanding, taste, ingenuity, and the pleasures connected with the heart, could only be made to the demon of co-vetousness, the idol of rank, or the passion for splendor. When they are incited by indigence or the dread of it, in persons especially who were well born and delicately bred, it is a piteous case, and will be considered accordingly at the bar of humanity. The motives, on which so inauspicious a connexion was formed, will be forgiven at that bar to women under those circumstances, who afterwards perform their duty as well as they are able. But what excuse or mitigation shall be found, where there was no actual distress, no painful dependance; where perhaps, on the contrary, there was an easy, or even an affluent fortune? If such legal prostitution is usually productive of lasting remorse and misery, is the result wonderful, or the punishment unjust?

Speaking in general, it appears to me, that if superior artifice implies superior praise, the latter is fairly due to Men. Their plots and stratagems are laid much deeper, and executed with much more boldness, regularity, and vigour; as they commonly turn upon objects of greater consequence, and are often prompted by a keener rancour, or a more ardent impetuosity. To punish neglect, to blast a rival, to take revenge on infidelity in a lover or a husband, has indeed not seldom employed, and with terrible efficacy, the art of a disappointed, jealous, and vindictive woman. But the schemes of those females that are fond of scheming from littleness of soul, or a notion of being wondrous cunning, refer for the most part to—what? Why, truly, to the obtaining of some small pecuniary advantage, or petty ornament, or new piece of dress, or favourite amusement, or additional importance; to lessen the figure, lower the reputation, or obstruct the success, of any particular person or persons of their own sex, whom they behold with an invidious eye, or in fine to impose on the men for their own purposes. But where the men are not very simple, or very fond, or intoxicated by youthful passions, they will commonly without much difficulty see through the cobwebs that are spread to catch them. And as to the other childish tricks daily played by such women, surely a good-natured man will view them with a mixture of mirth, pity, and indifference, rather than with warm indignation.

Mean while, what shall we think of the craft, the duplicity, the falsehood, the treachery, the dark and deep underminings, hourly practised by multitudes of our own sex to gain their ends amongst the other; or to gratify their avarice, ambition, resentment, or envy? Let observation, let history answer the question, by pointing to the numberless train of evils produced by such causes, wherever wealth, luxury, and false refinement, have rendered men artificial.

The worthiest characters in our sex, it may be observed, are marked generally by an openness, and always by a probity, that reflects the greatest credit on their hearts, and, I add, on their understandings also. Yes, my beloved and honoured auditors, after all that a late well-know master, patron, and teacher, of dissimulation has advanced to the contrary, I do not hesitate to pronounce dissimulation, and indeed the whole family of cunning, by whatever name dignified, impotent and miserable apes of manly ability and genuine wisdom. I subjoin, that men of integrity and sentiment display a nobleness, which fails not sooner or later to strike and persuade beyond all the paltry arts in the world; and I call the best and greatest spirits of every age to witness, that such men are placed upon an eminence, from which they may look down, with superlative scorn, on the whole inglorious race of knaves, liars, and dissemblers.

THE country lying round Baffin's Bay, goes by the name of Prince William's land; but we know nothing more of it. To the South of Prince William's land lies New North Wales, which has on its South New Denmark, and on its West another land, but both of them unknown. Several islands lie on the coast of Labrador, without the bay: of these the chief is Newfoundland. The country from Button's-bay Southward and Eastward, as far as Labrador, is called New South Wales. In Hudson's bay are a great many lesser bays, as James's bay, Button's bay, Baffin's bay, Sir Thomas's bay, Roe's bay, Welcome bay, Wager bay, Rankin's Inlet, Hope's bay, Brigg's bay, Cumberland bay, Repulse bay, &c. The chief capes in and about the bay are Cape Charles, on the Strait of Belleisle, Cape Desire, at the entrance of Hudson's Strait, Cape Henry, Cape James, and Cape Worsenham, near the entrance of Hudson's bay, Cape Henrietta Maria, Cape Look Out, and Cape Hope, on the West and South West part of the bay, Cape Dobbs, Cape Comfort, and Cape Assumption, on the north part of the bay. There are innumerable lakes, bogs, and morasses all over those vast tracts lying round the bay, which being covered with ice and snow great part of the year, as well as the mountains, render the air excessive cold, especially when the wind sits North-West. It seems to be as cold in fifty two degrees of North latitude on the Western continent, as it is on the Eastern in sixty two. A great many rivers fall into the bay, particularly on the West and South sides, as Churchill river, Nelson's river, New Severn river, Albany river, and Moose river. Nelson's river is the largest and finest in the bay; Prince Rupert's and Sluda rivers lie on the East side of the bay. There are forts and factories on the mouths of all the rivers, except Prince Rupert's and new Severn river.

The Eastern shores of this country were first discovered by Sebastian Cabot, for Henry VII. king of England, in the year 1498. They were afterwards visited by Davis, and other British mariners. Mr. Hudson made four voyages thither, between the years 1607 and 1611; in the last of which, his men forced him and eight more into a boat, and left them to starve in the bottom of the bay, and they were never heard of more.

Sir Thomas Button pursued the discovery in 1612, and captain James in 1631, in hopes of finding a north west passage to China. Captain Gilham failed to the bottom of the bay in 1667, and at his return his owners procured a patent for planting this country. The first English governor who went thither was Charles Batley, Esq; who built a fort on Rupert river, calling it Charles fort, and soon after settled another factory at Nelson river. In the year 1684, the chief English factory was at Albany river, with a fort erected for its defence. The French invaded our settlements, and took fort Rupert and Albany, in July 1686, though we were then at peace with France; but in king William's war, in 1693, the English recovered their settlements again. During the war in queen Ann's reign, the French reduced all our settlements, except Albany; but were obliged to restore them again at the peace of Utrecht, and the company have remained in possession of them ever since; and now, that we are masters of all Canada, they have nothing to apprehend from that quarter.

To convince our readers of what we advanced before concerning the gains of the company, and their usage of the Indians, we shall here insert the standard or regulation formerly prescribed by them them for their goods bartered on the southern part of the bay. Guns, one with another, ten good skins, that is, winter beaver; twelve skins for the biggest fort, ten for the mean, and eight for the smallest: powder, a beaver for half a pound: shot, a beaver for four pounds: hatchets, a beaver for a great and small one: knives, a beaver for six great ones, or eight jack-knives: beads, a beaver for half a pound: laced coats, six beavers for a good one: plain coats, five beavers for a red one: coats for women laced, two yards, six beavers: coats for women plain, five beavers: tobacco, a beaver for one pound: powder horn, a beaver for a large one and two small ones: kettles, a beaver for every pound: and looking glasses and combs, two beavers.

It is said, that the annual exports, before the late peace, were only about three thousand pounds value, and their half yearly sales about twenty five thousand pounds. They were then supposed to be at the charge of one hundred and twenty servants a year, and about an hundred and twenty men on board the two or three annual ships, which they sent to the bay. Their imports are deers skins, castorin or beaver stone, feathers, whale bone, and blubber; but beaver skin is two thirds of the whole. The beaver skins are worth from three shillings and sixpence to five or six shillings a pound.

Canada.

This country, of which the British arms made an entire conquest in the late war, is bounded on the north by New Britain; on the east by New Scotland, New England, and New York; on the south by the Apalachian and Cherokee mountains, and the Great lakes, and by unknown lands on the west.

The country being extensive, the climate and soil cannot but be very various. All that part now inhabited by the French and English, and which lies mostly along the great river St. Lawrence, is, generally speaking, excessively cold in winter, though hot in summer, as most of those American tracts are that do not lie too far to the northward. The rest of the country as far as it is known, is full of large woods, marshes, lakes, mountains, and rivers, which render it still colder. The lands, however, especially in the interior parts, and about the lakes and rivers, are said to be generally fertile, and capable of producing wheat, barley, rye, with many other sorts of grain, fruits, and vegetables; tobacco, in particular, thrives exceedingly, and is much cultivated. Here are plenty of stags, elks, deers, bears, foxes, martens, wild cats, ferrets, weasels, squirrels of a large size and greyish hue, hares, and rabbits. The southern parts also breed great numbers of wild bulls, deer of a small size, divers sorts of roebucks, goats, wolves, &c. The marshes, lakes, and pools, swarm with otters, beavers or castors, of which the white are highly valued, being scarce, as well as the right black kind. The beaver of Canada is an amphibious quadruped, which could live out of the water, if it had convenient bathing places. They are generally not quite four feet in length. Their colours are different, black, brown, white, yellow, and straw colour; but it is observed, that the lighter their colour, the less quantity of fur they are clothed with, and live in warmer climates. The flesh of the beaver is a most delicious food, when it is parboiled, to take away a disagreeable relish which it has naturally. Besides the fur, the beaver produces the true castoreum, which is contained in bags in the lower part of the belly, different from the testicles: the value of this drug is well known. The furs of the beaver are of two kinds, the dry and the green; the dry fur is the skin before it is applied to any use; the green are the furs that are worn, after being sewed to one another, by the Indians, who besmear them with unctuous substances, which not only render them more pliable, but give the fine down, that is manufactured into hats, that oily quality which renders it proper to be worked up with the dry fur. Both the Dutch and English, since Charlevoix wrote, have found the secret of making excellent cloths, gloves, and stockings, as well as hats, from the beaver fur. The musk rat is a diminutive kind of beaver, which it resembles in every thing but its tail, which is like that of a common European rat, and its testicles afford a very strong musk. The elk is of the size of a horse or mule; its feet and legs resemble those of a stag's, its neck and withers are covered with long hair, and has a head about two feet long. His antlers resemble those of a doe. Many extraordinary medicinal qualities, particularly for curing the falling sickness, are ascribed to the hoof of the left foot of this animal. Its flesh is very agreeable and nourishing, and its colour a mixture of light grey and dark red. They love cold countries; and when the winter affords them no grass, they gnaw the bark bark of trees. There is a carnivorous animal here, called the carcajou, of the feline or cat kind, with a tail so long that Charlevoix says, that he has twisted it several times round his body. Its body is about two feet in length, from the end of the snout to the tail. It is said, that this animal, winding himself about a tree, will dart from thence upon the elk, twist his strong tail round his body, and cut his throat in a moment. The buffaloe of Canada is much larger than that of Europe; but their appearance is much alike. His body is covered with a black wool, which is highly esteemed. The flesh of the female is very good; and the buffaloe hides are as soft and pliable as Chamois leather, but so very strong, that the bucklers which the Indians make use of are hardly penetrable by a musket ball. The Canadian roebuck is a domestic animal, but differs in no other respect from those of Europe. Wolves are scarce in Canada, but they afford the finest furs in all the country; their flesh is white, and good to eat, and they pursue their prey to the tops of the tallest trees.

The black foxes are greatly esteemed, and very scarce; but those of other colours are more common; and some on the upper Mississippi are of a silver colour, and very beautiful. They live upon water fowls, which they decoy within their clutches by a thousand antic tricks, and then spring upon them, and devour them. The Canadian poll cat has a most beautiful white fur, except the tip of his tail, which is as black as jet. When pursued, he lets fly his urine, which, it is said, infects the air for a quarter of a league round; for which reason, he is called by the inhabitants the devil's brat, or the stinkard. Charlevoix says, the common marten's skin is worth a crown, and the brown ones seven shillings. The Canadian wood rat is of a beautiful silver colour, with a bushy tail, and as big again as the European: the female carries under her belly a bag, which she opens and shuts at pleasure; and in that she places her young, when pursued. There are three sorts of squirrels. That called the flying squirrel will leap forty paces and more, from one tree to another. This little animal is easily tamed, and is very lively, except when asleep, which is often the case; and he puts up wherever he can find a place, in one's sleeve, pocket, or muff: he first pitches on his master, whom he will distinguish among twenty persons. The Canadian porcupine is less than a middling dog: when roasted, he eats full as well as a sucking pig. The hares and rabbits differ little from those in Europe, only they turn grey in winter. There are two sorts of bears here; one of a reddish, and the other of a black colour; but the former is the most dangerous. Some of the rivers breed a kind of crocodile, that differs but little from those of the Nile.

The meadow grounds in Canada, which are well watered, yield excellent grass, and breed vast numbers of great and small cattle: and where the arable land is well manured, it produces rich crops. The mountains abound with coal mines, and some, we are told, with silver and other metals; though we have not heard of any great advantage made of them as yet.

The lakes are both large and numerous: the principal are Lake Superior, Michigan, those of the Illinois and Hurons, Lake Erie, Lake Ontario, Frontenac, or Oswego, Lake Champlain, and Timiscaming, besides others of a smaller size. Lake Superior, or the Upper lake, which is situated the farthest north, is reckoned one hundred leagues in length, and about seventy where broadest, and hath several considerable islands in it; the chief of which are, the Royal isle, Pont Chartrain, Maurepas, St. Anne, St. Ignatius, Hoquart, and Minong. A considerable trade is now carried on by barks and canoes through some of these lakes, particularly Ontario, Erie, and Champlain, most of the forts being situated on them.

The whole country abounds with large rivers, which it would be endless to enter into a detail of; the principal are those of St. Lawrence, the Outtauais, St. John's, Seguinay, Despraires, and Trois-Rivieres. You enter the bay of St. Lawrence between cape de Retz, on the island of Newfoundland, and the North cape, on that called the Royal island, or more commonly cape Breton. After doubling cape Rose, or Rosieres, you enter the river, which runs north east and south west. At the mouth of the river the cold is intense, and the sea boisterous. The river itself, at its opening, is about thirty leagues in breadth; and towards the south lie the bay and point of Gaspey. Below this bay is a steep rock, which has obtained the name of the Bored island, from an aperture in its middle, through which a sloop may pass with her sails up. At a league's distance from the Bored island lies the island Bonaventure; and at a league distance from that the island Miscon, which has has an excellent harbour, and is eight leagues in circumference. A spring of fresh water spouts up to a considerable height in the offing, not far from this island.

The next object that presents itself in the river St. Lawrence is the island Anticosti; and the current setting strongly in upon it, renders the navigation here extremely dangerous, in case of a calm, especially as the island is lined with breakers. This island is narrow, but lies in the middle of the river, and extends about forty leagues, from north east to south west. The French have represented it as absolutely good for nothing; its coasts, however, are well stored with fish. After passing this island, the navigation becomes more tolerable; but still great precaution must be used. The mounts Notre Dame and Lewis lie on the larboard side: near the latter are some French plantations. The next point is Trinity point, which must be avoided with great care. A little higher are the Paps of Montani, so called from the appearance of the mountain, situated about two leagues from the shore. The land in the neighbourhood is said to be not only unprofitable, but frightful; being covered with rocks, sands, and impenetrable thickets: it contains, however, plenty of game. On the other side the river, and advancing two leagues into its bed, lies the shoal of Manicouagu, which is the most dangerous in this river: it is named from a river that falls from the mountains of Labrador, and otherwise called the river of St. Barnabas, and the Black river. From this to Green island the navigation is slow and uncertain, and the shores uncomfortable and uninhabited. Somewhat higher lies the river Saguenay, which carries ships twenty five leagues above its mouth, where is an excellent harbour, called Tadoussac; in sailing from which, great care must be taken to avoid the Red island, which is a dangerous rock of that colour, whose surface is equal to the water, and often proves fatal to shipping. About fifteen leagues distance, that is, midway between Quebec and Tadoussac, lies the isle of Coudres, where the passage of the river is dangerous, without a fair wind; in particular, there is a whirlpool, that must carefully be guarded against. Next appears the bay of St. Paul, where the plantations on the north shore begin: they consist of valuable woods of pine-trees, among which are red pines, which are esteemed very beautiful; here likewise is a fine lead mine. About six leagues above this is a very high promontory, which terminates a chain of mountains that reach above four hundred leagues to the westward, and is called cape Torment: round the anchoring place, here lie a number of islands, among which is that of Orleans, which forms a most beautiful prospect. It is about fourteen leagues in circumference, and populous, as producing excellent wheat, and fine fruits. It forms two channels, of which the south is the most navigable: here the water becomes drinkable; for it is brackish at cape Torment, though it is an hundred and ten leagues from the sea. The higher up the river, the flux of the tide diminishes, and the reflux increases, and twenty leagues above Quebec the tide is not perceptible; but indeed the tides in this river, as well as the currents vary greatly, according to the seasons, and the positions of the lands. It is very large and deep, and contains several islands, all the way from Quebec to Lake Ontario, whence it issues.

Of the Mississippi we shall give some account, when we come to Louisiana, to which it more properly belongs, and of which the greater part is now included in the province of West Florida.

English Theatre.

Drury-Lane.

ON Thursday evening the 1st instant, a new comic opera, called The Blackamoor Washed White, written by the reverend Mr. Bate, was performed at this theatre, the plot and dramatical personæ of which follow:

Frederic,	Mr. Vernon.
Sir Oliver Oddfish,	Mr. Parsons.
Grenvile,	Mr. Davies.
Robert,	Mr. Burton.
Ferry,	Mr. King.
Julia,	Mrs. Siddons.
Lady Oddfish,	Mrs. Wroughten.
Dame Dowset,	Mrs. Bradshaw.

Sir Oliver Oddfish has a daughter named Julia, who loves and is beloved by Frederic. The old knight, suspicious in a high degree of the lover, and his determined enemy, contrives by every means in his power to exclude him from his castle, which is moated in; and in a fit of causeless jealousy against his wife, as well as resentment against Julia, he discharges all his servants, and writes to his friend Mr. Grenvile to provide him with Negro servants.—Grenvile communicates the letter to Frederic, and advises him to personate a black servant, and he will recommend him to Sir Oliver. This is done, and Frederic obtaining admission to the family, casually finds a lute, on which he plays, and sings a song expressive of his love, when his mistress enters, and knows him not in the disguise; but a repetition of the song assuring her of his voice, a mutual understanding takes place. Jerry is the confidant of Sir Oliver; but being intrusted by Julia, enters into her plot. Lady Oddfish is a singular character—quite the modern fine lady—while her husband appears as old and as formal as the castle in which he dwells. Frederic being stationed in the family (unknown as he is to Sir Oliver) Jerry persuades the old knight that there is no preventing the youth's addresses to the daughter, for he [Jerry] knows he is in the neighbourhood, having frequently seen his friend Grenville lately on the knight's estate. Lady Oddfish enters, and talks in a strain that maddens the old knight (who enters behind) with jealousy, and he vows to drown himself. In the next scene, he and Jerry confer on this drowning scheme, which he prudently changes to the resolution of casting his hat and wig only into the moat, and Jerry is to report him drowned to lady Oddfish.—She enters, and the manner in which she receives the account of his death is highly diverting; but he then appears, and after the first view she treats him with ridicule. Jerry now advises Sir Oliver, as the only method to reconcile all differences, to send for Frederic, and give him Julia's hand. To this he agrees—calls Amoroso (Frederic's assumed name as a negro) sends him for pen and ink, makes him stoop, and writes a note to Frederic on his own back, which he receives with a joy Sir Oliver cannot account for.

In the next scene the knight tells Julia, what he has done to oblige her: She thanks him, but has altered her mind, and fixed her affections on the black. The father is inexpressibly astonished; but the several parties entering, Frederic discovers himself, an éclaircissement ensues, and the piece ends in the marriage of Frederic and Julia.

Great opposition was made to this piece on the first evening of its performance; but the author's friends mustered so effectually, and used the argumentum ad hominem so powerfully, that they beat down all opposition, and even carried it triumphantly through a second and third representation. On the fourth night, however, the public did themselves justice, when the piece received its final sentence of condemnation. The opposition began in the last act of the play; which was exceedingly interrupted. The overture was allowed to be performed, but not heard; and the players several times came upon the stage and began, but were as often obliged to retire. Mr. Garrick at length appeared. He told the audience, that the most critical situation of a theatrical manager, was that of being divided between the general inclination and the property of an author, that the will of the audience must be his will; and that he was ready to obey it as soon as he could by any means gather what it was. He observed, that his theatrical life would now be very short; and added, with great pleasantry, that he could wish to die in peace. He seemed to be going on, but the burst of noise obliged him to retire. Mr. King afterwards came on, and desired to be heard from the author, who, he said, begged to withdraw the piece. Mr. King came on a second time, and read a paper from Mr. Bate to the same purpose. But the pros and cons continued to distress the manager, and obstructed every effort to restore peace. A little before eleven o'clock the curtain fell, and soon after Mr. Garrick again appeared. He now assured the audience, that the author had actually taken away his farce from the prompter, and had consequently put it out of his power to perform it any more. He seemed to intimate a wish that they would now rest satisfied; but added, that if it was their pleasure to stay till five or six in the morning, he was ready to wait to attend to their commands; this was received with universal applause. Mr. Garrick retired, and the audience immediately dispersed.

The fable of this piece was meagre and uninteresting, the plot badly managed, and the dialogue not only barren of wit, but coarse to an extreme. The thought of introducing Frederick into Sir Oliver's family as a Black, was a good one, and promised many humorous situations; we do not recollect that any followed it. The story of the Cherry tree was absurd and puerile; the scene between Sir Oliver and his lady ridiculous; and both the sudden change in Sir Oliver's mind, and his sending for the very man to marry his daughter whom he inveterately hated, highly improbable. Upon the whole, although some of the songs were tolerably worded, the music of several very pleasing, the performers in general ardent in supporting their characters, racters, and the scenery beautifully picturesque; we do not think The Blackamoor Wash'd White did any credit to its author, or that the managers shewed their judgment in so expensively decorating what at best was but a theatrical trifle.

THE Runaway, a new comedy, written by Mrs. Cowley, was performed at this theatre on the 15th instant. The principal characters follow:

Mr. Hardgrave,	Mr. Yates,
George (his Son),	Mr. Smith,
Sir Charles Seymour,	Mr. Brereton,
Mr. Drummond,	Mr. Bensley,
Justice,	Mr. Parsons,
Mr. Morley,	Mr. Aickin,
Jarvis,	Mr. Palmer,

Lady Dinah,	Mrs. Hopkins,
Miss Sidney,	Miss Younge,
Miss Morley,	Mrs. Siddons,
Miss Hardgrave,	Miss Hopkins,
Susan.	Mrs. Wrihtien.

As we have been lately much afflicted with the melancholy fate of theatrical authors, we have a pleasure more than common in the great success of this piece. Indeed its merit is considerable, and its blemishes are of such a kind, as will generally be excused by an audience. Love is the passion that occasions the play. A young lady (Miss Morley) runs away from her uncle, to avoid a disagreeable marriage, and takes refuge in the neighbourhood of Mr. Drummond, who is a mighty good sort of a man, always plugging himself about other people's affairs; as he was a widower, he would not take the Runaway into his house; he therefore applies to Mr. Hardgrave, whose house was full of love affairs, by means of Lady Dinah, Miss Hardgrave, Miss Sidney, and Mr. George (just come from college.) Lady Dinah, a woman of fifty, had cast a wishful eye on George. Mr. Hardgrave was bent on the match, for the sake of her connections and fortune; but his great attention to her is supposed to be on his own account. This produces some pleasant mistakes. When the beautiful Runaway is introduced, she proves to be the very girl that George had fallen desperately in love with at a masquerade, and who had conceived a passion for him equally ardent.

Here the author is run away with herself. Such a passion as that of George and Miss Morley is not English. She could only have read it in romance; and she here offends in what the painters call Costume. George's exclamation at seeing her, is not natural; it is florid, long, and unbroken; and it would have been condemned, if the taste of the audience had not been formed more by reading novels than observing nature.

The difficulties and perplexities of the piece now begin to take place. Lady Dinah is the evil spirit which haunts George in his love. He, however, finds time to be playful in the affair of his sister and Sir Charles Seymour, who are lovers of a distant sentimental kind. When lady Dinah had employed her servants to bring false evidence against Miss Morley as a strolling player, her uncle arrives in pursuit of her; carries her off. George pursues, rescues his damsel; is supported by the good Mr. Drummond, who brings all matters to an explanation, and reconciles the old people to a marriage. Sir Charles Seymour takes advantage of the occasion, and obtains consent to marry Miss Hardgrave.

Our readers will see that there are some obvious objections to the conduct of this play; but the author makes up for any little error here, by the justness of her sentiments, and the sprightliness of her dialogue. Her characters, too, are in general well drawn. Lady Dinah is rather in caricature. George and Miss Morley are in the stile of romance; but they have merit, on the whole. Sir Charles and Miss Hardgrave are sincere lovers, but in a different stile. Miss Sidney, that the piece may have love enough, has her lover abroad, and she thinks it necessary to apprise the audience of it in the play and in the epilogue. Even Susan and Jarvis are in love; at least they propose to join the fruits of their villainous industry by a marriage. If an author were to be judged of by her writings, we should imagine this fair lady's mind to be wholly occupied by love. We do not mention this in her dispraise. Our late female writers have affected to shun those subjects which are peculiarly female, and have written about heroism and criticism, and any thing but the very subjects on which they might throw some light. There are many situations of the female mind which have not yet been described, and they never can be, till the ladies themselves write honestly about Love. The muse of this fair poetess seems to be headstrong, and we hope will often run away with her into some of those situations.

The parts were in general well cast and performed.

The scenes and decorations were some pretty, some exceptionable.

The play was received on the whole with great and deserved applause.

Covent Garden.

The Man of Reason, a new comedy, said to be written by the author of False Delicacy, made its first and last appearance at this Theatre on Friday evening the 9th of this month. The Dramatis Personæ follows:

Sir James Clifford (the Man of Reason, in love with Miss Freemore) Mr. Woodward.

Mr. Freemore, Mr. Clarke.

Mr. Lestock (nephew of Sir James, in love with Miss Wilmington) Mr. Lee Lewis.

Dr. Wilmington (a cunning, knavish proctor) Mr. Aickin.

Mr. Wilmington (his son, disguised as captain Cleveland) Mr. Wroughton.

Mr. Wyndham (disguised as William a footman) Mr. Lewis.

Flavella (daughter to Mr. Freemore, a man in embarrassed circumstances) Mrs. Bulkley, engaged from affection to the pretended captain Cleveland, but resolved to marry the Man of Reason, Sir James Clifford, in order to retrieve her father's affairs.

Miss Wilmington (in love with the pretended footman, who is disguised on account of an affair of honour) Mrs. Mattocks. She is embarrassed by the artifices of Lestock, who is countenanced by her father, on account of his expectation from Sir James.

Lady Winterley (Aunt to Miss Wilmington, to whom Mr. Wyndham was footman, and her housekeeper, Mrs. Glowworm, throw some embarrassment in Miss Wilmington's way, by falling in love, both of them, with the pretty footman.) These parts were performed by Mrs. Hunter, and Mrs. Green.

Mrs. Freemore (a termagant, avaricious, unfeeling wife) Mrs. Pitt.

Physicians, Servants, &c.

Our readers, by this kind of Dramatis Personæ, will see as much as it was possible to see of the fable of this play, if it really can be said to have one. There were two intrigues or plots, equally important and interesting, in which the two disguised lovers bore the principal parts. They ran through the whole of the play, and instead of furnishing business, which was probably the author's intention, created confusion, and distracted the attention of the audience. We are persuaded he failed of success greatly by this circumstance. The two plots might have been divided into a sentimental dialogue, and a farce, and they seemed like the production of different men. As we always wish success to an author, we rejoiced at the introduction of love matters from the kitchen, and hoped the farce would make the sentiments go off. But the author's want of art in the exordium or first act, and bringing so much business before his audience, without giving them any interest, or making them acquainted with his motives, was the great means of his condemnation. The general complaint about us was, "We know not what they are about."

The sentiments were in general decent; some of them forced and affected.

The language was not always proper. There were some phrases which we should think a reproach to the managers, if they had any great pretensions to learning or taste. Mr. Garrick or Mr. Colman would have glowed with blushes, if their theatres had been disgraced by such phrases as,

"A cabbage leaf over a spruce clergyman's face, to make him look like a walking Cauliflower."—"With a brogue as broad as broad St. Giles's."—"Damn his happiness" (from a father to his son)—"Come, you shall have another buff" (from a woman to a man, and the woman not even amorous.)

These and other phrases are not only low, in point of language, but they murder metaphors in such a manner as would shock a school-boy.

The parts were not properly cast: We were sorry to see our old friend Woodward in a character, which, if it had not been ill-drawn by the poet, would not have suited him. Woodward cannot keep his hands and feet quiet enough for any thing like a Man of Reason.

Mrs. Bulkley's character was unnatural—upon the stilts of virtue; and she did not make the most of it. Mrs. Hunter played her part ill: so did Mr. Lee Lewis. But the other performers, particularly Mr. Lewis, Mrs. Green, and Mrs. Mattocks, did every thing that could well have been done to save the play.

The prologue and epilogue had some humour, though hardly a new thought, and were well spoken by Mr. Lewis, and Mrs. Bulkley.

Opera House.

ON Tuesday evening the 16th instant, a new serious Opera, called La Vestale, written by Mr. Badini, and set to music by by Signor Vento, was performed at this theatre.

The author of this entertainment has been as happy in the choice of a pathetic circumstance on which to ground this opera, as he was in the truly comic one of his late piece, called Il Bacio. There are not many possible situations in human life, so tenderly affecting as that of the Hero and Heroine of this Opera. Domitian, the father, had dedicated his daughter Emilia to Vesta, who was in love with Celer, a Roman knight. Celer persuades Emilia to run away with him. In her absence the sacred fire goes out. Rome is alarmed for the fatal event; Emilia and Celer are found, brought before the Emperor and Senate, and sentenced to death. The Oracle, however, is consulted, and Emilia only is to be buried alive. Before she enters the horrid cell, she prays the Gods to favour her with some prodigy, and Venus and Cupid descend from Heaven, explain the Oracle favourably, and deliver both lovers. Critics used to consider the drama as an imitation of nature, will have some objections to this Opera, and particularly to its denouement, which is extremely violent and improbable. The author pleads in his excuse an historical authority in the case of Claudia, who being condemned to death, escaped it by a miracle. We apprehend, however, that this will not be admitted; as the authority itself is not one of those classical falsehoods, which for their beauty or extravagance, or some other circumstance, we have all agreed to make use of as truths. Mr. Badini, however, makes ample amends for this fault in the sentiments and language of the Opera. The circumstances of Emilia and Celer are exquisitely distressing; and it is but justice to Mr. Badini to say, that by the assistance of Gabrielli and Rauzzini, he makes the spectator feel for them in the highest degree. In the seventh scene, where Emilia says, "O fly me, fly me! those lovely graces, those ambrosial kisses, which did so oft imparateise my soul;" we were affected beyond description. The character of Emilia and Celer are finely kept throughout in the foreground of the piece, and so performed by Gabrielli and Rauzzini, as we have never seen any thing performed before in the Hay-Market.

Our limits will not allow us to specify the parts of the recitative and songs, in which they display the greatest powers of acting and singing we have ever known united. We cannot, however, help observing some singular circumstances in the case of Signora Gabrielli. Most of our great performers have had the interest and artifice to set themselves off in their favourite characters by foils. Signora Gabrielli is obliged to maintain her superiority, while she is ever accompanied by a young man who emulates her excellencies with unremitting ardor, and who climbs the hill of Fame after her with prodigious strides. Another circumstance which is very striking about Gabrielli, is, that though an Italian, her manner and action are such as would be used by an Englishwoman of equal genius, taste and sensibility. This proves what we have always imagined, that the expressions of the passions, when made with judgment, are the same all over the world. The grimaces and extravagancies which we have been used to suppose the effects of some strange sensibility in an Italian heart, are nothing more than the artifices of ordinary impostors.

The Piece on the whole was well performed, and very justly applauded.

Comic Mirror.

THE representation of a Rehearsal, which has been so frequently announced to the public, was performed on the 25th of last month at Exeter 'Change. This piece, like many others represented there, is a merry sketch, calculated to introduce certain characters: The Catch Club has its Doctor Sharp Chin; the Auction Room, Mr. Simper; the Opera-House Scene, the King of Quavers; and the Rehearsal, King David; whose features and figure are better hit off in his wooden representation, than any of the above in theirs. He is introduced pretending to laugh at the critique on the Jubilee, which he is informed has been printed in the papers, where his darling passion, a thirst for fame as a poet, is frequently ridiculed: his avarice is next attacked, and humorously enough: he is made to give the Painter a severe lecture for wasting two pennyworth of Dutch metal, which, after all, the Painter paid for out of his own pocket. The next touch is at his false consequence, in a conversation which he holds with an illiterate Country Footman, who comes for a place in the boxes: after which ensues a smart bout at altercation between him and the Priestess of the Comic Muse, whose opinion of her own consequence makes her give herself a great quantity of unnecessary airs, which he retorts with accusations of ingratitude; upon which she he refuses a part which he has written for her in a new piece, and bounces off the stage; declaring that there is an indelicate line in it, and that to gain his whole fortune she would not fully her reputation by appearing in it. At this instant comes on O'Flaherty, who gives a very laughable picture of her former low life. This so tickles the little gentleman, that his spirits begin to recover their former harmony, and he orders the performers to begin their rehearsal. Here several strokes at his former pieces are introduced; some parodies on the songs in the Christmas Tale; and the whole concludes with a kind of chorus, (which he says is in his very best style) composed of a jumble from the Jubilee, Cynnon, Little Gipsley, &c &c. The figure of King David is the only excellent one in the whole group. Mrs. A——'s cloak and petticoat bear a better resemblance to her than any thing else; but the imitation of her voice from behind the scenes any body might have mistaken for the Lady herself. So much cannot be said of King David, whose admirable mode of speaking is not perhaps so easily attained; his imitator, when he had occasion to speak seriously, lost him entirely; but in his affected hesitation and hysseric laugh he made ample amends. The figure intended for Mr. M—— has not the least resemblance of him. In short, it looks as if the author thought, could he give a striking picture of the person and manners of the Hero and Heroine of the Piece, the audience would excuse the rest.

Masquerade Intelligence.

Fiera in Mascherata, at the King's Theatre in the Hay-market.

IN the last reign, the Prince upon the throne not only did not discourage Masquerades, but honoured them frequently with his presence, and yet it was with great difficulty companies could be collected to support three in a winter. Our present most gracious Sovereign is well known to disapprove an entertainment contrived principally, if not solely for the purpose of intrigue; and during the present reign there have been a greater number of Masquerades, and those encouraged by the nobility, and principally the fair sex, than in the long reign of George the Second. And as a proof that nothing but the spirit of intrigue supports that amusement, the accounts in the public prints, as well as of those who report their opinions in private companies, pronounce those midnight revels to be scenes of dulness and confusion. Nothing could be more so than the Fiera in Mascherata on the 8th inst. in the Hay-Market; the company seemed dissatisfied with their accommodation at supper, and as much so with each other.

The principal, and we might almost say, the only characters were—a Carrotty Clown—a Bruising Billingsgate Bunter—a Female Seller of Matches, whose garments and hat were so really ragged and characteristic, that we dreaded her near approach, for fear of her transplanting to our vestments a colony of unwelcome residents—a Connaught Man, admirably dressed, but the worst brogue-master we ever heard—a native of New Zealand—the Wife of a Marchand de Draps, habillee a-la-mode de Paris—an excellent Cordelier—a decrepit old Man, and his over-grown, hanging-sleeve-coated Daughter—a Conjuror—a Military Sailor—an Officer covered with the ragged lining of his night-gown—a Cyrus—a Waggoner—a Puritanical Lady begging for a genteel family in distress—and a City Alderman, who in the early part of the evening appeared to be an arrant counterfeit; but when he sat down to supper, he convinced the company that his habit for gormandizing was too natural not to be acquired Eastward Hoe! and that he was at least in that respect perfectly characteristic.

The rooms were not clear till eight in the morning—although every Mask, in going away, expressed a perfect detestation of the dulness and insipidity which had reigned during the night.

Il Festino.

ABOUT three hundred Masks assembled at the Festino Rooms in Hanoversquare, on Monday evening the 12th instant; among them were several characters; but, as usual, few that were good. The principal who merited notice, were a Watchman with his lantern, a Gardener, a Pilgrim, a Chimney-sweeper with a Mock Doctor's wig, a Saxon Chasseur, a Masculine Bunter, a broken-backed Squire Groom, a long-nosed Witch, a Harlequin, a Postilion, a Spaniard, two Waggoners, a Country Toy-seller, and a Jew Pedlar, with the customary number of Fruit-Girls, Hay-makers, and Ladies in Fancy Dresses; what was rather extraordinary, there was not one Friar. The very circumstance that seemed likely to prevent the effusion of mirth, contributed chiefly to the evening's merriment. As there was but one large room, the company were were necessarily combined; and as an excellent band of music was placed in the orchestra, the feet of all present moved involuntarily, and it was one general dance for the best part of the evening. Before the supper-room was opened, a few minuets were admirably well moved by Masks who were the scholars of Mr. Gallini. At one the doors of the lower apartment were opened, and displayed a large, lofty room, set round with side-boards bearing a very plentiful collation. The wines were Burgundy, Claret, Old Hock, Madeira, and Port. Of each kind there was an astonishing plenty; and what is still more astonishing, they were in general exceedingly good. After supper, the company exhibited the most perfect harmony. We have already mentioned the characteristic Masks, it may therefore appear superfluous to repeat our notice of any; but we cannot help observing, that the Jew Pedlar was a mere Duke's place Israelite; he neither understood Hebrew, Portuguese nor German. The Squire Groom crept about the room like a losing jockey; and the Watchman, at four o'clock in the morning, roared out, "Past twelve o'clock."

Mrs. Cornelys's Masquerade.

ONE usual objection to masquerading in this country is a native want of vivacity to support mimic characters with judgment and pleasantry; a circumstance which seems, indeed, to be the life and soul of this lively species of entertainment. And it will be allowed, that Masquerades are not likely to get much strength by the frequent repetition which at present so much prevails. He that has humour (and, as Lady G. lately expressed it, courage) to sustain a character now and then, may find himself much too indolent to repeat public exhibitions often: and thus the frisky Masquerade becomes degenerated, among the English, into what we now more properly denominate a Masqued Ball.—Mrs. Cornelys, however, had the good fortune to draw together, on Monday night, the 19th instant, not less than fifteen hundred Masks; among whom were numbers of the nobility and people of the first fashion.

There were Flower-girls, Orange-women, Milliners, Shepherdesses, Hay-makers, Nuns, Quakers, Harlequins, and other theatrical characters in great abundance. Among the more observable masks, were a May-day Chimney-sweeper; a spruce Hair dresser; and a March, 1776.

pretty Oyfter-wench, who with decent humour, and unremitted industry, both announced and recommended her fine wanfleets the whole night. A filthy Barber, loaded with greasy wig-boxes, offered his service to L——d L——p; but being told that his L—— p wore his hair, Tonfor replied, "Let methen shave you, your L—— p certainly wants trimming." A country Farmer; an overgrown hackney coachman; a debilitated old man bent double with age, were well represented. Two ragged masculine old females, who sold matches, seemed very thankful for their supper, which was handed to them in a corner of the room. A Knave of Clubs vociferated poetry till he could not speak: and a solemn lady, clad in the deepest weeds, displayed a label on her arm Pantheon Night: alluding, it was presumed, to the proprietors of that edifice being under the afflicting stroke of having a very thin assembly, together with the additional mortification of filling, at the same time, Carlisle house, by the means of an unlucky opposition. The gentlemen in female attire, from the jemmy riding habit down to the vulgarity of a drunken termagant, were uncommonly numerous: and the fun of the place arose chiefly from the low characters; in which these male gentlewomen had great merit. They quarrelled, scolded, wept, fought, rioted, and in short went through the whole series of blackguardism in the true spirit of Billingsgate. A Negroe livery servant and his fond wife in the character of a strapping Cook wench, afforded much diversion: they exhibited a mock minuet, which really did honour to their dancing.

It would be unjust to give this sketch, without acknowledging the merit of the conductor, in respect of the brilliancy of the house, the plenty of provisions, and the goodness of the wines. The supper rooms opened soon after one o'clock; when the crouds were obliged to fall back, and give way to Mr. Bayes's new raised regiment, who came prancing and galloping through the passages. Claret, Burgundy and Champaign flowed in great abundance till six in the morning, which hour closes the present account of Mrs. Cornelys's masquerade.

Pantheon Masquerade.

THOUGH in point of numbers Mrs. Cornelys had far the advantage, the proprietors of the Pantheon were more fortunate in a variety of characters. The dominos were comparatively fewer than usual; and when the price and mode of admission admission are attended to, the public will easily account for the numerous appearance at Carlisle house on the same evening.

Among the characters the following were the best supported ; a country servant, who before supper maintained the simplicity of her character, and afterwards degenerated into a common notorious blab. We cannot avoid remarking upon the judicious variation of this mask, by much the most remarkable present, both for appearance and wit. Her first station was adapted to the feelings of what modest women might be present ; but as after a certain hour it was necessary to be presumed they would retire, she humorously displayed the effect the dissipation of this town had upon her morals, and became a noted Moll. We cannot say so much of the Jack Tar with whom she entered : he was stupid beyond patience, and did not betray even the common knowledge of a landsmen, much less did he attend to the spirit of his disguise. The next time this gentleman goes to a masquerade, we would advise him to figure as a maypole : from his size he may support it admirably, and from his humour he appears fit for nothing else.—A timid Indian favoured us with the warwhoop. He was in company with Mr. J——, said to have retaken Sir John's, and completely drest after the fashion of his country.—The two watchmen were excellent, and with Moll, (whom for her riotous behaviour they took into custody) were pleasantly severe upon the new made justice of Chancery Lane; who, after having been ingeniously consulted by the female upon the distinctions of general and conditional tail, upon some smart observations began to lose his temper.—A Highlander was characteristic; Flora was beautiful : it cannot be said that Diana was the chastest ever seen.—Mother Cole was passable—the tallest Harlequin assez bien, and the Musti well dressed.—We have not room to remark upon the other masks ; suffice it to say, upon the whole they were tolerable.

The supper, (a few articles excepted) gave general satisfaction ; the wines were good, and about seven in the morning the company had departed, well pleased.

Anecdotes of the Earl of M——, the Dupe and Victim of Female Coquetry and Avarice ; who was lately transferred, under a strong Escort of the French Guards, from the Prison of the Concier-gerie to Fort Levesque, on Account of the dreadful Fire at the Palais, in Paris.

THIS ill-fated nobleman is descended from an antient and respectable family of the province of Ulster, in Ireland ; his paternal estate lies in the county of Antrim, which reckons amongst its representatives his brother and both his uncles. His father was raised in 1756 from the dignity of a baronet to the peerage of Ireland, by the stile and title of Earl of M——, in that kingdom. Whether these additional honours suggested to him the desire to outvie the Irish nobility in splendor and hospitable profusion, or that his estate was impaired before, we cannot pretend to determine ; but he left it much incumbered to his son, who was a minor, when it devolved to him by right of inheritance. He was no sooner come of age, than some of his friends, who had lived in France, and were partial to the people and the country, persuaded him to spend a few years in some of the provinces bordering on the Loire, where he would enjoy all the pleasures of society, according to his rank, at a small expence, and in the mean time clear his estate without lessening his dignity. He had then peu d'usage du monde, having been unconvertant with the circumventing arts of the despicable part of womankind.

Lord M—— went over to England in his way to France, and spent his time chiefly in London with some of his fellow collegians of the university of Dublin, who were then students in the Temple. Being of an easy condescending disposition, and master of his conduct, with a strong inclination to gallantry, at that age when the passions are in the greatest ferment, he was soon initiated by these young votaries of pleasure in their orgies, and the lascivious rites of the Cyprian goddess, in houses resorted to by fashionable debauchees. He diversified his amusements with them at the theatres ; and, after he was cloyed with the stale embraces of rapacious courtizans, he embarked for France early in the spring of 1767, attended by a valet, who abused the confidence of his master, and never gave any account of his stewardship.

Lord M—— made an eclat on his arrival at Calais ; he saw with rapture a figurente upon the stage, and resolved to have her coute qui coute. Her name was Dufour, she had a pretty face and a wanton look, with the insinuating pertness of a demi-rep. She granted favours to an officer of the Queen's regiment, and admitted mitted him to some share of the contributions she raised upon opulent passengers. The enamoured lord, who spoke French fluently, went, after the play, behind the scenes, and made a tender to the daughter of Terpsichore of his person and his purse. As she could have no objection to his figure, she accepted both offers, and my lord accompanied her to her apartment; whilst they were at supper her military gallant entered the room without a previous notice. Lord M—— was a little disconcerted at first, but the lady having presented him with great composure her cousin, who behaved with the greatest politeness, and begged pardon for his intrusion, the greatest harmony subsisted afterwards amongst the three lovers; and when the captain took his leave, he begged the favour to wait upon my lord the next morning, to shew him the curiosities of the place. The officer, who boarded at the Lyon'd Argent, where our hero lodged, begged the host would give no hints to his noble guest of his intimacy with Mademoiselle Dufour; and as he was greatly in debt to him, desired him to send his bill in the first time he should be in a private room at his house, with lord M——; which request was complied with. My lord was so pleased with his bonne fortune, that he made his dulcinea a compliment of twenty guineas, which greatly exceeded her expectations. The next day Mad. Dufour's pretended cousin walked with my lord all over the town; his lordship desired his conductor to dine with him, and immediately after dinner Mons. Duflain brought in the captain's bill, which amounted to eighty livres. Having loudly complained of this impertinent and unseasonable application, my lord begged to know what was the matter, which the captain having imparted to him, with seeming reluctance, and concluded by telling him he was sorry he could not pay the scoundrel, my lord pressed him to accept five guineas, to be rid of this troublesome fellow; and the officer, confus des ses bontes, put, after very little ceremony, the money into his own pocket. They went together to the play, and from thence to Mademoiselle Dufour's lodgings, who was charmée des politesses de my lord, who having spent a considerable sum on this dancing girl, continued his journey to Paris. The officer's contrivance having transpired, he was dismissed from the regiment, to wipe out the aspersions of these disgraceful practices in their corps. At Amiens my lord was introduced by his intelligent valet to a fair and disconsolate Irish lady, who had eloped from a suspicious husband. She rewarded the honest and compassionate agent for his zeal, as Mad. Dufour had done for his silence. This adventure cost my lord but a few guineas, with the secret pleasure of relieving his country woman in distress. When he came to Senlis, he took a fancy to his landlady, who was a fresh coloured sprightly woman. Having taken the opportunity of her husband's absence, he said to her, "I wish I could get here such a pretty bedfellow as you, I should not grudge five guineas." "Mons. Badine, replied she, it is enough to tempt a modest woman." He made some other flattering speeches upon her beauty, to which she seemed to listen with pleasure; and when he came too warm she begged some time to consider. The woman who deliberates is lost. When she returned to the kitchen, she said to his servant, "Your master seems to be a merry gentleman." "Ay, answered he, his soul is as noble as his origin; he has only one foible, when he meets with a pretty woman who obliges him, he thinks he never pays enough for her kindness." "He is rich, I suppose," replied she. "Yes, said he, but his fortune is not large enough for his spirit." "That's a good gentleman, added she, I wish we had many more of that disposition." After this discourse she went up stairs, and John informed his master of the hostess's inquiries and his answers. "She is as pretty neat a body, continued he, as any I have seen yet in France, and I dare say you may get her easy enough." "How, said he, John, she has got a husband!" "No matter for that, answered he, act your part, and I shall take proper care of him." The landlady, who had put on a dress cap and a gauze handkerchief, through which were perceived two snowy heaving orbs, went to my lord, under pretence of asking him if he wanted any thing. "Nothing but you, charming creature," replied he, kissing her with transport. "Hush, hush! said she, the maid is coming to call me: if I can depend upon your honour, we may"—— "What sort of a man is your husband, said my lord?" "A mere drone, answered she, who gets drunk whenever the occasion offers." "So much the better, said my lord, my man will be an over match for him at the bottle." John took care of the husband; while the landlady supped tete-a-tete with her noble paramour, and having ordered her ser-wants to go to bed, enjoyed, in his lordship's stolen embraces, the pleasures of dear variety, and the satisfaction of not having lost by her squeamishness, so good a customer. She was not ungrateful to John, for the good offices he had done to her; and she seemed so affected at my lord's departure, that he promised to come and spend part of the summer in her neighbourhood.

These intrigues had so reduced my lord's finances, who was not very regular in his accounts, that he had not above two guineas when he arrived at Paris. He had a letter of credit for three hundred louis d'ors upon a banker of that capital, who invited him to spend some days at his country-house near Poissy. A lady married to an old farmer-general, who was there upon a visit, fixed upon my lord as a substitute to her husband; but his lordship, who had a mauvaise honte with the women sur le bon ton, did not seem equally smitten with the red and white, with which she daubed her face and bosom. However, she played at last her artificial charms successfully; and she had with him an affaire arrangee. She certainly was the least desirable object he had been in possession of since he had set his foot in France; but as she lived in luxurious affluence, this easy conquest cost his lordship nothing but close attendance; he was, however, soon disgusted, and left her confused and distracted at his ingratitude and his levity. Having no expectation of remittances for a long while, he took, for once, the prudent resolution of living for some time in a place less expensive than Paris. In his way to Angiers, the city he had fixed upon for his residence, my lord, who is not an observer of buildings and antiquities, had only a transient view of the royal palace and forest of Fontainebleau. Lord M—— spent a few days at Orleans, and as he sauntered about this large city and the suburbs, he took notice of a tall handsome woman dressed in humble stuff, but remarkably neat, in close conversation with a Capuchin friar, in an avenue of trees leading to their convent. As she looked like a gentlewoman, notwithstanding her humble apparel, he did not know what to think of this private conference, and walked at a distance from them, revolving in his mind how to supplant the red-bearded mendicant, in the fair devotee's confidence and intimacy. He was that day elegantly dressed, and had the appearance of a man of distinction. His lordship knew that these friars are not allowed, by the statutes of their order, to take money, some lady of trust and fortune, who commonly resides near their convent, being appointed to receive the donations of the faithful. He surmised that the person he ogled was the pretty agent of these good fathers; and on this conjecture, when grown impatient of their long colloquy, my lord, making a genteel apology for interrupting them, said to the friar, that an Irish catholic gentleman, a friend of his, had desired him to pay twelve livres to the Capuchins of Orleans, for the good of his mother's soul, lately deceased. The good father, who proved to be the superior of the convent, giving the noble stranger his most humble thanks in the name of the whole fraternity, answered, the lady present was constituted to receive for them all benefactions in money. My lord replied, he would make some addition to this small legacy, though he was a Protestant, begging the lady would be so kind as to give him a receipt for his friend's satisfaction. She said, she was going home, and as she supposed the gentleman was returning to the city, it was in his way; and if he would take the trouble to accompany her, she would sign her name to the quittance he desired. They both took leave of the father guardian, and on their way to the lady's house, she made a pious ejaculation, observing what a pity it was that a gentleman of his beneficent disposition, had been brought up without the pale of the church. "You have, madam, all the accomplishments requisite, answered my lord, to make a convert of me." "I wish, replied she, I was the instrument of such a meritorious change; but, continued she, looking languishingly upon him, perhaps you have a prophane meaning." "Indeed, madam, said he, a man must be insensible to all the charms of the fair sex centered in you, if he has, in your company, any other object in contemplation." "I thank you, Sir, for the compliment; when I lived in the world, I confess I had several admirers, and I might yet be distinguished amongst the croud if I would hearken to the flatteries of men: but they are, in general, so false, so deceitful, and so inconstant, that I have sequestered myself from society, ever since the death of my husband, who was keeper of the royal palace at Chamber: though I am yet of an age to enjoy worldly pleasures, I have given up all gay connections, and live retired in a little cottage just by the grove grove that lies before us; and at the earnest intreaties of the Capuchin friars, I receive the money of their benefactors; it was on that errand that I went to their convent." My lord said it was a sin for a person, who had every thing that could please and engage, not to make the man happy who might approve himself worthy of her choice. "You would soon make me vain, replied she, and, perhaps, on a better acquaintance, make me alter my mind." When my lord was introduced, he found every thing in her house elegant, neat, and commodious. She begged he would accept of some refreshment before dinner, adding, she had entertained such an opinion of his honour and discretion, that she would, in his favour, break through her constant rule, which was, never to invite at her table a gentleman tete-a-tete. He expressed, in the most polite terms, his sensibility for this partiality to him; and as she had but one servant, who retired after she had brought in the dinner, and placed two bottles of wine and glasses upon a dumb waiter, my lord, by his praises and protestations, turned her head and gained her heart. At the dessert, two or three glasses of champaign added lustre to her beautiful eyes, and having sent out her servant for the afternoon, on divers messages, she locked her door, telling her favourite guest, that a woman could not be too careful of her reputation. After remarking the confidence she had reposed in his lordship, she fell into a swoon, and he treated her case as a skilful physician. Her senses having been absorbed for a long while in voluptuous gratifications and inexpressible raptures, she recovered from her ecstasy, and fetching a deep sigh, she said, "Now that you have triumphed over my weakness, will you be faithful and constant! you are the only man I shall ever love, and I cannot bear the idea of your either parting from me, or having an attachment for any other woman." He promised much more than he intended to perform, and as she had given beforehand the receipt he wanted, he bestowed a guinea on the convent without requiring a further acknowledgment of his liberality.

However, after a few days fruition, he took a French leave, and continued his journey through Blois and Tours: in this last place, walking one evening in the Mall, he heard two ladies talking English; one of them lamented her unhappy situation and credulity, and cursing a perfidious lover who had left her deserted in a foreign land. My lord accosting them abruptly, said, "If you want a comforter, ladies, I am at your service, always happy to oblige my dear countrywomen." These offers were so a-propos that the ladies accepted them without hesitation. In going to their lodgings, my lord learned from the unhappy fair, that a young clergyman, with whom she had been connected some years, had abandoned her cruelly, without being able to assign any reason for this unmerited treatment, except his natural inconstancy. The other travelled with her as a companion, and was the prettiest of the two; my lord gave them a genteel supper, and the friend of the afflicted widow having surrendered by capitulation, his lordship furnished them with a vehicle to convey them to Paris, where they had some acquaintance. He did not long remain at Angers, the inhabitants of which chiefly consist of priests, monks, and students of the university. The lady of the Lieutenant de Roy, who was particularly fond of my lords Anglois, having sent a polite card of invitation to her assembly to lord M—, he made there a brilliant appearance, and soon grew in such favour with this fashionable lady, that her husband called him his deputy. He spent part of his time at her country seat near St. George. They made several jaunts together to Ancenis, Nantes, Saumur, and other places. Madame de Labrosse, that was her name, found upon her toilette the secret of always appearing young, though she was past forty. But her conversation was so lively and entertaining, and her manners so irresistible, that my lord could not break her chains, till she imprudently carried him on a visit to her niece, who was a nun in the famous abbey of Fontevraud, and a young lady of exquisite beauty. Madame de Labrosse was not jealous at first of the extravagant praises he passed upon her person, thinking they were mere compliments, which would make no impression upon the fair recluse. But she was mistaken; if ever my lord was really in love, it was with this tender victim to the cruel injunction of unnatural parents; and she instantly conceived a violent passion for this new admirer. During three days that my lord spent there, he found the opportunity to speak to her in private, and having sworn to each other an eternal love, with a promise to write frequently, he returned with Madame de Labrosse to Angers, who having rallied him with her natural good grace grace, upon the declarations of love he made to her niece, he confessed to her he was determined to carry her off. She continued the jest, and having protested to her he was in earnest, she represented to him the difficulties and the consequences of such an attempt. He replied, that no dangers or obstacles should deter him; and this rash design caused a rupture between them, after she had in vain expostulated with him. Several letters passed betwixt them; and Madame de Labrosse, out of revenge and jealousy, and for fear of being blamed as the person who had introduced his lordship to her niece, acquainted the lady abbess with his intention. When he returned to Fontevraud, he was denied admittance. Enraged at his mistress's prudence, which he called treachery, he lampooned her throughout the province before he set out for Paris.

For some time he had no female connections in this gallant metropolis; but absence having cooled his passion for the unfortunate and beautiful captive, he was bewitched with an opera girl, called Mademoiselle Duvergen, more famous by the lovers she had ruined, than by any personal accomplishments to gain their affection. Nothing exceeds her extravagance but her rapaciousness; having obliged the unwary lord to get money at any rate, from Christian and Jew usurers, his lordship's neglect to pay the interest, made them apprehensive of losing the capital. And having received intelligence that he intended to depart the kingdom clandestinely, they applied to the duke de la Vrilliere, and the lieutenant of the police, to secure the person of his lordship in the prison of the Palais, where he has been confined ever since the latter end of the year 1768, until lately removed to the Fort Levesque, on account of the conflagration which threatened the destruction of the whole pile of that building, formerly the residence of the French monarchs, but appropriated by Philip the Fair, to the use of the parliament of Paris, part of which is used for two different prisons, for debtors and criminals.

His lordship has a yearly allowance of two hundred guineas, the rest of his income goes to his creditors, till his debts, amounting to a considerable sum, are paid. He never was a gamester, all his misfortunes arose from his unbounded gallantries and total want of oeconomy. His lordship makes his situation as comfortable as possible, and receives frequent visits from the ladies, who sympathize with his sufferings.

IT is farther said, "that the land on which they "settled was ours.—But how came it to be ours? If sailing along a coast can give a right to a country, then might the people of Japan become, as soon as they please, the proprietors of Britain. Nothing can be more chimerical than property founded on such a reason. If the land on which the colonies first settled had any proprietors, they were the natives. The greatest part of it they bought of the natives. They have since cleared and cultivated it; and, without any help from us, converted a wilderness into fruitful and pleasant fields. It is, therefore, now on a double account their property: and no power on earth can have any right to disturb them in the possession of it, or to take from them, without their consent, any part of its produce.

But let it be granted, that the land was ours. Did they not settle upon it under the faith of charters, which promised them the enjoyment of all the rights of Englishmen, and allowed them to tax themselves, and to be governed by legislatures of their own, similar to ours? These charters were given them by an authority, which at the time was thought competent; and they have been rendered sacred by an acquiescence on our part for more than a century. Can it then be wondered at, that the colonies should revolt, when they found their charters violated; and an attempt made to force innovations upon them by famine and the sword?—But I lay no stress on charters. They derive their rights from a higher source. It is inconsistent with common sense to imagine, that any people would ever think of settling in a distant country on any such condition, condition, as that the people from whom they withdrew, should be forever masters of their property, and have power to subject them to any modes of government they pleased. And had there been express stipulations to this purpose in all the charters of the colonies, they would, in my opinion, be no more bound by them, than if it had been stipulated with them, that they should go naked, or expose themselves to the incursions of wolves and tigers.

The defective state of the representation of this kingdom has been farther pleaded to prove our right to tax America. We submit to a parliament that does not represent us, and therefore they ought.—How strange an argument is this? It is saying we want liberty; and therefore, they ought to want it.—Suppose it true, that they are indeed contending for a better constitution of government, and more liberty than we enjoy. Ought this to make us angry?—Who is there that does not see the danger to which this country is exposed?—Is it generous, because we are in a sink, to endeavour to draw them into it?—Ought we not rather to wish earnestly, that there may at least be one free country left upon earth, to which we may fly, when venality, luxury, and vice have completed the ruin of liberty here?

It is, however, by no means true, that America has no more right to be exempted from taxation by the British parliament, than Britain itself. Here all freeholders, and burghesses in boroughs, are represented. There, not one freeholder, or any other person, is represented. Here, the aids granted by the represented part of the kingdom must be proportionably paid by themselves; and the laws they make for others, they at the same time make for themselves. There, the aids they would grant would not be paid, but received, by themselves; and the laws they made would be made for others only.—In short, the relation of one country to another country, whose representatives have the power of taxing it (and of appropriating the money raised by the taxes) is much the same with the relation of a country to a single despot, or a body of despots, within itself, invested with the like power. In both cases, the people taxed and those who tax have separate interests; nor can there be any thing to check oppression, besides either the abilities of the people taxed, or the humanity of the taxers. But indeed I can never hope to convince that person of any thing, who does not see an essential difference * between the two cases now mentioned; or between the circumstances of individuals, and classes of men, making parts of a community imperfectly represented in the legislature that governs it; and the circumstances of a whole community, in a distant world, not at all represented.

But enough has been said by others on this point: nor is it possible for me to throw any new light upon it. To finish, therefore, what I meant to offer under this head, I must beg that the following considerations may be particularly attended to.

The question now between us and the Colonies is, Whether, in respect of taxation and internal legislation, they are bound to be subject to the jurisdiction of this kingdom: or, in other words, whether the British parliament has or has not of right, a power to dispose of their property, and to model as it pleases their governments? To this supremacy over them, we say, we are intitled; and in order to maintain it, we have begun the present war. Let me here enquire,

1st, Whether, if we have now this supremacy, we shall not be equally entitled to it in any future time? They are now but little short of half our number. To this number they have grown, from a small body of original settlers, by a very rapid encrease. The probability is, that they will go on to encrease; and that in 50 or 60 years, they will be double our number ||; and form a mighty empire, consisting of a variety of states, all equal or superior to ourselves in all the arts and accomplishments, which give dignity and happiness to human life. In that period, will they be still bound to acknowledge that supremacy over them which we now claim? Can there be any person who will assert this; or whose

N O T E S.

* It gives me pleasure to find, that the author of the Remarks on the principal Acts of the 13th Parliament of Great Britain, &c. acknowledges this difference. It has, however, been at the same time mortifying to me to find so able a writer adopting such principles of government, as are contained in this work. According to him, a people have no property or rights, except such as their civil governors are pleased not to take from them. Taxes, therefore, he asserts, are in no sense the gifts, much less the free gifts of the people. See p. 58. and 191.

|| See observations on reverſionary payments.

mind does not revolt at the idea of a vast continent, holding all that is valuable to it, at the discretion of a handful of people on the other side the Atlantic? But if, at that period, this would be unreasonable, what makes it otherwise now? Draw the line if you can. But there is a still greater difficulty.

Britain is now, I will suppose, the seat of liberty and virtue; and its legislature consists of a body of able and independent men, who govern with wisdom and justice. The time may come when all will be reversed: when its excellent constitution of government will be subverted; when, pressed by debts and taxes, it will be greedy to draw to itself an encrease of revenue from every distant province, in order to ease its own burdens: when the influence of the crown, strengthened by luxury and an universal profligacy of manners, will have tainted every heart, broken down every fence of liberty, and rendered us a nation of tame and contented vassals: when a general election will be nothing but a general auction of boroughs: and when the parliament, the grand council of the nation, and once the faithful guardian of the state, and a terror to evil ministers, will be degenerated into a body of symplicants, dependent and venal, always ready to confirm any measures; and little more than a public court for registering royal edicts. Such, it is possible, may, some time or other, be the state of Great Britain. What will, at that period, be the duty of the Colonies? Will they be still bound to unconditional submission? Must they always continue an appendage to our government; and follow it implicitly through every change that can happen to it?—wretched condition, indeed of millions of freemen as good as ourselves—will you say that we now govern equitably; and that there is no danger of any such revolution?—would to God this were true!—but will you not always say the same? who shall judge whether we govern equitably or not? can you give the colonies any security that such a period will never come? once more.

If we have indeed that power which we claim over the legislations, and internal rights of the colonies, may we not, whenever we please, subject them to the arbitrary power of the crown?—I do not mean, that this would be a disadvantageous change: For I have before observed, that if a people are to be subject to an external power over which they have no command, it is better that power should be lodged in the hands of one man than of a multitude. But many persons think otherwise; and such ought to consider that, if this would be a calamity, the condition of the colonies must be deplorable.—“A government by king, lords, and commons, (it has been said) is the perfection of government;” and so it is, when the commons are a just representation of the people; and when also, it is not extended to any distant people, or communities, not represented. But if this is the best, a government by a king only must be the worst; and every claim implying a right to establish such a government among any people must be unjust and cruel.—It is self-evident, that by claiming a right to alter the constitutions of the colonies, according to our discretion, we claim this power. And it is a power that we have thought fit to exercise in one of our colonies; and that we have attempted to exercise in another.—Canada, according to the late extensions of its limits, is a country almost as large as half Europe; and it may possibly come in time to be filled with British subjects. The Quebec act makes the king of Great Britain a despot over all that country.—In the province of Massachusetts Bay the same thing has been attempted and begun.

The act for better regulating their government, passed at the same time with the Quebec act, gives the king a right of appointing, and removing at his pleasure, the members of one part of the legislature; alters the mode of choosing juries, on purpose to bring it more under the influence of the king; and takes away from the province the power of calling any meetings of the people without the king's consent.——The judges, likewise, have been made dependent on the king, for their nomination and pay, and continuance in office.—If all this is no more than we have a right to do; may we not go on to abolish the house of representatives, to destroy all trials by juries, and to give up the province absolutely and totally to the will of the king?—May we not even establish popery in the province, as has been lately done in Canada, leaving the support of protestantism to the king's discretion.—Can there be any Englishman who, were it his own case, would not sooner lose his heart's blood than yield to claims so pregnant with evils, and destructive to every thing that can distinguish a freeman from a slave.

I will take this opportunity to add, that what

what I have now said, suggests a consideration that demonstrates, on how different a footing the colonies are with respect to our government, from particular bodies of men within the kingdom, who happen not to be represented. Here, it is impossible that the represented part should subject the unrepresented part to arbitrary power, without including themselves. But in the Colonies it is not impossible. We know that it has been done.

SECT. II. Whether the War with America is justified by the Principles of the Constitution.

I Have proposed, in the next place, to examine the war with the colonies by the principles of the constitution.—I know, that it is now common to say that we are now maintaining the constitution in America. If this means that we are endeavouring to establish our own constitution of government there; it is by no means true; nor, were it true, would it be right. They have chartered governments of their own, with which they are pleased; and which, if any power on earth may change without their consent, that power may likewise, if it thinks proper, deliver them over to the grand seignior.—Suppose the colonies of France and Spain had, by compacts, enjoyed for near a century and a half, free governments open to all the world, and under which they had grown and flourished; what should we think of those kingdoms, were they to attempt to destroy their governments, and to force upon them their own mode of government? Should we not applaud any zeal they discovered in repelling such an injury?—But the truth is, in the present instance, we are not maintaining but violating our own constitution in America. The essence of our constitution consists in its independency. There is in this case no difference between subjection and annihilation. Did, therefore, the colonies possess governments perfectly the same with ours, the attempt to subject them to ours would be an attempt to ruin them. A free government loses its nature from the moment it becomes liable to be commanded or altered by any superior power.

But I intended here principally to make the following observation:

The fundamental principle of our government is, “the right of a people to give and grant their own money.—It is of no consequence, in this case, whether we enjoy this right in a proper manner or not. Most certainly we do not. It is, however, the principle on which our government, as a free government, is founded. The spirit of the constitution gives it us; and, however imperfectly enjoyed, we glory in it as our first and greatest blessing. It was an attempt to encroach upon this right, in a trifling instance, that produced the civil war in the reign of Charles the first.—Ought not our brethren in America to enjoy this right as well as ourselves? Do the principles of the constitution give it us, but deny it to them? Or can we, with any decency, pretend that when we give to the king their money, we give him our own? *—What difference does it make, that in the time of Charles the first the attempt to take away this right was made by one man; but that in the case of America, it is made by a body of men?

In a word. This is a war undertaken not only against the principles of our own constitution; but on purpose to destroy other similar constitutions in America; and to substitute in their room a military force. It is, therefore, a gross and flagrant violation of the constitution.

SECT. III. Of the policy of the War with America.

IN writing the present section, I have entered upon a subject of the last importance, on which much has been said by other writers with great force, and in the ablest manner †. But I am not willing to omit any topic which I think of great consequence, merely because it has already been discussed: And, with respect to this in particular, it will, I believe, be found that some of the observations on which I shall insist, have not been sufficiently attended to.

The object of this war has been often enough declared to be “maintaining the supremacy of this country over the colonies.”

N O T E S.

* The author of Taxation no Tyranny will undoubtedly assert this without hesitation, for he compares our present situation with respect to the colonies to that of the ancient Scythians, who, upon returning from a war, found themselves shut out of their own HOUSES by their SLAVES.

† See particularly, a speech intended to have been spoken on the bill for altering the charter of the colony of Massachusetts Bay; the considerations on the measures carrying on with respect to the British colonies; and the two appeals to the justice and interests of the people.

nies." I have already enquired how far reason and justice, the principles of liberty, and the rights of humanity, entitle us to this supremacy. Setting aside therefore, now, all considerations of this kind, I would observe, that this supremacy is to be maintained, either merely for its own sake, or for the sake of some public interest connected with it and dependent upon it.—If, for its own sake; the only object of the war is the extension of dominion; and its only motive is the lust of power.—All government, even within a state, becomes tyrannical, as far as it is a needless and wanton exercise of power; or is carried farther than is absolutely necessary to preserve the peace and to secure the safety of the state. This is what an excellent writer calls governing too much; and its effect must always be, weakening government by rendering it contemptible and odious.—Nothing can be of more importance, in governing distant provinces, and adjusting the clashing interests of different societies, than attention to this remark. In these circumstances it is, particularly necessary to make a sparing use of power, in order to preserve power.—Happy would it have been for Great Britain, had this been remembered by those who have lately conducted its affairs. But our policy has been of another kind. At the period when our authority should have been most concealed, it has been brought most in view; and, by a progression of violent measures, every one of which has increased distress, we have given the world reason to conclude, that we are acquainted with no other method of governing than by force.—What a shocking mistake?—If our object is power, we should have known better how to use it; and our rulers should have considered, that freemen will always revolt at the sight of a naked sword; and that the complicated affairs of a great kingdom, holding in subordination to it a multitude of distant communities, all jealous of their rights, and warmed with spirits as high as our own, require not only the most skilful, but the most cautious and tender management. The consequences of a different management we are now feeling. We see ourselves driven amongst rocks, and in danger of being lost.

There are the following reasons which seem to make it too probable, that the present contest with America is a contest for power only *, abstracted from all the advantages connected with it.

1st. There is a love of power for its own sake inherent in human nature; and it cannot be uncharitable to suppose that the nation in general, and the cabinet in particular, are too likely to be influenced by it. What can be more flattering than to look across the Atlantic, and to see in the boundless continent of America, increasing millions whom we have a right to order as we please, who hold their property at our disposal, and who have no other law than our will. With what complacency have we been used to talk of them as our subjects?—It is not the interruption they now give to this pleasure: It is not the opposition they make to our pride; and not any injury they have done us, that is the secret spring of our present animosity against them?—I wish all in this kingdom would examine themselves carefully on this point. Perhaps, they would become sensible, that it was a spirit of domination, more than a regard to the true interest of this country, that lately led so many of them, with such savage folly, to address the throne for the slaughter of their brethren in America, if they will not submit to them; and to make offers of their lives and fortunes for that purpose.

Indeed, I am persuaded, that, were pride and the lust of dominion exterminated from every heart among us, and the humility of christians infused in their room, this quarrel would be soon ended.

2^{dly}. Another reason for believing that this is a contest for power only is, that our ministers have frequently declared, that their object is not to draw a revenue from America; and that many of those who are warmest for continuing it, represent the American trade as of no great consequence.

But what deserves particular consideration here is, that this is a contest from which no advantages can possibly be derived.—Not a revenue: For the provinces of America, when desolated, will

N O T E.

* I have heard it said by a person in one of the first departments of the state, that the present contest is for dominion on the side of the colonies, as well as on ours: And so it is, indeed; but with this essential difference. We are struggling for dominion over others. They are struggling for self dominion: The noblest of all blessings.

afford no revenue; or if they should, the expence of subduing them and keeping them in subjection will much exceed that revenue.

Not any of the advantages of trade: For it is a folly, next to insanity, to think trade can be promoted by impoverishing our customers, and fixing in their minds an everlasting abhorrence of us.—It remains, therefore, that this war can have no other object than the extension of power.—Miserable reflection!—To sheath our swords in the bowels of our brethren, and spread misery and ruin among a happy people, for no other end than to oblige them to acknowledge our supremacy. How horrid?—This is the cursed ambition that led a Cæsar and an Alexander, and many other mad conquerors, to attack peaceful communities, and to lay waste the earth.

But a worse principle than even this, influences some among us. Pride and the love of dominion are principles hateful enough; but blind resentment and the desire of revenge are infernal principles. And these, I am afraid, have no small share at present in guiding our public conduct.—One cannot help indeed being astonished at the virulence, with which some speak on the present occasion against the colonies.—For, what have they done?—Have they crossed the ocean and invaded us? Have they attempted to take from us the fruits of our labour, and to overturn that form of government which we hold so sacred?—This cannot be pretended.—On the contrary. This is what we have done to them.—We have transported ourselves to their peaceful retreats, and employed our fleets and armies to stop up their ports, to destroy their commerce, to seize their effects, and to burn their towns. Would we but let them alone, and suffer them to enjoy in security their property and governments, instead of disturbing us, they would thank and bless us. And yet it is we who imagine ourselves ill used.—The truth is, we expected to find them a cowardly rabble who would lie quietly at our feet; and they have disappointed us. They have risen in their own defence, and repelled force by force. They deny the plenitude of our power over them; and insisted upon being treated as free communities.—It is this that has provoked us; and kindled our governors into rage.

I hope I shall not here be understood to intimate, that all who promote this war are actuated by these principles.

Some, I doubt not, are influenced by no other principle than a regard to what they think the just authority of this country over its colonies, and to the unity and indivisibility of the British empire. I wish such could be engaged to enter thoroughly into the enquiry, which has been the subject of the first part of this pamphlet; and to consider, particularly, how different a thing maintaining the authority of government within a state is from maintaining the authority of one people over another, already happy in the enjoyment of a government of their own. I wish farther they would consider, that the desire of maintaining authority is warrantable, only as far as it is the means of promoting some end, and doing some good; and that, before we resolve to spread famine and fire through a country in order to make it acknowledge our authority, we ought to be assured that great advantages will arise not only to ourselves but to the country we wish to conquer.—That from the present contest no advantage to ourselves can arise, has been already shewn, and will presently be shewn more at large.—That no advantage to the colonies can arise from it, need not, I hope, be shewn. It has however been asserted, that even their good is intended by this war. Many of us are persuaded, that they will be much happier under our government, than under any government of their own; and that their liberties will be safer when held for them by us, than when trusted in their own hands.—How kind is it thus to take upon us the trouble of judging for them what is most for their happiness? Nothing can be kinder except the resolution we have formed to exterminate them, if they will not submit to our judgment.—What strange language have I sometimes heard? By an armed force we are now endeavouring to destroy the laws and governments of America; and yet I have heard it said, that we are endeavouring to support law and government there. We are insisting upon our right to levy contributions upon them; and to maintain this right, we are bringing upon them all the miseries a people can endure; and yet it is asserted, that we mean nothing but their security and happiness.

But I have wandered a little from the point I intended principally to insist upon in this section, which is, “the folly, in respect of policy, of the measures which have brought on this contest; and its pernicious and fatal tendency.”

The following observations will, I believe, abundantly prove this.

1st. There are points which are likely always to suffer by discussion. Of this kind are most points of authority and prerogative; and the best policy is to avoid, as much as possible, giving any occasion for calling them into question.

The colonies were at the beginning of this reign in the habit of acknowledging our authority, and of allowing us as much power over them as our interest required; and more, in some instances, than we could reasonably claim. This habit they would have retained; and had we, instead of imposing new burdens upon them, and increasing their restraints, studied to promote their commerce, and to grant them new indulgences, they would have been always growing more attached to us. Luxury, and, together with it, their dependence upon us, and our influence in their assemblies †, would have increased, till in time perhaps they would have become as corrupt as ourselves; and we might have succeeded to our wishes in establishing our authority over them.—But, happily, for them, we have chosen a different course. By exertions of authority which have alarmed them, they have been put upon examining into the grounds of all our claims, and forced to give up their luxuries, and to seek all their resources within themselves: And the issue is likely to prove the loss of all our authority over them, and of all the advantages connected with it. So little do men in power sometimes know how to preserve power; and so remarkably does the desire of extending dominion sometimes destroy it.—Mankind are naturally disposed to continue in subjection to that mode of government, be it what it will, under which they have been born and educated. Nothing rouses them into resistance but gross abuses, or some particular oppressions out of the road to which they have been used. And he who will examine the history of the world will find, there has generally been more reason for complaining that they have been too patient, than that they have been turbulent and rebellious.

Our governors, ever since I can remember, have been jealous that the colonies, some time or other, would throw off their dependence. This jealousy was not founded on any of their acts or declarations. They have always, while at peace with us, disclaimed any such design; and they have continued to disclaim it since they have been at war with us. I have reason, indeed, to believe, that independency is, even at this moment, generally dreaded among them as a calamity to which they are in danger of being driven, in order to avoid a greater.—The jealousy I have mentioned was, however, natural; and betrayed a secret opinion, that the subjection in which they were held was more than we could expect them always to endure. In such circumstances, all possible care should have been taken to give them no reason for discontent; and to preserve them in subjection, by keeping in that line of conduct to which custom had reconciled them, or at least never deviating from it, except with great caution; and particularly, by avoiding all direct attacks on their property and legislations. Had we done this, the different interests of so many states scattered over a vast continent, joined to our own prudence and moderation, would have enabled us to maintain them in dependence for ages to come.—But instead of this, how have we acted? It is in truth too evident, that our whole conduct, instead of being directed by that sound policy and foresight which in such circumstances were absolutely necessary, has been nothing (to say the best of it) but a series of the blindest rigour followed by retractation; of violence followed by concession; of mistake, weakness and inconsistency. A recital of a few facts, within every body's recollection, will fully prove this.

N O T E.

† This has been our policy with respect to the people of Ireland; and the consequence is, that we now see their parliament as obedient as we can wish.

In the 6th of George the second, an act was passed for imposing certain duties on all foreign spirits, molasses and sugars imported into the plantations. In this act, the duties imposed are said to be given and granted by the parliament to the king; and this is the first American act in which these words have been used. But notwithstanding this, as the act had the appearance of being only a regulation of trade, the colonies submitted to it; and a small direct revenue was drawn by it from them.—In the 4th of the present reign, many alterations were made in this act, with the declared purpose of making provision for raising a revenue in America. This alarmed the colonies; and produced discontents, and remonstrances, which might have convinced our rulers this was tender ground, on which it became them to tread very gently.—There is, however, no reason to doubt but in time they would have sunk into a quiet submission to this revenue act, as being at worst only the exercise of a power which then they seemed not to have thought much of contesting; I mean, the power of taxing them externally.—But before they had time to cool, a worse provocation was given them; and the stamp-act was passed. This being an attempt to tax them internally; and a direct attack on their property, by a power which would not suffer itself to be questioned; which eased itself by loading them; and to which it was impossible to fix any bounds; they were thrown at once, from one end of the continent to the other, into resistance and rage.—Government, dreading the consequences, gave way; and the parliament (upon a change of ministry) repealed the stamp-act, without requiring from them any recognition of its authority, or doing any more to preserve its dignity, than asserting, by the declaratory law, that it was possessed of full power and authority to make laws to bind them in all cases whatever.—Upon this, peace was restored; and, had no farther attempts of the same kind been made, they would have undoubtedly have suffered us (as the people of Ireland have done) to enjoy quietly our declaratory law. They would have recovered their former habits of subjection; and our connexion with them might have continued an increasing source of our wealth and glory.—But the spirit of despotism and avarice, always blind and restless, soon broke forth again. The scheme for drawing a revenue from America, by parliamentary taxation, was resumed; and in little more than a year after the repeal of the stamp act, when all was peace, a third act was passed, imposing duties payable in America on tea, paper, glass, painters colours, &c.—This, as might have been expected, revived all the former heats; and the empire was a second time threatened with the most dangerous commotions.—Government receded again; and the parliament (under another change of ministry) repealed all the obnoxious duties, except that upon tea. This exception was made in order to maintain a shew of dignity. But it was, in reality, sacrificing safety to pride; and leaving a splinter in the wound to produce a gangrene.—For some time, however, this relaxation answered its intended purposes. Our commercial intercourse with the colonies was again recovered; and they avoided nothing but that tea which we had excepted in our repeal. In this state would things have remained, and even tea would perhaps in time have been gradually admitted, had not the evil genius of Britain stepped forth once more to embroil the empire.

The East-India company having fallen under difficulties, partly in consequence of the loss of the American market for tea, a scheme was formed for assisting them by an attempt to recover that market. With this view an act was passed to enable them to export their tea to America free of all duties here, and subject only to 3d. per pound duty, payable in America. By this expedient they were enabled to offer it at a low price; and it was expected the consequence would prove, that the colonies would be tempted by it; a precedent gained for taxing them, and at the same time the company relieved. Ships were, therefore, fitted out; and large cargoes sent. The snare was too gross to escape the notice of the colonies. They saw it, and spurned at it. They refused to admit the tea; and at Boston some persons in disguise buried it in the sea.—Had our governors in this case satisfied themselves with requiring a compensation from the province for the damage done, there is no doubt but it would have been granted. Or had they proceeded no farther in the infliction of punishment, than stopping up the port and destroying the trade of Boston, till compensation was made, the province might possibly have submitted, and a sufficient saving would have been gained for the honour of the nation. But having hitherto proceeded without wisdom, they observed now no bounds in their resentment. To the Boston port bill was added a bill which destroyed the chartered government of the province; a bill which withdrew from the jurisdiction of the province, persons who in particular cases should commit murder; and the Quebec bill. At the same time a strong body of troops was stationed at Boston to enforce obedience to these bills.

* All who knew any thing of the temper of the colonies saw that the effect of all this sudden accumulation of vengeance, would probably be not intimidating but exasperating them, and driving them into a general revolt. But our ministers had different apprehensions. They believed that the malecontents in the colony of Massachusetts were a small party, headed by a few factious men; that the majority of the people would take the side of government, as soon as they saw a force among them capable of supporting them; that, at worst, the colonies in general would never make a common cause with this province; and that, the issue would prove, in a few months, order, tranquility and submission.—Every one of these apprehensions was falsified by the events that followed.

When the bills I have mentioned came to be carried into execution, the whole province was thrown into confusion. Their courts of justice were shut up, and all government was dissolved. The commander in chief found it necessary to fortify himself in Boston; and the other colonies, immediately resolved to make a common cause with this colony.

So strangely misinformed were our ministers, that this was all a surprise upon them. They took fright, therefore; and once more made an effort to retreat; but indeed the most ungracious one that can well be imagined. A proposal was sent to the colonies, called conciliatory; and the substance of which was, that if any of them would raise such sums as should be demanded of them by taxing themselves, the parliament would forbear to tax them.—It will be scarcely believed, hereafter, that such a proposal could be thought conciliatory. It was only telling them; “if you will tax yourselves by our order, we will save ourselves the trouble of taxing you.”—They received the proposal as an insult; and rejected it with disdain.

At the time this concession was transmitted to America, open hostilities were not begun. In the sword our ministers thought they had still a resource which would immediately settle all disputes. They considered the people of New-England as nothing but a mob, who would be soon routed and forced into obedience. It was, even believed, that a few thousands of our army might march through all America, and make all quiet wherever they went. Under this conviction our ministers did not dread urging the province of Massachusetts's Bay into rebellion, by ordering the army to seize their stores, and to take up some of their leading men.—The attempt was made.—The people fled immediately to arms, and repelled the attack.—A considerable part of the flower of the British army has been destroyed.—Some of our best generals, and the bravest of our troops, are now disgracefully and miserably imprisoned at Boston.—A horrid civil war is commenced;—and the empire is distracted and convulsed.

Can it be possible to think with patience of the policy that has brought us into these circumstances? Did ever Heaven punish the vices of a people more severely by darkening their counsels? How great would be our happiness could we now recal former time, and return to the policy of the last reigns?—But those times are gone.—I will, however, beg leave for a few moments to look back to them; and to compare the ground we have left with that on which we find ourselves. This must be done with deep regret; but it forms a necessary part of my present design.

In those times our colonies, foregoing every advantage which they might derive from trading with foreign nations, consented to send only to us whatever it was for our interest to receive from them; and to receive only from us whatever it was for our interest to send to them. They gave up the power of making sumptuary laws, and exposed themselves to all the evils of an increasing and wasteful luxury, because we were benefited by vending among them the materials of it. The iron with which providence has blessed their country, they were required by laws, in which they acquiesced, to transport hither, that our people might be maintained by working it for them into nails, ploughs, axes, &c. And in several instances, even one colony was not allowed to supply any neighbouring colonies with commodities, which could be conveyed to them from hence.—But they yielded much farther. They consented that we should have the appointment of one branch of their legislature. By recognizing as their king, a king resident among us and under our own influence, they gave us a negative on all their laws. By allowing an appeal to us in their civil disputes, they gave us likewise the ultimate determination of all civil causes among them.—In short. They allowed us every power we could desire, except that of taxing them, and interfering in their internal legislations: And they had admitted precedents which, even in these instances, gave us no inconsiderable authority over them. By purchasing our goods they paid our taxes; and, by allowing us to regulate their trade in any manner we thought most for our advantage, they enriched our merchants, chants, and helped us to bear our growing burdens. They fought our battles with us. They gloried in their relation to us. All their gains centered among us; and they always spoke of this country and looked to it as their home.

Such was the state of things.—What is it now?

Not contented with a degree of power, sufficient to satisfy any reasonable ambition, we have attempted to extend it.—Not contented with drawing from them a large revenue indirectly, we have endeavoured to procure one directly, by an authoritative seizure; and, in order to gain a pepper-corn in this way, have chosen to hazard millions, acquired by the peaceable intercourse of trade.—Vile policy! what a scourge is government so conducted?—Had we never deserted our old ground: Had we nourished and favoured America, with a view to commerce, instead of considering it as a country to be governed: Had we, like a liberal and wise people, rejoiced to see a multitude of free states, branching forth from ourselves, all enjoying independent legislatures similar to our own: Had we aimed at binding them to us only by the ties of affection and interest; and contented ourselves with a moderate power rendered durable by being lenient and friendly, an umpire in their differences, an aid to them in improving their own free governments, and their common bulwark against the assaults of foreign enemies: Had this, I say, been our policy and temper; there is nothing so great or happy that we might not have expected. With their increase our strength would have increased. A growing surplus in the revenue might have been gained, which, invariably applied to the gradual discharge of the national debt, would have delivered us from the ruin with which it threatens us. The liberty of America might have preserved our liberty; and, under the direction of a patriot king or wise minister, proved the means of restoring to us our almost lost constitution. Perhaps, in time, we might also have been brought to see the necessity of carefully watching and restricting our paper-credit: And thus we might have regained safety; and, in union with our colonies, have been more than a match for every enemy, and risen to a situation of honour and dignity never before known amongst mankind.—But I am forgetting myself.—Our colonies are likely to be lost for ever. Their love is turned into hatred; and their respect for our government into resentment and abhorrence.—We shall see more distinctly what a calamity this is, and the observations I have now made will be confirmed, by attending to the following facts.

Our American colonies, particularly the northern ones, have been for some time in the happiest state of society; or, in that middle state of civilization, between its first rule and its last refined and corrupted state. Old countries consist generally, of three classes of people; a gentry; a yeomanry; and a peasantry. The colonies consist only of a body of *yeomanry supported by agriculture, and all independent, and nearly upon a level; in consequence of which, joined to a boundless extent of country, the means of subsistence are procured without difficulty, and the temptations to wickedness are so inconsiderable, that executions† are seldom known among them. From hence arises an encouragement to population so great, that in some of the colonies they double their own number in fifteen years; in others, in eighteen years; and in all, taken one with another, in twenty-five years.—Such an increase was, I believe, never before known. It demonstrates that they must live at their ease; and be free from those cares, oppressions, and diseases which depopulate and ravage luxurious states.

With the population of the colonies has increased their trade; but much faster, on account of the gradual introduction of luxury among them.—In 1723 the exports to Pennsylvania were 16,000*l*.—In 1742 they were 75,295*l*.—In 1757 they were increased to 268,426*l*. and in 1773 to half a million.

The exports to all the colonies in 1744 were 640,114*l*.—In 1758, they were increased to 1,832,942*l*. and 1773, to three

* Excepting the negroes in the southern colonies, who probably will now either soon become extinct, or have their condition changed into that of freemen. -- It is not the fault of the colonies that they have among them so many of these unhappy people. They have made laws to prohibit the importation of them; but these laws have always had a negative put upon them here, because of their tendency to hurt our negro trade.

† In the province of Massachusetts Bay there has not been, I am informed, more than one execution these eighteen years.

millions*. And the probability is, that, had it not been for the discontents among the colonies since the year 1764, our trade with them would have been this year double to what it was in 1773; and that in a few years more, it would not have been possible for the whole kingdom, tho' consisting only of manufacturers, to supply the American demand.

This trade, it should be considered, was not only thus an increasing trade; but it was a trade in which we had no rivals; a trade certain, constant, and uninterrupted; and which, by the shipping employed in it, and the naval stores supplied by it, contributed greatly to the support of that navy which is our chief national strength.—Viewed in these lights it was an object unspeakably important. But it will appear still more so if we view it in its connexions and dependencies. It is well known, that our trade with Africa and the West-Indies cannot easily subsist without it. And, upon the whole, it is undeniable, that it has been one of the main springs of our opulence and splendor; and that we have, in a great measure, been indebted to it for our ability to bear a debt so much heavier, than that which fifty years ago, the wisest men thought would necessarily sink us.

This inestimable prize, and all the advantages connected with America, we are now throwing away. Experience alone can shew what calamities must follow. It will indeed be astonishing if this kingdom can bear such a loss without dreadful consequences.—These consequences have been amply represented by others; and it is needless to enter into any account of them.—At the time we shall be feeling them—The Empire dismembered; the blood of thousands shed in an unrighteous quarrel; our strength exhausted; our merchants breaking; our manufacturers starving; our debts increasing; the revenue sinking; the funds tottering; and all the miseries of a public bankruptcy impending—At such a crisis should our natural enemies, eager for our ruin, seize the opportunity—The apprehension is too distressing.—

N O T E.

* Mr. Burke (in his excellent and admirable Speech on moving his resolutions for conciliation with the Colonies, p. 9, &c.) has shewn, that our trade to the Colonies, including that to Africa and the West-Indies, was in 1772 nearly equal to the trade which we carried on with the whole world at the beginning of this century.

Let us view this subject in another light.

On this occasion, particular attention should be given to the present singular situation of this kingdom. This is a circumstance of the utmost importance; and as I am afraid it is not much considered, I will beg leave to give a distinct account of it.

At the Revolution, the specie of the kingdom amounted, according to * Davenant's account, to eighteen millions and a half.—From the Accession to the year 1772, there were coined at the mint, near 29 millions of gold; and in ten years only of this time, or from January 1759 to January 1769, there were coined eight millions and a half†. But it has appeared lately, that the gold specie now left in the kingdom is no more than about twelve millions and a half.—Not so much as half a million of Silver specie has been coined these sixty years; and it cannot be supposed, that the quantity of it now in circulation exceeds two or three millions. The whole specie of the kingdom, therefore, is probably at this time about † fourteen or fifteen millions. Of this several millions must be hoarded at the Bank—Our circulating specie, therefore, appears to be greatly decreased. But our wealth, or the quantity of money in the kingdom, is greatly increased. This is paper to a vast amount, issued in almost every corner of the kingdom; and, particularly, by the Bank of England. While this paper maintains its credit, it answers all the purposes of specie, and is in all respects the same with money.

Specie represents some real value in goods or commodities. On the contrary; paper represents immediately nothing but specie. It is a promise or obligation, which the emitter brings himself under to pay a given sum in coin; and it owes its currency to the credit of the emitter; or to an opinion that he is able to make good his engagement; and that the sum specified may be received upon being demanded.

THE late advices from America were so little to be depended upon, that, before the arrival of Admiral Graves, it was not publicly known whether Quebec was in the possession of the provincials, or continued to be defended by General Carleton. By that gentleman's intelligence, that fortress is still safe, and the attack of the provincials totally defeated.

But the retaking St. John's by Col. Johnson, the king's superintendent for Indian affairs, with a body of Indians hastily drawn together, is still doubtful. That Col. Johnson may have entered Canada with a body of Indians seems not at all improbable, from a letter written by Gen. Schuyler, addressed to the Continental Congress, and published by order of that assembly. In that letter the general acquaints the Congress, that, on the 12th of December the Indians had related to him the substance of all the conferences which the superintendent had with them last summer, concluding with that at Montreal, where he delivered to each of the Canadian tribes a war-belt and the hatchet, of which they accepted, *and afterwards were invited to feast in a Bostonian, and drink his blood. An ox being roasted for the purpose, and a pipe of wine given to drink, the war-song was sung. One of the chiefs of the Six Nations who attended at that conference accepted a very large black war-belt with a hatchet depicted in it, but would neither eat nor drink, nor sing the war-song. He adds, that this famous belt they have now delivered up; and by that have given a proof that the servants of the crown have attempted to engage the savages in their favour.

Authentic advices confirm the account in our last of the taking of Major Connolly and his two companions in Maryland, and add, that the following speech from lord Dunmore to White Eyes, a famous Indian warrior, was found in the major's custody:

"Brother Captain White Eyes,

"I am glad to hear your good speeches sent to me by major Connolly, and you may be assured I shall put the one end of the belt which you have sent me into the hands of our Great King, who will be glad to hear from his brothers the Delawares, and will take a strong hold of it. You may rest satisfied, that our foolish young men shall never be permitted to have your lands, but, on the contrary, the Great King will protect you, and preserve you in the possession of them. Our young people in the country have been very foolish, and done many imprudent things, for which they must soon be sorry, and of which, I make no doubt, they have acquainted you; but I must desire you not to listen to them, as they would be willing that you should act equally foolish with themselves. But rather let what you hear pass in at one ear and out at the other, so that it may make no impression on your heart, until you hear from me fully, which shall be as soon as I can give farther information, who am your friend and brother.

"Capt. White Eyes will please to acquaint the Corn Stalk with these my sentiments also, as well as the Chiefs of the Mingors, and the other Six Nations. Your sincere friend, and elder brother, DUNMORE."

Published by order of the Congress.

Connolly and Cameron are closely confined till the orders of the General Congress concerning them shall be known, and Dr. Smith till further orders from the Provincial Committee.

Some persons, whose conduct in the neighbouring colonies had been unfriendly to liberty, having settled in New-York, the Provincial Congress of that province, lest it should be considered as an asylum for the enemies of liberty, have resolved, "That every person, not an inhabitant, entering into this colony, shall be furnished with a certificate, from the Committee of the jurisdiction wherein he last resided, that he is friendly to the liberties of America, or be subject to be dealt with as a person inimical thereto."

The following is the form of an oath administered to the inhabitants of Rhode-Island:

"I A—B—, here, in the presence of Almighty God, as I hope for ease, honour, and comfort, in this world, and happiness in the world to come, most earnestly, devoutly, and religiously swear, That I will neither directly nor indirectly assist the wicked instruments of ministerial tyranny and villainy, commonly called the King's troops and navy, by furnishing them with provisions and refreshments of any kind, unless authorized by the Continental Congress or Legislature at present established in this particular colony of Rhode-Island: I do also swear, by the tremendous and Almighty God, that I will neither directly nor indirectly convey any intelligence, nor give any advice, to the aforesaid enemies described; and that I pledge myself, if I should by any accident get knowledge of such treasons, to inform immediately the Committee of Safety; and as it is justly allowed, that, when the rights and sacred liberties of a nation or community are invaded, neutrality is not less base and criminal than open and avowed hostility, I do further swear, and pledge myself, as I hope for eternal salvation, that I will, whenever called upon by the voice of the Continental Congress, or by that of the legislature of this particular colony under their authority, to take arms, and subject myself to military discipline, in defence of the common rights and liberties of America. So help me God."

- The following letter was addressed to Gov. Tryon, and by his excellency communicated to the mayor of New-York:

B b

"Phanix,

" Phoenix, at New-York, Dec. 18.

" SIR,

" Being ordered by my instructions from Vice-admiral Graves, commander in chief of his majesty's ships and vessels in North-America, publicly to signify to all towns accessible to his majesty's ships, that, in case any violences shall hereafter be offered to any of the officers of the crown, or other peaceably-disposed subjects of his majesty; or if any bodies of men shall be raised and armed in the said towns, or any military works erected, otherwise than by order of his majesty, or those acting under his authority; or if any attempt shall be made to seize or destroy any public magazines of arms, ammunition; or other stores; in all or either of those cases, it will be my duty to treat the said towns as in open rebellion against the king.

" I am to request that your excellency will be pleased to let the above instructions be publicly made known in the town of New-York, at the same time you will assure them, that I shall be happy in granting the town every protection in the power of his majesty's ships under my command. I am, Sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

H. PARKER."

Some skirmishes have happened in Virginia, in which neither party have much to boast. The Regulars, it is said, have been obliged to retire to the shipping for shelter, and the Provincials suffered to enter the town of Norfolk without opposition; where, it is said, Col. Woodford, who commanded them, received a message from Lord Dunmore, assuring him, that, if his majesty's ships should not be fired upon, no injury should be offered to the town.

In Col. Woodford's letter to the President of the Convention, on this occasion, he acquaints that honourable body, that all the principal Tories, with their families and effects, have retired on board the ships: that he was much at a loss to know what steps to take; that he was impatient to receive their instructions; that he had the worst opinion of the people of Norfolk; and that he wished to be permitted to attend his private affairs, and to see his family. Capt. Scott, who is among the officers of this corps, in a letter to Capt. Southwell, says, that they have got possession of the most horrid place he ever beheld, to wit, Norfolk; and that the service is harder than he ever saw before.

By letters from Gen. Schuyler it is asserted, that Col. Easton has taken the vessels bound from Montreal to Quebec, under the command of Carleton or Prescott. That the brig Gasper, together with seven sloops and schooners, which are taken as above, had on board brigadier-general Prescott, Capt. William Dunbar, major of Brigade, Capt. William Gamble, quarter-master-general, captains Anstruther, Swan, Crawford, and Harris, lieutenant Cleveland, ensigns Gamble, Leslie, McDonald, and Dr. Beaumont, who are also taken, and 150 privates, most of them of the 26th regiment, and the artillery. There were on board the vessels two cannon of nine, and two of six pounders; thirty cannon cartridges, and forty-five ball; three barrels of powder, 2380 musket cartridges, eight chests of arms, 200 pair of shoes, a quantity of intrenching tools, 760 barrels of flour, 20 of biscuits, 675 barrels of beef, and 376 firkins of butter.

Letters from Georgia take notice, that South-Carolina is involved in all the horrors of civil war; that Col. Cunningham, a back settler, had erected the Royal Standard in that province; and that he had defeated the detachment of the Provincial army that was sent out against him.

Letters from North-Carolina seem to confirm the above intelligence, and add, that two persons, inhabitants of that province, against whom informations had been lodged for having spoken against the proceedings of the Continental Congress, had been apprehended, and carried to South-Carolina, and there confined in goal; of which the North-Carolina Convention being apprized, Resolved, That no person taken up in their province shall be carried out of it for the future.

Having already given a general account of the preparations making by the Provincials for resistance, the following list of forces to be employed against them will shew on which side the probability of success may be estimated:

Wednesday Jan. 31.

THE house met, pursuant to adjournment from January the 8th instant.

Mr. Hellen presented heads of a bill to regulate the collection of his majesty's revenue.

The order being read for the house to go into a committee on heads of a bill for the more effectual securing the payment of rents, and preventing frauds by tenants, Mr. Bennet, who brought in the same, moved, that the consideration of said bill be postponed till the 2d of August next.

Thursday, Feb. 1.] The house resolved into a committee, (Mr. Bourke jun. in the chair) on heads of a bill for regulating the work house and foundling hospital.

In the act now subsisting, an additional tax of four pence in the pound on the rent of all houses above ten pounds a year, according as rated for minister's money, was laid on the inhabitants of Dublin, for the support of the said hospital, which tax expires on the 24th of June next. In these heads of a bill a clause was inserted to continue this tax for two years more.

Mr. Barry Barry said there were no resolutions entered into in the committee of supply and ways and means whereon to found a continuance of this local tax. He therefore hoped gentlemen would not so far break through the parliamentary barriers against profusion, as to agree to raise any money on the subject, but what had gone through the constitutional modes.

Mr. Redmond Morris added to the above reasons, that this tax was very burthenome to the inhabitants of Dublin, and hoped it would not be continued to maintain children brought from all parts of the kingdom.

Mr. Dixie Coddington, (member for Dunleer,) replied, that though he should not attempt to controvert the justice of parliamentary mode, yet he must observe, that two thirds of the children in the hospital were put there by the inhabitants of the city of Dublin. However the clause was rejected, without a division; and having gone through the heads of a bill, the report was ordered to be received tomorrow.

The house then went into a committee (Mr. Attiwell Wood in the chair) on heads of a bill to prevent Frauds by tenants, which had been ordered to be re-committed, and went through the same.

Friday, Feb. 2.] Mr. Bourke, jun. reported from the committee, on heads of a bill for amending an act relative to the foundling hospital and Work-house. The amendments made by the committee, to receive no children above two years of age; and to discontinue after the 24th of June next, the additional four pence in the pound on the rents paid by the householders of this city, for the support of the said hospital, were agreed to by the house, and Mr. Dixie Coddington was ordered to carry the same to the lord lieutenant.

The house resolved into a committee, (Mr.

jeant Hamilton in the chair,) on heads of a bill to regulate the profession and practice of Surgery. Mr. Bugh said if these heads of a bill were passed into a law it would detriment the practice of Surgery, not improve it; for it would throw all the business into a few hands, make certificates of abilities, not the purchase of merit, but of money; and render it impossible for those who could not pay a large fee to have any assistance.

Mr. Redmond Morris added, that it would deprive Barbers from bleeding and drawing teeth, which would be an injury to them, and a hurt to the poor, who could not afford to send for a Surgeon.

General Hunt "Welsh moved that the Chairman should leave the chair, which no one opposed, and he left the chair accordingly.

Mr. Veley, presented heads of a bill to amend the act for badging beggars and maintaining the poor, as far as relates to the county and city of Limerick.

Tuesday, Feb. 6.] The house went into a committee, (Mr. Charles Smyth in the chair) on heads of a bill to amend the act for badging beggars, and providing for the poor, as far as relates to the county of Limerick, and city of Limerick, and went into the same; which were immediately reported, to be sent to the lord lieutenant.

When the speaker had resumed the chair, Mr. Robert French took notice of the proclamation issued by the privy council last Saturday, in consequence of an order of the privy council of Great Britain, laying an embargo on the exportation of all kinds of provision from Ireland, except to Great Britain, &c. which he said was a great hurt to commerce, and was an assuming of a power by the British privy council to suspend the laws of this kingdom.

Mr. Redmond Morris spoke to the same effect.

Sir John Blaquiére observed, that this embargo was no novelty, and was justified by the necessity of taking care that Great Britain should benefit of the produce of the country, rather than strangers.

Mr. Bushe said the circumstances attending that embargo made it a novelty, for when a like embargo was laid, it had some apologies. It was laid during a recess of parliament, and in a time of scarcity, when even a famine was threatened; whereas this is in a time of great plenty, when the parliament is sitting, and is equally against both the constitution and commerce of this kingdom.—He thought the best mode of taking notice of this, would be by ordering the grand committee of trade to sit tomorrow.

Sir John Blaquiére replied, the gentleman was mistaken in the fact; for the embargo he mentioned was laid on the 26th of November 1767, and appealed to the journals of the house that the parliament was then sitting.

Mr. Robert French insisted, that nothing but absolute necessity could justify the breach of the constitution; and was of opinion it ought not to be referred to the committee of trade, but was worthy the consideration of the committee of the whole house.

Mr. Barry Barry was of the same opinion, and added, that when the most urgent necessity and greatest scarcity induced the privy council of England to lay an embargo on corn, &c. in the administration of lord Chatham, he was so sensible of the illegality of that step, though warranted by the great law of necessity, that as soon as the parliament met, an act was passed to indemnify those who acted under that proclamation. He therefore moved, that the proper officers do lay before the house the proclamation issued last Saturday by the lord lieutenant and privy council; which was carried.

Sir Edward Newenham observed, that it was reported that some considerable pensions had lately been placed on the establishment, which could ill bear any addition, therefore he moved.—

That a return be made of such pensions as have been placed either on the civil or military establishment of this kingdom, from the 29th of last September, to the 6th of this month—carried.

The order was then read for going into a committee on the heads of the revenue bill; previous to which Mr. Morris presented a petition of the brewers of this city, setting forth that they had heard there was a clause in the revenue bill, to enact that no brewer of ale should brew small beer, and no small beer brewer should brew ale: which, if passed, would ruin the brewery of this kingdom.—He moved that this petition be referred to a committee, and that witnesses might be examined to prove the allegations; which were both carried.

The committee then sat, (Mr. Hellen in the chair.)

The clause relative to the brewers being read, Mr. Morris opposed it, as hurtful equally to the agriculture, the revenue, and the brewery of this kingdom.

Mr. Berresford in his reply, to the objections made to this clause of useful regulation, recapitulated what he formerly said in the committee of ways and means, relative to the many frauds in the brewery, of the brewers mixing small beer with ale to cheat the crown of the excise, after they had paid for the greatest part under the denomination of small beer. Of their brewing at secret and improper hours, and frequently thereby interrupting or overhastening the fermentation requisite to form a good and wholesome malt liquor. He said it could be no hardship to brewers, to have two shillings on every thirty two gallons, as this clause provided nothing should be sold as ale, under sixteen shillings a barrel. He made several very accurate calculations, on the brewery of Cork, which fully proved all his assertions: And clearly shewed that the decay of the brewery trade did not arise from the importation of porter, but from their brewing a beer, which could hardly be drank. For the increased importation of porter, did not exceed sixty thousand barrels in a year, whilst the home home brewery had decreased one hundred and ninety thousand barrels; so that the increase of the one, not having, in any degree, compensated for the decrease of the other, could not be its cause.

Mr. Barry Barry opposed the clause, as did Sir Lucius O'Brien; though he confessed that brewers might get the whole strength of the malt, without brewing small beer; and this was the practice in London, where the brewers were separate.

Mr. Berresford answered; and Mr. Guinness, a brewer, was without to be examined. But Mr. Malone observed it was too late to enter into a course of examination; and therefore the progress on these heads of a bill was deferred till to-morrow.

Sir Edward Newenham observed, that the legislature has very wisely passed an act, empowering the speaker, during the adjournment or prorogation of parliament, to issue his writ to fill up such vacancies as might then happen; that the intention of the house in passing that law, was to prevent jobbing, riots and the expences usually attending long contested elections; that in order to preserve the spirit of that law, he would (if those more nearly concerned did not) in a few days, move to have those vacancies, which happened during the late recess, filled up.

Mr. Monk Mason wished that such motion would not be made so near the eve of a general election.

Sir Edward Newenham said, he wished to see the nation always fully and faithfully represented, and therefore continued to adhere to his first opinion.

Wednesday, Feb. 7.] The house in a committee, (Mr. William Pennefather in the chair,) went through the heads of a bill to amend the act passed in the 13th and 14th years of his majesty's reign to repair the road leading from the town of Timoho through the city of Cashel, and into the town of Tipperary. Mr. Pennefather reported, and was ordered to carry them to the lord lieutenant.

The house resolved into a committee, (Mr. Hellen in the chair,) on the heads of the bill for the collecting his majesty's revenue.

The clause to prohibit the same brewer from making both ale and small beer, but to separate the trades, was read.

Mr. Morres, who had opposed this clause, and presented a petition from the brewers of Dublin against it, desired Mr. Arthur Guinness might be called in, and examined, which he was for near four hours, the same questions being repeatedly put to him from all parts of the house.

Mr. Guinness very clearly showed, that if that clause passed into a law, it would be impossible for either the ale or small beer brewery to exist in Dublin; and that what ever frauds had been practised in Cork, in mixing small beer with ale to defraud the revenue, that was not practised in Dublin. It appeared also from him, that the sale of the small beer enabled the brewer to sell the ale at the usual price; but if deprived of that benefit, the ale must be of a lower quality to be thus afforded, as the profit on the ale would not be a living profit to the brewer: and as to small beer breweries he did not think any one would be set up; and no one brewer in Dublin brewed small beer only—Mr. Bomford, indeed, made small beer; but he was a distiller, and got the small beer from his low worts.

The difference of the gallon, by which the hereditary revenue and the additional duties were levied, caused great confusion in the examination, and much cavilling about the size of the barrel. Mr. Hugh Hughes, inspector general of the excise and licences, was called to ascertain the size, and the duty; and was also examined on what he thought would ensue from dividing the two branches of trade; but his answers tended rather to corroborate than contradict the evidence of Mr. Guinness.

The further consideration of this clause was postponed till to-morrow.

Thursday, Feb. 8.] The house in a committee (Mr. Neville in the chair) went through heads of a bill for the more effectually preventing the plundering of ships and vessels that may be wrecked or stranded on the coasts of this kingdom: which Mr. Neville immediately reported, and was ordered to wait on the lord lieutenant therewith.

The house then went into a committee, Mr. Neville again in the chair and finished the consideration of the heads of a bill for establishing a militia for the better defence of this kingdom.

Mr. French moved to have the proclamation for the embargo read; which being done, he urged the necessity there was for the house to take a proper cognizance of this breach of the constitution.

Col. Brown said it was absolutely necessary, to prevent Irish provision from being sent to the aid of the American rebels; and that fully justified the embargo.

Sir Lucius O'Brien said it was a bad method of inducing the Irish to join Great Britain against America, to begin by infringing our constitution.

Mr. Barry said this proclamation might be proved illegal, from the recital in the English act for indemnifying those who had acted under the English proclamation for prohibiting the exportation of corn, in the administration of lord Chatham, which declared that embargo to be illegal, though an absolute necessity might be pleaded in its favour.

Mr. Morres spoke for referring the proclamation to the consideration of the house; and Mr. Langrish said it was yet to be moved that it was illegal. Mr. Bushe, Mr. Dillon, and Mr. Ogle urged strongly taking a proper notice of this embargo. Mr. French moved that the house would take this proclamation into consideration on Monday se'nnight, and that the house should be called over on Saturday se'nnight; and Mr. Barry moved that the speaker should send circular letters, ordering the attendance of the members:—All which were carried with but one dissenting voice, viz. col. Brown.

Sir Edward Newenham took notice, that there were several regiments under orders for embarkation; that he wished to know what force would remain for the security of this kingdom after that embarkation took place; in order to come to that knowledge, which he thought absolutely necessary, he moved, "that the proper officer should lay before the house an account of what regiments are now under orders for embarkation, specifying the number of men in each regiment, and likewise the number of effective men now in the kingdom." By this motion, he thought the real force left in the kingdom would be known.

The house went into a committee, and spent some time on the revenue bill, on the clause for dividing the breweries, without coming to any determination, no one question being put, Mr. Hughes was again examined, as were a surveyor of excise, and Mr. Thwaites, an eminent brewer, who chiefly concurred in the evidence of Mr. Guinnes's.

Friday, Feb. 9.] The clause for separating the branches of brewery, of ale and small beer, came again under consideration, in the committee of the whole house, (Mr. Hellen in the chair) on the revenue bill.

Mr. Berresford urged the necessity of this separation, to prevent frauds, which had been proved not to exist in the Dublin brewery, though they had some time ago in that of Cork. He read, from numbers of papers, a multiplicity of calculations, estimates, accounts, and returns; and deduced very abstruse arguments from very complex observations, for above an hour and three quarters.

Sir Lucius O'Brien, the constant patron of the Irish brewers, shewed the destruction this measure would bring on that trade, unless the price of both ale and small beer were raised; the last of which could not be done, now the committee of ways and means was closed.

Mr. Barry Barry, Mr. Bushe, and Mr. Redmond Morris, were of the same opinion.

Sir John Blaquiere said the measure was certainly useful and necessary; but as the time had elapsed for establishing a higher price on small beer, he thought it should be deferred to another session, when the whole of the scheme might be adopted.

The question was then put on the clauses, which passed in the negative. The speaker resumed the chair, and adjourned.

Saturday, Feb. 10.] The house went into a committee, and made some farther progress on the heads of the revenue bill.

Monday, Feb. 12.] Mr. Fortescue presented heads of a bill for encouraging the cultivation, and for the better preservation of trees, roots, plants, and shrubs, which were read, and ordered to be committed on Wednesday next.

The house resolved into a committee, colonel Burton in the chair, on heads of a bill to enable the commissioners of the barrack board, and their successors to sell several estates in the lands whereon barracks have been built, that are gone to decay or shall hereafter become useless, and also to sell the materials of such decayed barracks. The same were gone through, reported, and sent to the lord lieutenant.

The house resolved into a committee for the further consideration of the heads of the bill for the improvement of his majesty's revenue.

A clause for prohibiting any person to lend, or let to hire, any brewing pan, keeve, or other utensil, under forfeiture of the said vessels, and five pounds penalty, was presented by Mr. Wood, who, with Mr. Berresford, Mr. Mason, Mr. Langrishe, and Mr. Waller, urged the necessity of this measure, to prevent clandestine brewing for sale.

Sir Lucius O'Brien, Mr. Morris, Mr. Dillon, &c. opposed it, as it might deprive poor people of the opportunity of brewing any malt liquor for their own use, unless they had utensils of their own.

Sir Lucius moved to add after the word, person, the words, in cities and corporate towns. On this the committee divided.

Ayes 21; Noes 36.

Tellers, Sir Lucius O'Brien, Mr. Wood.

It was then moved to expunge the word, lend. The committee divided, whether the word lend should stand part of that paragraph.

Ayes 42; Noes 21.

Tellers, Mr. Waller, Mr. Dillon.

The question was put to expunge the words, Keeve or other utensil, which was carried.

The committee divided again, on the whole clause.

Ayes 39; Noes 19.

Tellers, Mr. Mason, Mr. Barry Barry.

The further consideration of those heads of a bill was deferred till to-morrow.

In the bill of supply passed this session it was recited, that twelve thousand troops should be kept in this kingdom, for the defence thereof, at all times, except in case of invasion or actual rebellion in Great Britain or Ireland. Sir Archibald Acheson said some doubts had arisen concerning sending men abroad; to obviate which, he moved for leave to bring in heads of a bill for explaining the said act; seconded by colonel Ross.

Mr. Barry said he hoped the gentleman did not intend to explain the same.

Sir Archibald replied, if troops were to go abroad, it was better they should go in consequence of, than in opposition to the law.

They were ordered accordingly, and the house adjourned till to-morrow.

Tuesday, Feb. 13.] Sir Archibald Acheson presented heads of a bill for explaining the bill of supply passed this session, relative to the address for sparing four thousand troops, which were read and committed for to-morrow.

The house in a committee, made a further progress on the heads of the bill for improving the revenue.

Review of New Publications.

ARTICLE I.

To the Rev. Dr. Richard Price.

SIR,

AS, in the method in which I have chosen to address you, it behoves me to be as close and concise as the occasion will permit, I shall not proceed in the regular and methodical manner of a dissertator, to expose the fallacy of the several items of your elaborate Charge against, not only the government of your country, but your country itself. It is a shrewd and just observation of a writer, from whom you appear to have borrowed many of your political maxims, that there is nothing more problematical and doubtful than the sincerity of those Cosmopolites, who affect a general regard for others, and an universal love of mankind. If a man loves not his own house and country, his pretended love for families and countries he never saw, may be justly suspected. The most extensive circle of social love has its centre at home; agreeable to that apt and most beautiful simile of the poet's,

Self-love still serves the virtuous mind to wake,
As the small pebble stirs the peaceful lake;
The centre mov'd, a circle strait succeeds,
Another still, and still another spreads;
Friend, parent, neighbour, first it will embrace
His country next, and next all human race.

"The Englishman who is not a Briton, and a true friend to this his native island, may declaim long enough before men of discernment will believe him sincere in his professed friendship for the American Continent. You wish to throw off national prepossession, (though to impose on the populace you call it national prejudice) and own it is difficult to do so. It is, indeed, difficult for people to divest themselves of that with which they are not invested.—Were I not a true Englishman, had I not 'an inseparable attachment to my native country, did I not feel for the interest, the honour, the happiness of Great Britain, I might speculatively pursue your argument, and possibly admire that airy superstructure, you have built on the most imaginary foundation. It is, as an Englishman therefore, I charge you with acting inconsistent with the love of your country; and what aggravates the charge, as a preacher of the gospel of peace, of behaving in a manner unbecoming the character of a christian minister. Admitting, for a moment, the truth of your speculative politics, you cannot but know, what, in fact, you confess, that this critical conjuncture is, by no means, a proper time for divulging and diffusing them. You know, you have owned, government has gone too far, honourably to recede. Nay, I will venture to say, there is not a man, deserving the name of an Englishman, who can wish, it should, at such a crisis, recede; however ready he may be to exclaim with you, "De-tested be the measures that have brought us into it;" or to curse the war that is the consequence. You say, indeed, "A retreat is not impracticable." But have you so little regard for the credit, for the interest of your mother country, as to wish she should make a dishonourable retreat, and that from her rebellious children?—Grant it has been her cruelty (though perhaps it would be more properly termed her mistaken kindness) that has provoked them to rebellion, which party does it become; in such circumstances, to retreat? When both are equally in the wrong, is it the parent or child that should give up the point?—If the means of accommodation only are in dispute, and political cunning cannot adjust punctilios, why not have recourse to the efficacious expedients of natural simplicity? why not take the readiest method of solving the gordian knot? why not dissever at a single stroke, what would take too much time to unravel? why not adopt the salutary scheme of a rescinder? Dean Tucker's project would injure both the honour and interest of this country less than yours.—But, I had forgot, you are devoted to the Americans, and the honour and interest of this country is wish you out of the question. Under these circumstances, Sir, what is your reverence but, like a certain arch methodist, a sower of sedition? I might go farther, and ask, what are you but a traitor to that country, whose interests and whose glory you are bound by all the ties of natural, civil, and religious liberty, to espouse and support? I have as despicable an opinion of a mere attachment to the natale solum as you or any man; but I must repeat, that I think the man, who loves not his native country, can love no other. It is an easy matter for habitual insensibility to assume the appearance of natural meekness, and for those who neither love nor hate any body, to seem wonderfully tender and affectionate to every body. I mean no personal reflection, Doctor, but I have known very ingenious men of this stamp, who so far from being under the government of any ruling passion, have had all their passions so much under their own rule and government, that they have been indifferent, calm, and cool enough to calculate, to the hundredth part of a farthing, the pecuniary advantages which individuals might reap from the misfortunes, the miseries, the murder of their fellow-creatures.—Such men may speculate, unaffected and at their ease, on subjects; the discussion of which affects others with anxiety and horror. I will, endeavour, however, to lay aside that passion and prejudice which grow to me, to divest myself as much as possible of compassion for the Americans and that love to my country, which I too sensibly feel, to need any other proof of its propriety, and as calmly as I can, to discuss a point or two with you, in which, I think your argument is not less defective in reason, than destitute of sentiment.

In the first place, you will give me leave to say that your general argumentation on the subject of civil liberty is as futile and frivolous, on the present occasion, as it is fantastical and formal. Admitting the truth of your levelling principle, that in a state of nature individuals are equal, I deny that such a state ever had, or can have, existence. Man is naturally a social being, and the rudiments of civil government were originally laid in the patriarchal dominion of the father of a family. A monarchical, and not a republican, form of government appears, therefore, to have suggested the primitive idea of social subordination. But,

Let fools for forms of government contend,
That which is best administer'd is best.

Private men may be as arrant slaves, and public magistrates as despotic tyrants under an aristocratical or democratical government as under the rule of an absolute monarch. Will you maintain, in defiance of known experience, that in Holland, Geneva, Genoa, Venice and a hundred other free states, as they are called, the subject is less restrained or oppressed than in France, Denmark, Sweden and other despotic states?—You may declaim, indeed, as others have done before you, that “Liberty is the soil where the arts and sciences have flourished, and the more free a state has been the more the powers of the human mind have been drawn forth into action.” You may admire “the lustre, with which the ancient free states of Greece shine in the annals of the world;” and contrast it with “the state of the same countries under the great Turk.” But this is trite and puerile. I own, with you, that a dark and savage tyranny stifles the efforts of genius, while the depressed and fettered mind loses its spirit and dignity. But this is owing to the quality and complexion of the times, more than the form of government. Is a sultan of the East or an emperor of Morocco a more absolute monarch than a king of France or Prussia? Did arts and sciences flourish less under the tyranny of the Cæsars than during the boasted state of the freedom of the Roman republic? Did they ever flourish more, or were the powers of genius ever more successively exerted than under Leo the tenth and Louis the fourteenth? If in the support of liberty, the social happiness of mankind is to be consulted, as depending on the improvement of the mind and the exertion of the powers of human genius, we shall regard the political use generally made of the terms liberty and slavery as vague and contemptible.—Let us, for instance, see what use your political reverence hath made of these terms. “A state you say is free when it is governed by its own will.”—And “In every free state, EVERY MAN is his own LEGISLATOR.”—Such, indeed, is the improvement made in every branch of human knowledge, in this age of invention and discovery, that I have heard of “every man his own broker—every man his own doctor—every man his own lawyer—but it was reserved for the superlative ingenuity of Dr. Price to discover that in any state every man is his own LEGISLATOR! Admitting, for argument-sake, that does not appear to be true in fact, that government originated with the people, that the supreme power be actually lodged in the hands of the populace, whose sovereign will is law. Can every individual have more than a proportional share in the general will of the whole? And how small a share is this in populous states? How small a man's share of civil liberty, if it be no more than he shares in common with millions of his fellow-countrymen? How little worth contending for is this liberty of acting according to one's own will? How little removed from slavery is that liberty in him who possesses but the hundred millionth part of the legislature of this country? You, Doctor, are a calculator, and perhaps can tell. Not that I mean to depreciate the blessing of civil liberty; but I contend that it depends more on the power of acting according to the rules of right reason, and political prudence; than on the power of acting according to one's own will.—I will not even deny that in the reduction of the rebellious Americans, they must necessarily be subjugated in some degree to a state of servitude; but, at the same time, I must subscribe to the truth of what is observed by that staunch friend to all kinds of liberty, the author of the Social Compact; when he says, “There are some circumstances so critically unhappy that men cannot preserve their own liberty but at the expence of the liberty of others.” If this be true of individuals, how much more true and applicable to the mother country and her colonies?—You are for dividing the sovereign authority of the former, and making her share it with the latter. But the same writer tells us “the sovereign authority is simple and uniform, it cannot be divided “without destroying it.” You also pretend that the general will may be represented. He denies it, and justly ridicules that ideal sovereignty and imaginary freedom, which is lodged in the hands of representatives.—“The English nation, says he, in spite of their boasted liberty, are free no longer than during the dissolution of parliament, and while they are choosing their representatives; an interval of freedom which they so shamefully abuse that they richly deserve to lose it.”—What would he say were he now to attend the committees, sitting on the contested elections in consequence of Grenville's act? Would he not shudder with horror at the wickedness and profligacy both of the electors and elected? And would he not declare it the highest piece of impudence and presumption for a people so enslaved by principle and so debauched by corruption to affect to call themselves free? In a word, the qualification Acts laid the axe to the root of patriotism and public virtue, and, of course of civil liberty, in this country. An act, by which which virtus post nummos is a maxim established by the authority of the legislature; an act, by which a man of six or three hundred a year is declared to be honest and less corruptible than another of less income, must naturally tend to the discountenance of all public spirit and national virtue. It has, besides, this impolitic and immoral tendency, an immediate tendency to bribery and corruption, by admitting no candidates but such as are qualified to purchase the votes of their constituents. Till this qualification act be repealed, every thing that is, or can be done under the supposed salutary influence of Grenville's act, will serve only to expose the wickedness of the parties; as it will be ineffectual to the stopping that tide of corruption which, like a deluge, hath overwhelmed this sinking land. The very pretence for this qualification act was frivolous; it was supposed that men of middling circumstances had less probity and were more liable to temptation than men of opulent fortunes: but whoever knows any thing of mankind, knows that affluence is the most dangerous corrupter of the heart; that it serves more to increase our artificial wants than natural necessities.—It is this general corruption, reduced into a system of late years, that hath reduced the constitution of this country to that skeleton, which is daily exhibited as a model of political wisdom. Had that ingenious visionary, De Lolme, brought over a marmotte in a box, like other Switzerland itinerants, he could not have afforded a more amusing a more futile entertainment to superficial understandings, than he has displayed in his Constitution de L'Angleterre.

England never possessed such a political constitution, unless in the writings of such visionaries as himself; or, if it did, it has long since been rotten to the core, its vitals have been exhausted, and its flesh hath wasted to the bone. Under these circumstances, to what purpose is the application of the reveries of idle theory to a desperate disease? The mother is in actual labour, the throes of delivery rend her whole frame—the too-robust and over-grown child is struggling in vain to burst her womb and get free.—It is an unnatural birth;—shall the parent perish to save the child? and will you, doctor, humanely lend a hand to rip the belly that bore?—No, if human skill or divine providence afford no help, let the parent live whatever be the fate of her offspring!—But this, you will say, is declamation. It is so, but I trust it is apt and pertinent: at least it is equally so with those pompous nothings, with which your favourite great man hath so repeatedly amused the gaping crowd, that has so often looked up to him as the deliverer of this country, while he was only raising up its vain-glory, to plunge it the deeper into the gulph of ruin. A word or two with you, on the subject of this great man, and I take my leave. You speak of him as a friend to America as well as to Britain. I, who am not to be deceived by March, 1776.

words judge from actions: and, if those truly speak the man, he is no friend to either; it is owing to this political god of your idolatry that the stamp-act was passed and repealed. Lord C——m might have prevented both—he prevented neither—he chose to be passive in the one case and active in the other. You lament and say every friend to Britain must deplore his ill state of health, at this awful moment of public danger. For my own part, I can sympathise with him as a man, because I am subject to the same malady; but as a friend to Britain, I should rather rejoice that he is prevented from blowing up the embers of discord and embarrassing those councils he cannot assist, were I not persuaded that so little attention is now paid him, that his tropes and figures would be perfectly harmless. It is to just as little purpose, doctor, you adopt the words you heard him apply, in a great assembly, to enforce the persuasion that the mother country, should retract freely, speedily and magnanimously. Fine words! “RECTITUDE IS DIGNITY. OPPRESSION ONLY IS MEANNESS; AND JUSTICE, HONOUR.” If these expressions had any meaning, and were not spoken with a mere view of exhibiting ore retundo, the oratorical abilities of the speaker, they are a libel (as is your whole letter) on the legislature as well as the government of this country. They charge the latter, at whose head is majesty itself, with having oppressed, and dealt unjustly by the Americans, and, in so doing, of having forfeited the honour and dignity of the nation; which they can restore only by retracting; he and you say magnanimously, but I will venture to say, even the Americans themselves would call it meanly. But, be this as it may, in the present distressing dilemma, into which the mother-country is brought, no matter by what means; when it is destruction to go forward and ruin to recede, surely it is criminal in individuals to disseminate discontent in spreading the rancour of mutual reproach, and widening a breach, perhaps already irreparable. Let me add that your putting up your fervent prayers that it may not be so, would be more becoming your character as a man, a Briton and a Christian, than the publication of either particular remonstrances or general speculations, that, were they true as they are melancholy, can only serve to promote dissatisfaction and induce despair.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.

II. The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. By Edward Gibben, Esq. Vol. I. 4to.

Among the many valuable publications, that do honour to our country in the present age, we may rank the history before us, in the first class. To Britons at the present juncture, it affords a peculiarly melancholy prospect; the glory of this nation, having so lately reached its zenith, and being now apparently on the decline, from causes not dissimilar to those, which brought on the ruin of Rome; domestic corruption and distant revolt!

Mr. Gibbon, in a very modest preface, apologizes for presenting a first volume only of a work; which he scarcely flatters himself with being ever happy enough to complete. The outlines of it are, indeed, extensive and do great credit to the designer, whether they are filled up by so able a colourist or not. The nature and limits of his general plan, he gives in few words, as follows:

“The memorable series of revolutions, which, in the course of about thirteen centuries, gradually undermined, and at length destroyed, the solid fabric of Roman greatness, may, with some propriety, be divided into the three following periods:

“I. The first of these periods may be traced from the age of Trajan and Antoninus, when the Roman monarchy having attained its full strength and maturity, began to verge towards its decline; and will extend to the subversion of the western empire, by the barbarians of Germany and Scythia, the rude ancestors of the most polished nations of modern Europe. This extraordinary revolution, which subjected Rome to the power of a Gothic conqueror, was completed about the beginning of the sixth century.

“II. The second period of the Decline and Fall of Rome, may be supposed to commence with the reign of Justinian, who by his laws, as well as by his victories, restored a transient splendor to the Eastern Empire. It will comprehend the invasion of Italy by the Lombards; the conquest of the Asiatic and African provinces by the Arabs, who embraced the religion of Mahomet: the revolt of the Roman people against the feeble princes of Constantinople, and the elevation of Charlemagne, who, in the year eight hundred, established the second, or German Empire of the west.

“III. The last and longest of these periods includes about seven centuries and a half; from the revival of the Western Empire, till the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, and the extinction of a degenerate race of princes, who continued to assume the titles of Cæsar and Augustus, after their dominions were contracted to the limits of a single city; in which the language, as well as the manners, of the ancient Romans, had been long since forgotten. The writer who should undertake to relate the events of this period, would find himself obliged to enter into the general history of the Crusades, as far as they contribute to the ruin of the Greek empire; and he would scarcely be able to restrain his curiosity from making some enquiry into the state of the city of Rome, during the darkness and confusion of the middle ages.”

Such is Mr. Gibbon's general plan, of which he has executed in the present volume but a small part; commencing with the age of the Antonines, and ending with that of Constantine. We shall select a specimen of our author's style and manner of narration and observation.

There is not, to be met with, in history, perhaps a more singular event, than the public sale of the empire of the world, as that of Rome might be called, by public auction to a private citizen. Our author's relation of this event is properly introduced by a very sensible and judicious observation on the civil danger of military power.

“The power of the sword is more sensibly felt in an extensive monarchy, than in a small community. It has been calculated by the ablest politicians, that no state, without being soon exhausted, can maintain above the hundredth part of its members in arms and idleness. But although this relative proportion may be uniform, its influence over the rest of the society will vary according to the degree of its positive strength. The advantages of military science and discipline cannot be exerted, unless a proper number of soldiers are united into one body, and actuated by one soul. With a handful of men, such an union would be ineffectual; with an unwieldy host, it would be impracticable; and the powers of the machine would be alike destroyed by the extreme minuteness, or the excessive weight of its springs. To illustrate this observation we need only reflect, that there is no superiority of natural strength, artificial weapons, or acquired skill, which could enable one man to keep in constant subjection a hundred of his fellow-creatures: the tyrant of a single town, or a small district, would soon discover that an hundred armed followers were a weak defence against ten thousand peasants or citizens, but a hundred thousand well-disciplined soldiers will command, with despotic sway, ten millions of subjects; and a body of ten or fifteen thousand guards will strike terror into the most numerous populace that ever crowded the streets of an immense capital.

“The Praetorian bands, whose licentious fury was the first symptom and cause of the decline of the Roman empire, scarcely amounted to the last mentioned number*. They derived their institution from Augustus. The crafty tyrant, sensible that laws might colour, but that arms alone could maintain, his usurped dominion, had gradually formed this powerful body of guards in constant readiness to protect his person, to awe the senate, and either to prevent or to crush the first motions of rebellion. He distinguished these favoured troops by a double pay, and superior privileges; but, as their formidable

N O T E.

* They were originally nine or ten thousand men (for Tacitus and Dion are not agreed upon the subject) divided into as many cohorts. Vitellius increased them to sixteen thousand, and as far as we can learn from inscriptions, they never afterwards sunk much below that number. See Lipsius de magnitudine Romanâ, i. 5.

aspect would at once have alarmed and irritated the Roman people, three cohorts only were stationed in the capital; whilst the remainder was dispersed in the adjacent towns of Italy †. But after fifty years of peace and servitude, Tiberius ventured on a decisive measure, which for ever rivetted the fetters of his country. Under the fair pretences of relieving Italy from the heavy burthen of military quarters, and of introducing a stricter discipline among the guards, he assembled them at Rome, in a permanent camp ‡, which was fortified with skilful care §, and placed on a commanding situation ||.

“ Such formidable servants are always necessary, but often fatal to the throne of despotism. By thus introducing the Prætorian guards, as it were, into the palace and the senate, the emperors taught them to perceive their own strength, and the weakness of the civil government; to view the vices of their masters with familiar contempt, and to lay aside that reverential awe, which distance only, and mystery, can preserve, towards an imaginary power. In the luxurious idleness of an opulent city, their pride was nourished by the sense of their irresistible weight; nor was it possible to conceal from them, that the person of the sovereign, the authority of the senate, the public treasure, and the seat of empire, were all in their hands. To divert the Prætorian bands from these dangerous reflections, the firmest and best established princes were obliged to mix blandishments with commands, rewards with punishments, to flatter their pride, indulge their pleasures, connive at their irregularities, and to purchase their precarious faith by a liberal donative: which, since the elevation of Claudius was exacted as a legal claim, on the accession of every new emperor *.

“ The advocates of the guards endeavoured to justify by arguments, the power which they asserted by arms; and to maintain that, according to the best principles of the constitution.

stitution, their consent was essentially necessary in the appointment of an emperor. The election of consuls, of generals, and of magistrates, however it had been recently usurped by the senate, was the ancient and undoubted right of the Roman people †. But where was the Roman people to be found? Not surely amongst the mixed multitude of slaves and strangers that filled the streets of Rome; a servile populace, as devoid of spirit as destitute of property. The defenders of the state, selected from the flower of the Italian youth ‡, and trained in the exercise of arms and virtue, were the genuine representatives of the people, and the best entitled to elect the military chief of the republic. These assertions, however, defective in reason, became unanswerable, when the fierce Prætorians increased their weight, by throwing like the barbarian conqueror of Rome, their swords into the scale §.

“ The Prætorians had violated the sanctity of the throne, by the atrocious murder of Pertinax; they dishonoured the majesty of it by their subsequent conduct. The camp was without a leader, for even the præfect Lætus, who had excited the tempest, prudently declined the public indignation. Amidst the wild disorder, Sulpicianus, the emperor's father-in-law, and governor of the city, who had been sent to the camp on the first alarm of mutiny, was endeavouring to calm the fury of the multitude, when he was silenced by the clamorous return of the murderers bearing on a lance the head of Pertinax. Though history has accustomed us to observe every principle, and every passion yield to the imperious dictates of ambition, it is scarcely credible that, in these moments of horror, Sulpicianus should have aspired to ascend a throne streaming with the blood of so near a relation, and so excellent a prince. He had already begun to use the only effectual argument, and to treat for the imperial dignity; but the more prudent of the Prætorians, apprehensive that, in this private contract, they should not obtain a just price for so valuable a commodity, ran out upon the ramparts, and with a loud voice, proclaimed that the Roman world was to be disposed of to the best bidder by public auction ||.

"This infamous offer, the most insolent excess of military licence, diffused an universal grief, shame, and indignation throughout the city. It reached at length the ears of Didius Julianus, a wealthy senator, who, regardless of the public calamities, was indulging himself in the luxury of the table *. His wife and his daughter, his freemen and his parasites, easily convinced him that he deserved the throne, and earnestly conjured him to embrace so favourable an opportunity. The vain old man hastened to the Prætorian camp, where Sulpicianus was still in treaty with the guards; and began to bid against him from the foot of the rampart. The unworthy negotiation was transacted by faithful emissaries, who passed alternately from one candidate to the other, and acquainted each of them, with the offers of his rival. Sulpicianus had already promised a donative of five thousand drachms (above one hundred and sixty pounds) to each soldier; when Julian, eager for the prize, rose at once to the sum of six thousand two hundred and fifty drachms, or upwards of two hundred pounds sterling. The gates of the camp were instantly thrown open to the purchaser; he was declared emperor, and received an oath of allegiance from the soldiers, who retained humanity enough to stipulate that he should pardon and forget the competition of Sulpicianus."

The critical reader will perceive that the language of this history, is in general simple, nervous and masterly. We meet, now and then, nevertheless with a disgusting gallicism, and the writer's periods, after the manner of the modern French, are frequently too short; which gives the style an air of pertness and flippancy.

As literary Reviewers, we must not forbear to mention that the author has printed the notes to his work, separate from the text; we suppose to prevent the reader's being interrupted in the perusal of the latter, if the former were printed at the bottom of the page. But, though, where the notes run long, this may be expedient, we think, where they are in general so short, as in the present case, the figures of reference serve equally to interrupt and raise the curiosity of the reader, without readily gratifying it: which in most cases might be done without diverting his attention from the narrative, or taking his eye off the page.

III. A Dissertation on the Duty of Mercy, and Sin of Cruelty to brute Animals. By Humbrey Primatt, D. D. 8vo. 4s. Boards. Cadell.

The various tribes of created beings, with which this earth is inhabited, compose one great family, united by mutual interest, subordination and dependence. The least insect has its use, as well as the largest animal; and is, in some respect or other, subservient to the advantage of the whole community.

N O T E.

* Spartianus softens the most odious parts of the character and elevation of Julian.

Man himself, though at the head of this visible creation, is as much, or perhaps more dependent on other creatures, than the meanest reptile. He is indebted to the lives, the clothing, or the labours of inferior animals for the greatest part of his comfort and support. The horse, the cow, the sheep, the fish, the fowl, the bee, the silk-worm, and a thousand others, are continually administering to his necessity, convenience, and pleasure; insomuch that if he were deprived of their assistance, he would be divested of some of the most agreeable and essential articles of his dress and equipage, of the furniture of his house, and the delicacies of his table.

Surely then these useful creatures have a reasonable claim to our care and protection. But, intoxicated by a vain idea of preeminence and superiority, we are apt to look upon them with contempt; and can hardly bring ourselves to think, that we are under obligations of duty and gratitude to contribute to their ease and happiness.

The design of this tract is to rectify these mistaken notions; and to prove, that, as the mercies of the Creator are over all his works, from the archangel to the worm, our benevolence and compassion are not to be confined within the circle of our friends, acquaintance, and neighbours; nor limited to the more enlarged sphere of human nature, to creatures of our own rank, shape, and capacity, but are to be extended to every object, endowed with life and sensation.

The author, having shewn, that no superiority of rank or station can give a right to inflict unnecessary or unmerited pain, observes, that the cruelty of man to brutes is more heinous, in point of injustice, than the cruelty of men to men.

'In the case of human cruelty, the oppressed man has a tongue that can plead his own cause, and a finger to point out the aggressor: all men that hear it shudder with horror; and, by applying the case to themselves, pronounce it cruelty with the common voice of humanity, and unanimously join in demanding the punishment of the offender, and brand him with infamy. But in the case of brutal cruelty, the dumb beast can neither utter his complaints to his own kind, nor describe the author of his wrong; if he could, they have it in their power to redress and avenge him.

'In the case of human cruelty, there are courts and laws of justice in every civilized society, to which the injured man may make his appeal; the affair is canvassed, and punishment inflicted in proportion to the offence. But alas! with shame to man, and sorrow for brute, I ask the question, What laws are now in force? or what court of judicature does now exist, in which the suffering brute may bring his action against the wanton cruelty of barbarous man? The laws of Triptolemus are long since buried in oblivion, for Triptolemus was but a heathen. No friend, no advocate, not one is to be found amongst the the bulls or calves of the people to prefer an indictment on behalf of the brute. The priest passeth by on one side, and the Levite on the other side; the Samaritan stands still, sheds a tear, but can do no more; for there is none to help; and the poor wretched and unbefriended creature is left to moan in unregarded sorrow, and to sink under the weight of his burden.

‘But suppose the law promulged, and the court erected. The judge is seated, the jury sworn, the indictment read, the cause debated, and a verdict found for the plaintiff. Yet what cost or damage? what recompence for loſs ſuſtained? In actions of humanity, with or without law, ſatisfaction may be made. In various ways you may make amends to a man for the injuries you have done him. You know his wants, and you may relieve him. You may give him cloaths, or food, or money. You may raiſe him to a higher ſtation, and make him happier than before you afflicted him. You may be ſet to the lame, and eyes to the blind. You may entertain him, keep him company, or ſupply him with every comfort, convenience, and amuſement of life, which he is capable of enjoying. And thus you make ſome atonement for the injury which you have done unto a man; and by thy aſſiduity and future tendernels, thou mayeſt perhaps obtain his pardon, and palliate thine own offence. But what is all this to the injured brute? if by thy paſſion or malice, or sportive cruelty, thou haſt broken his limbs, or deprived him of his eye-ſight, how wilt thou make him amends? Thou canſt do nothing to amuſe him. He wants not thy money nor thy cloaths. Thy converſation can do him no good. Thou haſt obſtructed his means of getting ſubſiſtence; and thou wilt hardly take upon thyſelf the pains and trouble of procuring it for him (which yet by the rule of juſtice thou art bound to do). Thou haſt marred his little temporary happineſs, which was his all to him. Thou haſt maimed, or blinded him for ever; and haſt done him an irreparable injury.”

It is objected, that man has a permiſſion to eat the fleſh of animals; and that this cannot be done without taking away their lives, and putting them to ſome degree of pain.—Our author replies,

‘That this permiſſion cannot authorize us to put them to unneceſſary pain. . . . Death to a brute is nothing terrible. He muſt die once, as well as we; and though it is of ſmall moment, whether my beaſt is to die to-day or to-morrow, I ought not to put him to pain to-day: for whilst he lives, he has a right to happineſs, at leaſt I have no right to make him miſerable; and, when I kill him, I ought to diſpatch him ſuddenly, and with the leaſt degree of pain.’

It is alledged, that there are ſome animals obnoxious to mankind; and the moſt compaſſionate of men make no ſcruple to deſtroy them.—The author answers:

‘It is true, ſome animals are obnoxious to us, and have it in their power to hurt us; but very ſeldom do they exert that power; and well it is for us, that they have not the malice or revenge that is in man. “It is obſervable, ſays the ingenuous writer of the Guardian, of thoſe noxious animals, which have qualities moſt powerful to injure us, that they naturally avoid mankind, and never hurt us unleſs provoked, or neceſſitated by hunger. But man, on the other hand, ſeeks out and purſues even the moſt inoffenſive animals, on purpoſe to perſecute and deſtroy them.” If this be the caſe, it appears, that mercy preponderates in the ſcale of brutes. For one injury which we may poſſibly receive from the creatures, we offer them a thouſand. A horſe may now and then, when provoked, give a man an unlucky kick; but what is this to the blows, and cuts, and ſpurs, which they receive every day and every hour from the brutal rage and unrelenting barbarity of men? The matter of wonder is that we do not oftner feel the effects of their power and reſentment. If we conſider the excruciating injuries offered on our part to the brutes, and the patience on their part; how frequent our provocations, and how ſeldom their reſentment; and in ſome caſes our weakneſs and their ſtrength, our ſlowneſs and their ſwiftness,) one would be almoſt tempted to ſuppoſe (reaſon to both alike allowed), that the brutes had combined in one general ſcheme of benevolence to teach mankind leſſons of mercy and meekneſs, by their own forbearance and long-ſuffering. But grant that there are ſome fierce and formidable animals that are ſtrangers to pity and compaſſion. Does this juſtify the ſuppreſſion of theſe amiable diſpoſitions in men? Becauſe a wolf will ſeize a man; is a man therefore warranted to whip a pig to death? or, becauſe a ſerpent will bite a man by the heel; is a man to tread upon every harmleſs earth-worm he ſees wriggling upon the ground? No. If ſome offenſive creatures do ſometimes unprovokedly moleſt us, let it be accounted but as a retaliation of the injuries we offer to thoſe that are inoffenſive; (and thus even the dreadful hornet may be conſidered as but the avenger of the ſtings of the feeble fly;) for cruelty and cowardice are near of a kin; and we exert our power moſtly upon thoſe creatures who can neither do us an injury, nor return an injury done. But ſuppoſe we happen to meet with noxious animals, let us prudently get out of their path. But what if I cannot avoid them? Why then it is time enough to put myſelf in a poſture of defence; and for my own preſervation, I think it no more crime to defend myſelf from the beaſt or ſerpent, than from a villainous man that ſhould attack my perſon; and if, in the fray, I killed the beaſt, I cannot charge myſelf with malice or any intentional cruelty, provided I diſpatch him as inſtantly as poſſible. If a waſp or a hornet comes into my room, I dread his weapon, but I hate him not: he is a beautiful infect; and I make no doubt was created for ſome uſeful useful purpose. I am sorry I am necessitated to kill him; but I will not clip him in pieces with my scissors, if I can crush him under my foot: but if I cannot master him unless I clip him; having to do, I dare not leave him in the pain of a lingering death for many hours together, but I finish the mortal work with all expedition. And in this, I hope, there is no cruelty; for cruelty in this case consists in the unnecessary infliction and continuation of pain; and not in putting the creature to instant death, which is the period of all pain. Self-preservation therefore (whether as in the former case for the support of nature in the article of food; in the present case for the avoidance of pain and destruction from the attacks of obnoxious animals) though it may justify a man in putting a brute to instant death, yet cannot warrant the least act of cruelty to any creature, however ferocious or savage it may be; much less can it justify the hunting out for sport and destruction creatures of the tamer kind, whose inability to defend themselves, whose harmless nature, and whose pining fears rather demand our compassion, and even our protection and attention.

It is alledged, that there are some brutes of prey, which wholly subsist on the flesh of other brutes, and whose lives are one continued course of rapine and bloodshed.

‘This likewise, says our author, is true; and in the present state of nature, subject to misery and decay, it seems to be the wise and good appointment of the great Creator.—Were there no beasts or birds of prey, we should every day be tormented with the sight of numbers of poor creatures dying by inches (as we say), and pining away through age or accidental infirmity. And, when dead upon the ground (as men would hardly give themselves the trouble to bury them; or it would take up too much of our time to bury them all,) the unburied carcasses would by their stench create such a pestilence in the air, as would not only endanger our lives and health, but would likewise be extremely offensive to us. To guard against these evils, it hath pleased God to appoint that (in some countries) lions, tygers, and eagles, (and, in other countries,) wolves, foxes, kites, ravens, and hawks, should range the woods and fields in search of the unburied bodies, and thus become the living graves of the dead. And if, in the course of their range or flight, they espy a beast or bird worn out with age, or with a leg or limb by accident broken, or forsaken by his dam, unable to help himself, or any way rendered incapable of getting his own food; God, the father of mercies, hath ordained beasts and birds of prey to do that distressed creature the kindness to relieve him from his misery, by putting him to death.’

The author concludes his answer to the foregoing objection with observing, that when we make the ferocity of savage brutes a model for our imitation, we betray the weakness of our own understanding, and degrade ourselves from the rank we hold as men. He then proceeds to confirm what he has advanced on the principles of nature, by the authority of the Scriptures.

There are three instances of regard, to which the creatures who are intrusted to our care, in consideration of their service, have an undoubted right; these are, food, rest, and tender usage. These three demands, he says, the goodness of their Creator has been pleased to covenant for, on their behalf, and to enjoy and ratify in his written law. On the article of food, among other observations, he has the following:

‘This is all the wages, which the labouring brutes expect or desire, for all their toil and drudgery in the service of man; and to deny them food is not only imprudent in the master on his own account, but it is barbarous, wicked, and unjust. They ask only the grass of your field, I mean the grass of the field; for you have no property in nature. We are only temporary tenants, with leave to take to our use the fruits of the earth. The soil is the property of God, the lord paramount of the manor, who hath made the grass to grow for the cattle. The grass of the field therefore is no gift of your’s to them; it is their right; their property; it was provided for them, and given to them, before man was created. And as man cannot eat grass, and the beast ask for that only, which man cannot eat, to withhold or forbid it, is a robbery and a sin. Therefore if to gratify thine appetite or avarice, thou plowest up one field, and to save the sweat of thine own brow, instead of digging it with a spade, makest use of the labour and strength of thy cattle to plow it for thee; in the name of gratitude and justice, forget not thy benefactors, but allow them another field, or something equivalent to it, in lieu of that which you have taken from them. Muzzle not the oxen, that tread out thy corn. Consider well, if the corn you sow and reap is thy corn, not their corn; the grass you dig up is their grass, not your grass. And when God appointed you to be master of the beast, and tenant of the field, he gave you no right to deprive your beast of that food which God hath ordained for him; but as the lord of the manor he demands of you a quit-rent for the use of the beast that plows and labours for thee.’

On the article of rest, the author remarks, that the goodness of the Creator condescends to interfere, on the behalf of brutes, by several positive precepts; and that he hath appointed a sabbath, or day of rest, for cattle, as well as men. That the sabbath is to be sanctified by works of mercy even to the brutes, he proves by our Lord’s reply to the ruler of the synagogue, who had charged him with breaking the sabbath, by healing a diseased woman on that day: ‘Doth not each one of you on the sabbath loose his ox or his ass, from the stall, and lead him away to watering?’ Luke xiii. 15, &c.

‘In this question, says Dr. Primatt, our Saviour infers one duty from another; and is so far from blaming them for this work of mercy mercy to an ox or an ass, that he highly approves it, by making it the ground-work of his own apology; and the inference and argument was so humane, so excellent, and striking, that it is said, all his adversaries were ashamed.

The author proceeds to the third article, in which the brutes have a claim to our regard, namely, tender usage. This point he has established upon many apposite and striking passages of Scripture.

The following prohibition, Deut. xxii. 10. — 'Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together,' he very naturally explains, — 'thou shalt not set a weak beast to keep pace with, or do the work of a strong beast; nor put him to any work which he is incapable of performing.'

This subject leads the author to state and consider the celebrated story of Balaam and his ass. The limits of our Review will not allow us to extract his narrative at large; we shall therefore content ourselves with the following passage:

The Lord observing the malicious rage of the man, blinded with fury, and hardened in his wickedness, instead of being reformed by the miracle, was pleased at length, as he had before opened the mouth of the ass, now to open the eyes of Balaam, who sees an angel of the Lord standing in the way. He had wished for a sword in his own hand to kill the ass, and now he beholds the angel of the Lord with a drawn sword in his hand ready to kill him. He called for a sword, and a sword immediately appears. And the man, who had cruelly treated his beast for startling and stumbling to avoid the sword of the avenger, now boweth down his own head, and falls flat on his face. The case of the man and the brute is now the same in point of fear: the appearance of the angel was no less terrifying to the master, than to the beast that carried him; and justly might the angel have requited Balaam in kind for his cruelty. But as God is more merciful to sinful men, than men are to unfeeling brutes; the angel of the Lord was pleased to sheath his sword: and though he came to Balaam with a message from the Lord of very great importance, yet he postpones the delivery of his errand, till he had first reproved and convinced Balaam of his wickedness and cruelty in smiting the ass, which was a sin deserving his notice and reproof. And that the reproof might be more striking to Balaam, the angel makes use of the very words which the ass had spoken before: "What have I done unto thee, said the ass, that thou hast smitten me these three times?" And the angel said unto Balaam, "Wherefore hast thou smitten thine ass these three times?" To the question of the ass Balaam had replied, "Because thou hast mocked me, and I would there were a sword in my hand, for now would I kill thee." But when the angel asked him the very same question, his tone was changed; and we hear not a word about mocking, or wishing for a sword to kill her; but a confession of sin, and an apology of ignorance. His stout and stubborn heart trembled: the consciousness of his guilt, and the sense of his folly and injustice in smiting the innocent beast, touched him to the quick; and, in spite of his pride, passion, and cruelty, extorted from him this frank confession: "I have sinned." "And Balaam said unto the angel of the Lord, I have sinned."

"I do not say, that the angel was sent on purpose to rebuke Balaam for this sin: it is plain that he was not: for the angel was present, and the ass saw him, before her master smote her the first time; but it displeased the angel so much, that he withdrew himself for a season. He would have appeared the second time, but the same cause produced the same effect. But now at the third time, the just indignation of the heavenly messenger was kindled at the foolish passion and cruelty of Balaam. He could no longer contain: and yet, as if he deemed the man unworthy to hear his voice, he opens the mouth of the injured ass, that he might plead her own cause with human voice; and by the strangeness of the miracle convince her master of his folly and injustice. But when the miracle had no effect upon the infatuated man, then did the angel exhibit himself in the posture of vengeance; and waves his important message, till he had first corrected Balaam for his cruelty. And as this history was to be handed down to us in record, he would not let slip this opportunity of teaching mankind by divine interposition the duty of mercy, and the sin of cruelty to brute animals. And the more miraculous this history is, it is the more striking, and deserving our notice and remembrance."

On this part of his history, the author makes these and the like humane reflections:

"Did you never whip, or spur, or ill-treat your horse, when at any time he has started or stumbled? Was your passion never excited thereby? and did you not almost wish there had been a sword in your hand to kill him? Pardon me, reader, for putting the question home to you, I hope you can answer in the negative; but it is an instance common every day. If you are innocent as to this point, well for thee; and I turn myself to another that will plead guilty. And to the former question, I ask him further; Did you, when your passion was over, lay your hand upon your breast, and say in the words of Balaam, "I have sinned?" I fear not. Then give me leave to tell you; you have so many sins still unrepented of: you have erred with Balaam, but not repented with him; and the sword of the angel is still drawn against thee. But repent in time, that he may sheath it. And whenever it so happens for the future, that your horse either stumble, or starts, I intreat thee to call this to mind. Know that your beast is not to blame. He no more loves to be affrighted, than you do. It is no more agreeable to him to make a false step, than it is to yourself. He feels the pain of the jarr as well as you. Therefore imitate him not. But remember this history, and add not sin unto sin. The angel angel of the Lord is with you, though you see him not; and, in this case, sometimes withstands thee. Say not, My horse stumbles, and therefore I smite him; but consider that, whilst you ride, your horse goes a-foot: and a fixed stone or hillock, a sharp flint, or a pinched and uneasy shoe might cause even yourself to stumble if you were to travel on foot; and you would think it hard to be chastised for an involuntary or forced trip. Do not then unto others as you would be unwilling should be done unto you. Say not, My horse starts, and therefore I smite him; and I correct him, because he is timorous; but consider that you have your passions as well as your horse. Elie, why the blood in thy face? or, why the paleness of countenance on these occasions? The passion of anger, or the passion of fear, do then predominate in thyself. Learn first to subdue the sudden emotions of thine own passions, and then endeavour to correct his fears. I will grant, if you please, that his passion of fear may be foolish; but so is your passion of anger: and your folly is greater than his, if what you sometimes say is true,—that a man has more reason than a horse. You have reason, and use it not; your horse has not reason, therefore he cannot use it. Your horse has not reason to conquer his fears, whilst you have both reason and power to subdue your own passion. Your horse offends and cannot help it; you offend, and may help it. I leave it to your own judgment to determine, whether you or your horse deserves most to be corrected.

We shall close this article with the following citation, which deserves to be carefully expressed on the minds of youth.

‘To be merciful as our Father is merciful, and, to make way for every work of mercy, necessarily imply that it is our duty to extend or shew mercy to every object of it. No creature is so insignificant, but whilst it has life, it has a right to happiness. To deprive it of happiness is injustice, and to put it to unnecessary pain is cruelty. It is very unreasonable therefore, if not foolish in men, to estimate the degree of the sin of cruelty to any creature by the value we set upon the creature itself: or to suppose that difference of size, or difference of beauty, are foundations of real difference as to the feelings of brutes. A fly has feeling as well as an ox; and a toad has as much right to happiness as a canary bird: for the same God made the ox, and the fly, and the toad, and the bird. It is true, we have an aversion to some creatures, and we are better affected towards some than to others: but we ought not to put any of them to pain, if we can avoid it; for cruelty to a brute is odious and abominable, whether it be to a beast, or a bird, or a fish, or a worm. Be the creature ever so insignificant in our estimation, we cannot put it to any degree of pain without a violation of the laws of nature; because every living creature is the work of the God of nature.

‘According to the divine law, mercy is a duty of that universal extent, that it will not be dispensed with even in the accidental, and yet not uncommon circumstance, of finding a bird’s nest. “If a bird’s nest chance to be before thee in the way in any tree, or on the ground, whether they be young ones or eggs, and the dam sitting upon the young, or upon the eggs; thou shalt not take the dam with the young, but thou shalt in any wise let the dam go;—that it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days.”

We need not, we presume, make any apology to our readers for the length of this article, and the number of passages which we have cited from Dr. Primatt’s performance. It is the only work of any considerable extent we have seen upon the subject, and a work, which, on account of its excellent design, is entitled to the warmest approbation.

An Election Ball in Poetical Letters, in the Zomerzetsire Dialect, from Mr. Inkle, a Freeman of Bath, to his Wife at Gloucester: By the Author of the New Bath Guide.

St. Patrick's Day, March 17. A Poem.

IN V O C A T I O N.

Genius of Ireland, listen to the strain!
The votive strain thy Saint inspires;
Let not the Poet ask thy aid in vain,
But fill his breast with more than wanted fires.

O D E.

FAR in the depth of ancient time,
The Saint explor'd thy favour'd Isle,
And, as on this auspicious day,
Bid rank disease depart, and health and honour smile;

While freedom spreads her beaming ray,
And arts and commerce lift their heads sublime.

Thy sons, distinguish'd by the holy leaf, (Emblem of life sincere, and sound belief;
This day do honour to thy Saint,
And while his fame they spread, their own great virtues paint.

Thy hardy youths, for valour fam'd,
And firm in freedom's phalanx fix'd,
With Britain's high-born sons are proudly
nam'd,
For worth untainted, and for zeal unmix'd.

Of as this glorious day returns,
May old Hibernia lift her honest head,
And, while the sacred flame of freedom burns,
Through distant realms her fame unfill'd spread:

So shall, with pride, in future days,
Th' historian paint that well-earn'd fame,
And poets, in immortal lays,
Shall join to dignify her name. P. S.

An Elegy on the Death of Doctor Warren.

HE's gone!—Great Warren's soul from earth is fled, [dead;
Great Warren's name is number'd with the
That breast, where every patriot virtue glow'd;
That form, where Nature every grace bestow'd;
That tongue, which bade in freedom's cause combine
Truth, learning, sense, and eloquence divine;
That healing hand, which rais'd the drooping head,
Which rais'd pale sickness from her languid bed,
D d 2 Arc

Are now no more !—all rapt in sacred fire,
 At Liberty's exalted shrine expire ;
 While the great spirit, which the whole in-form'd,
 Glow'd in the breast, and ev'ry feature warm'd ;
 Mounts mid the flame to its own native heaven,
 Where angels plaudits to his deeds are given.
 Methinks I see the solemn pomp ascend,
 See ev'ry patriot shade his soul attend ;
 Immortal Hampden leads the awful band,
 And near him Raleigh, Russel, Sidney stand ;
 With them each Roman, every Greek whose name
 Stands high recorded in the roll of fame,
 Round Warren press, and hail with glad applause
 This early victim in fair freedom's cause :
 With gen'rous heart the laurel crown they twine, [divine.
 And round his brows they bind the wreath
 Oh ! glorious fate, which bids the gloomy grave
 Throw wide the gates of triumph to the brave !
 Sure, godlike Warren, on thy natal hour,
 Some star propitious shed its brightest pow'r ;
 By Nature's hand with taste, with genius
 form'd ;
 Thy generous breast with every virtue warm'd ;
 Thy mind endu'd with sense, thy form with
 grace,
 And all thy virtues painted in thy face :
 Grave wisdom mark'd thee for her fav'rite child,
 And on thy youth indulgent science smil'd ;
 Well pleas'd she led thee to her sacred bower,
 And to thy hands consign'd her healing pow'r.
 Still more to bless thee soothing friendship strove,
 And bade thee share an Adams', Handcock's love !

With them united in great freedom's cause,
 Thou stood'st the brave assertor of her laws.
 While ever watchful for thy country's weal,
 No arts could warp, no dangers damp thy zeal.

Thy grateful country to thy virtues just,
 To thee committed each important trust ;
 Call'd thee o'er all her counsels to preside,
 And 'midst this storm the helm of state to guide :

Equal to all, alike in all you shin'd,
 The patriot, friend, and counsellor combin'd.
 Heaven saw thy virtues to perfection soar,
 'Till Nature fail'd, and earth could bear no more !

Approving saw, and burst the bonds of clay,
 Which stay'd thy passage to the realms of day :
 And that e'en death might to thy fame conspire,

Bade thee on freedom's glorious field expire ;
 Bade liberty and honour guard thy grave,
 And countless thousands for thy mourners gave :
 And dare we then thy sacred triumphs mourn,
 Or with the tear of grief profane thy urn ?
 Illustrious shade ! forgive our mingled woes,
 Which not for thee, but for our country flows :
 We mourn her loss ; we mourn her hero gone ;
 We mourn thy patriot soul ; thy godlike virtue flown.

But oh ! from yon bright realms vouchsafe to bend

On us thy looks, and to our fate attend :
 Thy country's guardian angel deign to prove,
 And watch around us with thy wonted love :
 Still o'er our counsels may thy soul preside ;
 Thy light direct us, and thy genius guide :
 Let thy bright spirit glow in every breast,
 And be thy virtue on each heart impress'd :
 So shalt thou not alone in glory stand,
 And other Warrens shall adorn our land.

FOREIGN TRANSACTIONS.

Extract of a letter from an Officer in the Camp on Bunker's Hill, dated Dec. 4.

"YOU would be amazed how I am able to write at this instant, for it hails, rains, snows, and blows very bleakly on my canvass house. The Regulars and the Provincials squint at one another like wild cats across a gutter, and it is very probable we shall keep our distance till the cessation of the winter enables us to open the campaign."

By a gentleman just arrived from New-York, in a Dutch Vessel, we are informed, that the Congress have instituted a military order of knighthood, similar to the British Order of the Bath, called the Order of Liberty, to consist of a Sovereign of the Order, and 24 Knights Companions, who are to be composed of such men as have most eminently distinguished themselves in the cause of freedom, since the commencement of the present unhappy disturbances ; the 23d of April, being St. George's day, is fixed for the installation of the Sovereign, the honourable John Hancock ; after which a commission will be issued by him, directed to three members of the Provincial Congress, to invest the Generals

Washington, Putnam, and Lee, with the en-signs of the Order at the camp. The insignia are the Roman Fasces, with this motto, Congressus Populusque Americanus, round them, richly emblazoned with a star, and worn on the breast, and the cap of liberty pendant to a ribbon for the collar. The gentlemen of the navy are to wear it pendant to a red ribbon, edged with blue.—The Sovereign's robe is very magnificent, being of crimson velvet, lined with ermine, and richly embroidered.
 The Rev. Dr. Smith is appointed Chaplain to the Order.

Mr. How, of North Carolina, is appointed by the Continental Congress to the command of the Southern army, to act against Lord Dunmore in Virginia, or any troops that may be sent there.

By a letter received by the last ship from America we have the following intelligence :
 —The public have been already informed, that on the 22d of October last Lord Dunmore put to the rout about 200 Virginian Provincials at Kemps Landing, near Norfolk, taking several prisoners, amongst others Mr. Robinson, a Provincial Delegate for Princess Anne County.

County. Their commander, Colonel Hutchings, the Delegate for Norfolk, made his escape; and having raised another little army, consisting nearly of the same number of men, fixed his head quarters at a place called the North Landing, about eighteen miles from Norfolk, and on the 24th of November sent an invitation to Lord Dunmore to meet him with an equal number of men in an old field near the Landing. No notice being taken of this challenge, it was repeated next day: accordingly, in the evening, forty marines and a company of soldiers were sent against them, and arrived next morning at the Landing, but found no Provincials there. After resting and refreshing, the party began their march back, and had no sooner entered the woods than they received a heavy fire from the bushes, which killed two or three of their number, and wounded as many. The Officer who commanded immediately formed, and advanced to the spot, where he found a great number of firelocks lying on the ground, and saw the Provincials running into swamps close by; orders were instantly given to fire into the swamp, and though it was covered with underwood, the fire was not without effect; as Mr. Akis, formerly a Member of Assembly, and a few others, were killed, two or three drowned in attempting to swim over a creek in the swamp, and Hutchings himself made prisoner.

Extract of a letter from Paris, Jan. 29.

"A letter from Caen gives the following account of the earthquakes which were felt there on the 30th of December, at 32 minutes after ten in the morning. The shocks were preceded by a noise, which resembled the hallo driving of carriages. This noise lasted about two or three seconds, and was followed by three violent shocks of earthquakes, which altogether lasted five or six seconds; their direction were from South-West to North-East, and while they lasted, a noise was heard in every house, as if they were going to fall, and every body was very much alarmed.

"The greatest danger was to the South South-west; several public edifices and other buildings were much damaged; a cross of stone which was on the portal of the church of the Visitation fell down; above 200 chimnies were thrown down, and almost every house has received some damage. One person was wounded by the fall of a piece of stone. The steeple of Gornelles was thrown down. They write from Ouffieres, a parish in the same direction, that the shocks had split some rocks in that neighbourhood; the earthquake was sharply felt at the abbey of Fontenay, and at Trouaru, where they say some houses were damaged.

"The same day about eleven in the morning, a fourth shock, but a very slight one, was felt, which did no damage.

Extract of a letter from Leyden, Jan. 20.

"In consequence of a premium of thirty ducats offered by a citizen of this place, to whoever shall most effectually try the experiment of appeasing the waves which surround a ship in a storm, by pouring oil into the sea, the following letter has been received:

"We left the Texel the 3d of November, 1775, on board a merchant ship, Capt. Jurrien Jurrensen commander, and arrived the 14th in the evening on the coast of Jutland in Denmark. Our intention was to enter a determined port, but the Captain thinking it scarce possible to make it on account of the great quantity of ice, we put out to sea to make another: The night following a great tempest arose, which continued till the next morning, and drove us towards the coast, where we found a road, and were near a port. This situation seemed to flatter our hopes, but the waves ran so high and strong, that we had no command of the ship. The Captain, alarmed at our situation, and seeing no other way to prevent a shipwreck, gave orders for six barrels of oil, which he had on board, to be brought on the deck, and ordered them to be poured out slowly on each side of the ship, by which means the waves were by degrees abated, the ship began to answer her rudder, and they soon afterwards entered the port in safety."

Extract of a letter from Vienna, Jan. 30.

"On the 25th instant, at three o'clock in the afternoon, a woman was brought to bed of two boys. At five o'clock she was delivered of a third, and at six o'clock of a fourth. They have been baptized, and are all now living."

Gotha, Feb. 6.] Yesterday died here, after a short illness, her Serene Highness the Princess Frederica Louisa of Saxegotha, sister of the reigning Duke.

Extract of a letter from Savanna in Georgia, dated Nov. 29, 1775.

"There was a very hot engagement the 18th instant, between the Rebels and a party of the Royalists, which lasted three days, at which time the Rebels were obliged to surrender the fort and prisoners; the loss on either side I have not distinctly heard, but imagine it is inconsiderable on the part of the Regulars. This engagement was the first we had in Georgia since these disturbances began; indeed it is the only one of consequence we have heard of on this side Boston. I am much afraid, however, it is only a prelude to more bloodshed in this corner, for the Rebels are making preparations for another attack, and if no soldiers arrive in Carolina, to keep the Charlestown forces in play at home, I dread the consequence; for the other party are not sufficiently supplied with ammunition, nor can they possibly collect together those who would readily join them, they being dispersed up and down the country."

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

February 1.

THE following gentlemen are speedily to be created Peers of England:—Sir Jeffery Amherst, Sir Brownlow Cust, Mr. George Pitt, Mr. Edward Southwell, Mr. Foley, and Mr. Ryder; and it is said that fourteen Baronets

Baronets will also be created about the same time.

The following gentlemen are speedily to be created Peers of Ireland:—Sir George McCartney, Sir William Mayne, Sir Charles Bingham, Sir Archibald Acheson, Sir Richard Phillips (son of the late Sir John Phillips), Sir Thomas Maude, Mr. Howard, and M. St. Ledger.

On Monday, January 15, at about three o'clock in the afternoon, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester was delivered of a Prince in the Teodoli palace at Rome. Their Royal Highness's household, and some English gentlemen, were present as witnesses to testify the event.

Upon a review of 600 of the Foot Guards last week in the Tower, the commanding officer promised a guinea to each soldier who would voluntarily turn out to fight against America. And how many doth the reader think offered their lives to please the juno? Only two! who were instantly made corporals. —What a striking instance is this of the noble principles of our soldiers, who cannot even be bribed into the murder of their trans-Atlantic brethren! —Blush, Britannia, at the black deed, and learn mercy from thy mercenaries!

Lord Shelburne, we are assured, has within these few days refused the viceroyship of Ireland which has been repeatedly offered him by the Minister.

Several corporals are ordered on recruiting parties for the three regiments of guards, to compleat the number in each company to their full complement, in the room of those drafted off.

Another draft will shortly be made from all the marching regiments serving on the British and Irish establishments. This corps, which is intended to serve in detachments, will amount to about 3000 men.

Government has contracted for one thousand baggage waggons, ten thousand horse shoes, and two thousand saddles for the use of the king's troops in America.

The Somerset man of war, which is arrived off Totness from Halifax was in so leaky a condition in lying two years at Boston, that she was obliged to fail to Halifax to be repaired before she could proceed to England. By the same ship we learn, that all the men of war's bottoms that remain at Boston are so eat up by the worms, that they must undergo a good repair before they will be in a condition to return to England. By the above man of war came several families from Halifax, that colony being expected to join the rest of the colonies in defending their chartered rights.

Letters from Gibraltar by the Minerva, Captain Callaghan, who is arrived at Portsmouth, brings advice, that a vessel was put in there from Cadiz, and the master reports, that two days before he left that place, three vessels loaded with wheat and other things, the produce of America, arrived in that port; that he was informed, that the Spaniards carried on a considerable trade with the Americans; and that they took but few goods in return, but were generally paid in hard dollars.

Orders are given from the Ordnance office for immediately taking down, and preparing for service, six thousand stand of arms, from the small armory in the Tower.

Commissions are issued for immediately buying up in Ireland, for the use of the navy, 800 casks of beef, 600 barrels of pork, and great quantities of flour, salt butter, and potatoes.

About a fortnight since an information was sent to Sir John Fielding's office in Bow-street, from Bristol, that two sets of coiners were at work in coining halfpence near that city. Upon which Sir John applied to John Vernon, Esq; Solicitor of the Mint, who immediately sent off Mr. Clark and Mr. Bryant, two of Sir John Fielding's officers, to apprehend them; and after having got the proper warrants from Thomas Farr, Esq; Mayor of Bristol (who is likewise a Justice of Peace for the county of Gloucester, and whose merit cannot be too much applauded for his assistance in the above business), they, with the aid of some of the Mayor's officers, went on Saturday the 10th inst. to a place called Kingwood, about three miles from Bristol, where they apprehended William Cockran, John Marler, and Mary Hopkins, in the room where the coining press was fixed with eyes in it, and themselves at work. They also went to Mr. Mould's, who kept a house in Dowry-square, Bristol Hotwells (which cost 2000l. building), where he and his wife were apprehended, and a great quantity of tools, used in the coining business, were found. They then apprehended one Williams, who kept the Bull Inn in High-street, in the city of Bristol, who is charged with buying the halfpence (under value) of the above coiners. On searching his house a press was found fixed in his garret for cutting out the round blanks for making halfpence, and a quantity of Scissell. On Monday the 12th, they were examined before the Mayor at the Council-House, who committed Cockran, Marler, Hopkins, Moulds, and his wife, to take their trials for coining at the next Gloucester assizes, and Williams, the inn-keeper, to Negwate, in Bristol, to take his trial at the next gaol delivery for that city for buying the halfpence under their value.

27.] At the final close of the poll for the office of Chamberlain of the city of London, the numbers were,

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

Birr, February 24.

WE have the pleasure to inform the public, that at the instance of Sir William Parsons, Bart. the Protestant inhabitants and gentlemen of Birr, to their honour, have formed themselves into two independent companies, clothed in a very neat and elegant uniform, viz. scarlet coats faced with black velvet, white waistcoats and breeches, with proper accoutrements, in order to protect the inhabitants, and suppress rioters, or disturbances of any kind; and they have also built a watch-house, and established a regular nightly watch for the same purpose.

We also learn from Roscrea, in the county of Tipperary, that a number of Protestant inhabitants of that town have voluntarily agreed to clothe themselves in uniforms, and arm themselves, in defence of their lives and properties, and for the preservation of the peace of the county, against those rioters called White Boys, and all other disturbers of the peace and tranquility of the Protestant inhabitants.—A most laudable association, and a precedent very well worth following by every town and county in the kingdom at this time. The above loyal volunteers are to consist of twenty light horse and fifty infantry, which is an honour to that country.

Cork, March 4. Extract of a letter from Boston, dated Jan. 29, 1776. “We arrived here in seven weeks and three days from Spithead. The general passage of the rest of the fleet was from 12 to 18 weeks. The ships and cargoes suffered much, and several of them are still missing. Provisions are very dear. The entrenchments of the Provincials are within our sight. They have several privateers on the coast, and have taken some of our store-ships; they took two ships from Cork with provisions on the 25th instant.—The party they have at Quebec have been defeated, with the loss of 200 men and one of their generals; they have taken all the men off the island of St. John’s, and left only the women and children to inhabit it.”

We hear that advice is received by the Mary, Capt. Wallace, from New-York, that 7000 men and nine men of war were arrived at Hispaniola from France; and that two sloops from the West-Indies with 1500 barrels of gunpowder, had arrived at New-York, and landed their cargo in a dark night, a few nights before Capt. Wallace sailed.

Cork, March 4. A few days ago, a grave was discovered at Ballydanab, in which the late Mr. O’Driscoll of Dunmanus was buried, after he was murdered; the white earth dug from the bottom still remains at each side; it is about seven feet long and very deep. Mr.

O’Driscoll’s wig, with signs of blood, was found in the grave. It is amazing that the murderers, (after they had dug up the corpse in order to throw it into the sea) did not take care to fill up, “that horrid tell-tale!”—Last Thursday night, one Irwin, (in whose house the notorious Tim. Kelly was) in returning from Cork, was attacked on the high road, near Alderman Withers’s, by two men, who first attempted to rob him, but not finding money, they were going to murder him, which they would have accomplished, were it not for his cries; the poor man now lies in a dangerous way, they declared they would kill him if they supposed he was the cause of the apprehension of the said Tim. Kelly.

Cork, March 7. Capt. Jones, who arrived here last night from Falmouth, informs us, that he left in that port two transport ships with soldiers, and one store brig, belonging to Sir Peter Parker’s Squadron; they put into Falmouth the 22d ult. and the brig was so much damaged by bad weather, that her cargo was landed in order to have the vessel repaired.

The Queen of England, and Sukey, both from this port for Boston, laden with pork, butter, meat, and other provisions, are said to be both carried into Marblehead by the Provincials; and we are informed that the Fanny, which sailed from Cove, October 18th, (in company with the Argo) with a cargo of provisions for Boston, was not arrived there in 15 weeks.

DUBLIN.

WE are informed from Athy, that a few days ago, a young man, servant to Steward Weldon of Sportland, Esq; had suddenly disappeared, and was supposed to have perpetrated the horrid crime of suicide, as a razor and much blood was found in his bed. It is imagined he attempted cutting his throat with a razor, but had not done the business so effectually as to dispatch himself; and that he had got out and threw himself into the river Barrow, which runs under Sportland Lodge. The unfortunate lad was sober and well behaved, and it is thought was tempted to commit this wicked and heinous crime by a disappointment from some hard-hearted mistress.

Thursday, Feb. 29. Between twelve and one o’clock in the morning, a fire broke out in a house in Aungier-street, which entirely consumed the same, and greatly damaged an adjoining house. During the fire, a woman with two children made their escape to the top of the house, where in her fright she threw one of them into the street, which was providentially saved by a man who caught it in his arms; the woman and other child were likewise wife saved by some flators being sent for and bringing a ladder; a man who also got on the house, saved himself by coming down by one of the 'pouts.

Saturday, May 2. John M'Daniel and Christopher Hawkin, both for murder, were executed near St. Stephen's-green, pursuant to their sentence.

A few days since, a girl about 11 or 12 years of age was ravished and murdered at Ballygannon, near Rathdrum, in the co. Wicklow, by John Connor, a labouring man, near 60 years of age. He was next day apprehended, and lodged in Wicklow-gaol.

Extract of a letter from Lieutenant Ridgdale, of the 44th regiment, to his father, Major Ridgdale, dated Boston, Jan. 23, 1776.

"Your idea of the riflemen in the rebel army, is infinitely more alarming than that which we have of them; be assured they are a mere bugbear. That they are in general tolerable marksmen, is true; but their native cowardice prevails upon every occasion over their dexterity. The troops who keep up the spirit and life of the rebel army are totally Scotch and Irish: some of whom, particularly the latter, claim the pity of every man not a stranger to the ties of humanity; wretches forced from their homes by the rigorous exertion, and scandalous oppression of their greedy landlords."

Extract of a letter from a gentleman at Antrim to his friend in Dublin, dated March 2, 1776.

"I am just returned from the funeral of our worthy and much lamented friend W. Williamson. Never was I witness to such a scene of heart-felt sorrow and real distress: nor has this town sustained so great a loss since the death of the late earl of Massareene, and the Rev. Joseph Finiston. Time will not permit a just detail of this horrid murder. Suffice it then to say, that a party of ruffians, without any provocation, attacked him and his company as they were walking in that part of the town; unarmed and defenceless, they were soon overpowered, and our dear friend from the wounds and bruises he received at that time died on Wednesday last. You can better conceive than I describe what his afflicted relations and friends must feel on the loss of one whose many good qualities endeared him to all his acquaintances, knowing him to be possessed of every virtue that could adorn the heart of man."

Extract of a letter from a gentleman in Philadelphia to his friend in this city.

"By an express from Baltimore we learn, that the master of a vessel, just from Hampton, in Virginia, advises, that on the 1st inst. the men of war began to fire on Norfolk, and had continued firing for two days; the town was in flames when he came off with the account."

For A P R I L, 1776.

A burlesque Portrait of a Bostonian Centinel, miscalled an American Rifle-man, having lately appeared in a News-paper, and since dignified by being copied into a periodical Publication; we are now happy in being able to give the Public an elegant Engraving of a real Rifle-man, from a Drawing of Ad—m Levingst—n, Esq; communicated by a Gentleman lately returned from Philadelphia.

An Account of the Masquerade at the Music-hall, in Fishamble-street, on Friday, April 19.

THE divers rooms of the Music-hall were decorated, for this occasion, in a manner in which the taste of the design, and the elegance of the execution, vied with each other. A striking and pleasing variety of decorations prevented that languor which usually arises from too great an uniformity. Those on the ground floor, destined for the reception of the masks, were adorned with transparent paintings, and highly illuminated; the tea-room was plentifully stored with sundry refreshments; tea, coffee, wines of divers sorts, negus, &c. and whilst provision was made for the gratification of every other sense, that of hearing was not neglected, for bands of different music were dispersed in the different apartments; and that the same agreeable variety might be every where introduced, the instruments in the one room varied from those in any other. Hautboys, clarionets, and other wind instruments, aided the violins in the great hall. In another apartment they were accompanied with the dulcimer, playing strains

April, 1776.

Sweetly soft in Lydian measure; whilst the rural dance in a third, had its necessary accompaniment of the rustic pipe and tabor.

The supper rooms (constructed for this festive occasion) were erected over the ridotto, card and tea rooms. The ascent to them was by a flight of stairs, seemingly cut in the hollow of a huge rock, which on all sides exhibited a pleasing view of the divers strata of earths and ores of which it was composed. It received light through this artificial aperture, which discovered the sky wherein hovered an eagle, holding in his talons three lustres, suspended by silken strings, entwined with flowers, and casting equal light to the three several ascents. To this splendid glare, the contrast succeeded, of a gloomy, ivy-spread passage, where that serpentine shrub had crept through various rifts of rock, and expanded its luxuriant branches all around: the passage terminated in a cavern, seemingly hollowed out of the rock, more by the hand of nature than

the efforts of art : a second, but still larger grotto, presented itself next to the astonished view, and from thence the company proceeded to a subterraneous grotto, lined with different spars and marcasites, and from the vaulted roof hung numberless crystalline petrifications, which reflected light from the multitude of their irregular prisms, and seemed to vie with the celebrated grotto of Antiparos. Passing from thence, as it were into open day, under an arch of projecting rocks, a lettuce-worked saloon (about which an exuberant vine had twined its tender clasps, with its ripe fruits, interwoven with its mantling boughs) led to a beautiful and spacious garden : the ceiling represented a serene sky, playing under which, a groupe of Cupids, holding wreaths of vine-leaves in one hand, with the other held a lustre (composed, like the others, of various flowers) that gave light to the room.

Whilst the garden on one side gave pleasure to the deluded sight, on the other it was equally deceived by the representation of a very extensive landscape, both seeming rather realities, than the work of the creative pencil.

But still more wonders ! the grove appearing through one of the arcades, left the beholders in doubt, whether that was not also an illusion of art ; but by passing forward, they found it a decorated room of near four-score feet long. Here all the admiration caused by what had been already seen, was lost in greater admiration at this spectacle of united elegance. One side of the room, displayed an undescribable variety of sloping hills, shaded with woods, descending into smiling valleys, through which a rivulet luxuriantly meander'd, after falling with numberless cascades from the brow of a mountain. On the other side, the prospect, though various, was equally charming ; whilst a number of lustres, supported by fresh groupes of playful Cupids, illuminated the whole.

In these rooms, all in one suite, the supper tables were laid ; those in the grand apartment sufficed for above five hundred persons, who sat with equal ease as at a private entertainment. The decorations of the tables in each apartment were correspondent to the stile of the room. Here taste seemed to be exerted till fancy was exhausted, yet still on closer view it appeared inexhaustible. The Beings of Heathen mythology were not forgotten, but each seemed to preside and aid over the sports consigned by paganism to their care. The bacchants and satyrs, the goddesses of fruit, flowers and corn were properly employed, whilst the pleasures of the chase, the elegance of grotesque, antient and Chinese buildings, mills, groves, bridges, temples, and an innumerable variety of other deceptions, executed in confectionary, made the tempted palate loath to gratify itself, by the destruction of the beauties of ransacked art. The dishes were equally various, nothing that could be desired was wanting, and every stile of cookery, from that of the plain viands of our frugal ancestors, to the appetite-provoking culinary arts of France, or the most luxurious epicures, was displayed on this occasion. The wines were equally plentiful, and equally good.

Such was the disposition of the Music-hall, which was opened about ten o'clock, and soon filled by near a thousand persons of distinction, without any mixture of improper people, such great care had been taken in the distribution of the tickets. The dresses were rich, elegant, fanciful, and in great variety of tastes, although the proportion of domino's was rather too great : those are the constant masquing habits of those who are either too indolent to assume a character, or too spiritless to be capable of supporting one. Amongst the variety of assumed characters, the following were the most striking :

Two Mungo's, one of whom had forgot his hamper, which he would have obtained from the other, who did not seem so willing to resign it, as it was almost the only mark of his character ; whilst his brother negro both in dialect, humour, and sallies of wit, was highly characteristic.

A Sultana, elegantly dressed, with a profusion of jewels ; and a page bearing her train. Dignity was in her gait, and grace in every motion. She was followed by a train of admirers, who crowded round the majestic infidel. But a Sailor valiantly attacked her, and bore her off from all his competitors ; an emblem of the success of those brave assertors of our dominion over the seas.

A Harlequin, with every qualification for that difficult character, frisked round the rooms, with surprising agility, leaping from place to place, to the delight and surprize of all who saw him : and by repeated flaps of his wooden sword essayed an exertion of his magic power, which alas ! proved ineffectual on some of the masks, whom no power could rouse to gaiety or activity.

A Devil, who forgot his power to tempt, tempt, and therefore the order of nature was inverted and some Milkmaids lost their assumed innocence, by trying to move his black highness.

A Lady, with a just ridicule on the present most ridiculous fashion of dressing the hair, had finely burlesqued the preposterous mode, by decorating her head with a protuberance as high as a grenadier's cap, beset with a profusion of mock vegetable productions.

Two masks, represented a Ballad-singer and his wife. The man seemed in years, with his carcase lapped in an old great coat, fastened with a belt, and a short black pipe, stuck in a red garter, that served for a hatband. The spouse was suitably accoutred, and supported her tottering steps, with a crutch-stick, whilst her counterfeit sciatica, and well-affected screams through pain, was highly natural. He sung a song on the masquerade, with the true tone and accent of an itinerant chanter.

A Chimney sweeper, well supported: and a good representation of an union between the Pope and Calvin, by the familiar conversation of some brawny Highlanders, and a groupe of fat bald-pated friars.

A double Man, formed in himself a striking contrast between a rough Irish spalpeen, and a fribbling, picture of a man, called a macaroni.

A Cherokee Indian, well dressed, and quite in character.

But the two most striking masks were a gentleman and a lady. The gentleman assumed the character of a Savoyard, who carried a show-box, out of which, by the pulling of a string, popped a Marmotte. The attitudes, the language and behaviour of this mask were all in the strictest propriety. The lady had assumed the dress of a noted Dame-street walker, and supported the character with such justice, that many persons, even the door-keepers were deceived, and thought the woman whom she personated had by some means obtained a ticket.

At supper most of the company unmasked, which preserved the strictest decorum; and the whole concluded about four in the morning, without any one disagreeable circumstance, and to the entire satisfaction of all present.

The Life of Mat. Midnight, or the Adventures of a Choice Spirit.

I AM one of five children of an industrious tradesman in the neighbourhood of the Blind-quay, who bestowed on me an education rather superior to what his circumstances would conveniently admit of. I had my share of writing and accounts, Latin, French, and dancing. Thus accomplished, I was at fourteen years of age, bound apprentice to an ingenious artist, who had the reputation of being at the head of his profession. My disposition was too volatile to allow me to attend to the duties of my occupation; and I was too impatient of restraint to listen to the advice of those who were older and wiser than myself. Five times did I elope from my master before I had served two years, and twice had I the honour to be punished in Bridewell for my misconduct. This, however, instead of reclaiming, hardened me; and I believe it will have this effect nine times out of ten: for the youth who enters a prison with his morals tainted, will, most probably, leave it with them perfectly corrupted:—the punishment inflicted in those places can by no means work a reformation, to combat the contagion of the bad examples found in them. I now began to be a great frequenter of alehouse-clubs, and, before I was seventeen, was president of two weekly, and five monthly societies. It may be easily conceived that the consequences of these meetings were intemperance and late hours:—unhappily for me, too, I had a good voice, and a strong constitution. I could drink more liquor, and sing a better song, than almost any one of my companions. These qualifications could not fail of introducing me to a large round of acquaintance; so that, at length, I had not only an appointment for every night in the week, but frequently four or five for the same night. An hour at the first club raised my spirits; another hour at the second made me quite jolly; and I have frequently rolled, between midnight and morning, from the third society to the fourth, in a state of drunken insensibility. If I was able to walk at all, I used to stagger home towards day light, and disturb my master's family by my unseasonable visit; but it frequently happened that it was noon before I had got rid of the effects of my intoxication; in this case I went not home at all; so that I have been often absent for three or four days and nights successively.—It could not be supposed that my master would long brook such treatment. He complained to my father, and insisted on a separation, which took place when I had served half my time. I was now at home with my father, and thought myself self more at liberty than ever to indulge in the career of my vices : But the old gentleman prudently withheld his hand ; and I could no longer sport with the effects of his liberality. This, however, was productive of a consequence still more scandalous and disgraceful than all my drunken revels. I connected myself with a woman of the town, and was mean enough to furnish my pocket with the wages of her prostitution. She died, and I turned myself over to another, who, before I had been three months connected with her, was transported for picking pockets at the play-house. I was now fairly on the town, and lived a life that would disgrace a brute. When disgust, or the almost certain consequences of a life of prostitution, had robbed me of one woman, I attached myself to another ; and so on, to the number of a score at the least. Many a time have I sat in a gin shop or an alehouse, or meanly skulked in an alley, while my girl has earned the casual half-crown that was to purchase an hour or two of intemperance. I blush to the bone at the recollection of my baseness ; but repentance comes too late. My father saw, with inexpressible concern, the life I had engaged in ; and made many generous, but fruitless efforts, to reclaim me. I have reason to think that my conduct contributed to break his heart. He died about a year since, leaving all the fruits of his industry to his other children. I am now not quite 24 years of age, with a debilitated constitution, an empty pocket, and an upbraiding conscience. I have not one friend left in the world ; and if I had, it would be one more than I deserve !

History of the Proceedings of the British Parliament. (Continued from p. 60 of our Magazine for January.)

Tuesday, Dec. 12.

READ a second time and committed, several roads, inclosure, and private bills.

On the report of the bill for dividing King Sedgmoor Common, the said bill was rejected, on a division 59 against 35.

The Worcester petition was put off, upon motion, until the 26th of January.

Leave was given to bring in a bill, to enable his majesty to make leases, copies, and grants of offices, lands, &c. of the Duchy of Cornwall.

Ordered in a bill to prevent deer-stealing.

Wednesday, Dec. 20.] The house of Commons met pursuant to adjournment. Several new writs were ordered to be issued for the election of new members.

The bill to prevent deer-stealing was read the first time, and ordered to be printed.

A petition from the journeymen stone masons, praying an increase of their wages, was presented to the house, and read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A petition from the mayor, bailiffs, and burgessees, of the town of Windsor, was likewise presented, setting forth, that they had expended several sums of money in repairing their bridge ; notwithstanding which, the same is now become very much decayed, and unsafe for carriages to pass over ; and that it is the opinion of experienced workmen the same must be taken down, and a new one built ; that an estimate of taking down and rebuilding the same had been made, which amounted to the sum of 3000*l.* and upwards ; that the present toll for postage and passage, under and over the same, are not sufficient to defray the expence of building and keeping the bridge in repair. The petition then prayed leave to bring in a bill to build a new bridge, and keep the same in repair, by such ways and means, and in such manner as the house should think fit. Upon reading the petition, leave was given accordingly.

After which the house broke up without doing any other business.

Thursday, Dec. 21.] The American prohibitory bill, with the amendments, was brought into the house of commons : and a motion was made by Sir Grey Cooper, that the amendments made by the lords to the said bill be now taken into consideration.

Mr. Hartley opposed this motion and the bill at large, in an elaborate speech, in which he observed, that this bill was a farewell to peace and America ; that we might bruise the heel, but not crush the head of America ; that America, after all our exertions against her, would still revive ; whereas Britain, he feared, would totally sink to ruin, unless some British Phoenix should hereafter arise from her ashes. He concluded with proposing an amendment to the motion, That the word now be left out, and the words " this day six weeks," be inserted in the said motion.

Sir Joseph Mawbey seconded the amendment, and after declaring his disapprobation of the measures taken by administration administration against America, he went into a justification of his own public conduct, which he said was not less consistent or independent, because he refused always to act with, and support men, who in opposition declaimed against general warrants, and many other arbitrary steps of ministers, and yet approved them the moment they got into office. He professed himself to be a firm and inflexible patriot on principle; and he complained of the unfair methods by which the address of the borough of Southwark to his majesty against the Americans, and several others of the same stamp, had been obtained, adding, that they were calculated to abuse the royal ear.

Mr. Bailey (member for Westbury, who has a large estate in the West-Indies) likewise supported the amendment, and pointed out the ruin that would ensue to all the West India islands if this bill passed. He was personally bitter against lord North, and let fall a few hasty expressions on the injustice of parliament, for which he was called to order. He even went so far as to say, he was ashamed of being born in a country where men's property could so easily be granted away to the commanders and seamen of men of war.

Governor Johnstone was for the amendment, because events had happened since the bill was last before the house, which made him wish to prevent its passing.—He joined with the member who spoke before him in opinion, that it would ruin the West-India islands, especially if their resources for corn and flour from Canada, so much insisted upon by administration, were cut off by the loss of Canada; and he called upon the minister for information, which he said he had a right to expect, whether Quebec was or was not in the hands of the Provincials at this time. He supposed he should have no answer, though the lords in administration in the other house, when called upon, had given the intelligence that was requested.

The question being put, that the word now do stand part of the original motion; it was carried.

Then the main question was put, and being carried, the several amendments were separately put and agreed to, and the bill passed. It was ordered back to the lords.

The house adjourned for the holidays.

Thursday, Jan. 25.] The house of commons met pursuant to their last adjournment, and after sitting about an hour adjourned.

The order which stood on the journals for the attendance of witnesses on the Shaftesbury election on Thursday next, was discharged, and that business deferred till Wednesday the 14th of February, and the witnesses, in number thirteen, then ordered to attend.

The chaplain was ordered to preach before the house in St. Margaret's church, Westminster, on Tuesday the 30th of January, being the anniversary of the Martyrdom of king Charles the first.

Several members took the oaths and their seats in the house.

A new writ was ordered to be issued for the electing a representative in parliament for the borough of Huntingdon, in the room of the honourable Mr. Montague, deceased.

Several petitions were received for road and inclosing bills, which were referred to their respective committees.—The house broke up about a quarter before seven o'clock.

Friday, Jan. 26.] The speaker of the house of commons being unable to make up the number of 100 members this day, in order to ballot for a committee to try the Worcester election, was obliged, according to the election act, to adjourn the house till next day.

Saturday, Jan. 27.] The speaker and the house met, in pursuance of Mr. Grenville's act, for deciding controverted elections for members to serve in parliament, which ordains, that on a complaint of an undue election, a day be appointed to ballot for a committee to try and determine the same; that on such a day the house at three o'clock be counted, and if an hundred members be not present, the house is not to proceed on any other business whatever, but adjourn from day to day.—The house, after waiting the usual time, and a sufficient number of members not being present, adjourned.

Monday, Jan. 29.] The house, as soon as the speaker was enabled to count an hundred members, proceeded to ballot for a select committee to determine on a complaint of an undue election for the city of Worcester, when the following gentlemen were appointed for a select committee.

Sir Adam Ferguson, chairman,
Nominees, Sir George Saville, Mr. Mellish.

Sir Walder Hanmer,	Mr. Crofts,
Mr. Freeman,	Mr. Medley,
Mr. Rogers,	Mr. Wildbare,
Mr. Smith,	Mr. Walter,
Mr. Tempest,	Mr. Cross,
Mr. De Grey,	Mr. Annesley.

Mr.

Mr. Dundas moved for leave to bring in a bill for disfranchising certain persons who voted at the late election for the borough of Hindon. After a short conversation, the matter was deferred till the next day.

Tuesday, Jan. 30.] The committee appointed to try the merits of the petition complaining of an undue election for the city of Worcester, met at eleven o'clock, pursuant to their adjournment of Monday, when, after calling over the names of the several members that composed it, the clerk read a copy of the petition presented to the house, wherein was set forth a complaint against the magistrates of the said city, also the sheriff, who was returning officer, for abusing the authority reposed in him; furthermore, a complaint against the sitting members, for bribing and attempting to bribe several of the voters at the said election; and lastly, against a certain peer of this realm, for interfering in the said election, contrary to the statute made, &c.

It being half past three o'clock, the committee broke up and adjourned.

Extract of a Letter to Lord George Germaine.

THE Author of this letter confines himself to the naval and military force of the Colonies, and considers how far they are equal, upon an offensive and a defensive plan, to a contest with the Mother Country. And he thinks that he cannot give the reader a better idea of the naval force of North-America, than by a list of the privateers which the single province of New-York fitted out. At a time too when they had a large body of soldiers in the field, 1000 batteau men employed in the rivers and lakes, and carried on an extensive commerce to every part of the world.

The author then gives the names of the privateers, the number of guns and men employed on board each of them. The total of which amounts to vessels 48, guns 675, men 5550.—He then proceeds thus:

“ From the above state your lordship will observe, that the single province of New-York equipt an armament consisting of 48 vessels, which carried 675 guns, and 5550 seamen. It is near twenty years since they made this figure at sea: I believe I may venture to assert, that since that period their number of ships and seamen have been nearly doubled, and as their coasting and foreign trade is now restrained by act parliament, it may be presumed that they will have a body of 11,000 seamen ready to act against Great Britain: if to these be added the sailors and fishermen of the whole continent, whom our oppressive acts have deprived of employment, and consequently given to the defence of their several provinces; I believe I speak within compass, when I say, that the number will exceed 40,000. My Lord, I assert, that the Americans can send 40,000 seamen to sea; but that is not all, they will all be volunteers, and they will fight without pay, or, what is the same thing, they will pay themselves; for those who fit out privateers do it at their own risk and for their own profit, and those who man them receive no wages; the owners and the crews will be amply rewarded by the prizes they will take. For it cannot be supposed, that a people whom you have deprived of their trade, will leave yours unmolested; they will attack you in every part of the world, and your whole fleet distributed in convoys, will not secure your commerce. In the West-Indies particularly they will annoy you, where every French and Spanish port will be open to the reception of their vessels and your spoils. If this war should continue a few years, I should not be surprised if we were obliged to purchase our own rum and sugar from the French and Spaniards. You are not to suppose that your fleet will be masters of all the harbours in North America, and that their cruizers cannot put to sea; there are many which your ships cannot enter, for want of a sufficient depth of water; and many, which have not a natural bar to your entrance, are very sufficiently fortified by art. And here I must observe, that you are under a great error, if you think the Americans want artillery; they were well provided with great guns even before they took your ordnance store-ships in sight of your fleet; and they have made a most judicious disposition of them. In several harbours they have batteries of twenty-four pounders, sufficiently retired from the shore not to be domineered from the tops of your ships, and sufficiently near enough to make a cullender of their hulls. Lord Howe himself, brave as he is, has too much judgment to attack such a battery, he knows there is no sort of comparison between an oak plant and an eighteen foot rampart; these batteries batteries are all defended by redoubts, infinitely more formidable than that which cost you only a thousand men upon Bunker's-hill. Upon this sort of fortification I shall say a word or two before I finish this letter, which may possibly deserve your lordship's attention; in the mean time, I would advise you to stop Colonel James and his bomb-ketches; they will answer no end, very effectual measures are taken to prevent those vessels from arriving at Philadelphia, or lying before Charles-town or New-York; in every place that is accessible to this paltry piece of mischief, the houses that are worth preserving are shoared from the cellar to the garret, covered with dung or earth, and will suffer little damage; indeed, the owner of every wooden house, which you may possibly destroy, after a whole day's bombardment, would be glad to save you the trouble, and set fire to it himself for one tenth part of the money it will cost you to burn it; but I dare say, this abominable project will be laid aside; it would disgrace us, in the eyes of the world; we should be execrated like Lewis XIV. for burning the Palatinate, with this difference, that the Palatines were not his own subjects.

But whatever may be the plan of your naval operations, it must necessarily be suspended during the winter; in the course of which I conclude, that the Americans will have equipt and sent to sea from different parts above 250 sail of privateers, many of them little inferior to your frigates, and all of them much better manned in proportion to their size; since, then, you have provoked this nest of hornets, be assured, they will commit all sorts of depredations on your trade, and woe be to your merchants ships in every part of the world.—In Africa, in the West-Indies, and even in the East, in the Mediterranean, in the Channel, perhaps upon your own coasts, and on the Baltic; you have no fleet in the Baltic, France has once forbid your sending one there, and they will again forbid you; Sweden is the friend of France, and wherever a French, or Spanish, or a Swedish port is to be found, the Americans are at home.—Will they suffer your Prussian allies to send you naval stores, and will you be able to import any from Sweden, except in Swedish bottoms and at their own price? So much for the naval armament of the Americans.

Let us examine their strength on shore:

I have been favoured, by an American, with the following account of the numbers which each province can furnish, which I believe is by no means exaggerated; they are effective men with arms in their hands, not in buckram or upon paper, as a certain army I could mention.

Provinces.	Men Bearing Arms.
New Hampshire	- - 18,000
Massachusetts	- - 88,000
Rhode Island and Providence	14,000
Connecticut	- - 40,000
New York	- - 40,000
The Jerseys	- - 24,000
Pennsylvania	- - 100,000
Maryland	- - 34,000
Virginia	- - 34,000
North Carolina	- - 18,000
South Carolina	- - 12,000
Georgia	- - 2,400
Nova Scotia (supposed to be } revolted) about }	4,000
428,400

Here then are four hundred and twenty-eight thousand four hundred freemen in arms, united in one great phalanx, to fight pro aris et focis. What a tremendous band of ycomanry! Europe, degenerate Europe, nay, I may even venture to say the old world cannot exhibit such a spectacle; and shall haughty Britain, the shadow of her former greatness! shall Britain, with her mercenaries and her miserable substituted militia, pretend to look this formidable power in the face? But they are undisciplined rabble, and you will send 50,000 to subdue them: that is sooner said than done, my Lord; they are nothing less than an undisciplined rabble, and so far from subduing the continent with your 50,000 men (if you could send that number) you will find sufficient employment for them in the single province of Massachusetts Bay. You will credit what I say when I assure you, that, exclusive of the lines with which they have invested Boston, the continental army have constructed an octagon at Cambridge, which you would not be able to invest with less than 100,000 men. It is built upon Marshal Saxe's plan; it is fraised and pallisaded, has a ditch, covered-way, and glacis, and is well provided with heavy artillery; at the foot of the glacis is an abbatis de bois; the ramparts are casemated with legs: at the distance of a cannon shot from the covered-way is a circle of thirty-six square wooden towers, thirty feet diameter.

meter, the outward half of which are solid and cannon proof. Between these towers, which are five hundred yards asunder, is another abbatiss, and on the top of each are placed five or six rifle-barrelled ball pieces, which carry a half-pound ball; each of these towers will require a little siege to knock it down, and woe be to those who serve your guns when you approach near them. Your batteries will be plunged, and neither mantelets nor aim-frontlets will protect your gunners, and yet under these disadvantages you must ruin ten at least of these towers, before you can form a single attack upon the body of the place, which will be defended by ten thousand men, whilst you may expect thirty or forty thousand more in the field ready to fall upon you and raise the siege; but I shall say no more of this sort, except that you will never take it, or, if by a miracle you should, your army will be so weakened, that you will not take another in the same campaign; perhaps there is not in North America another place so strong as this, but there are many that are by no means contemptible. Old Gridley (the same who conducted the siege of Louisbourg when the Americans took it in 1745) Old Gridley, I say, has formed a corps of engineers, whom he has instructed particularly in the method of constructing redoubts. There is a chain of these fortifications from one end of the continent to the other; they are generally a square, capable of containing four thousand men, with four bastions, a ditch, cover'd-way and glacis, fraised, palissaded, and surrounded by an abbatiss and trous de loup. Your Lordship must know the difficulty of taking such a redoubt, but if you don't, ask General Haldimand (one of the bravest and best officers in your army) he commanded the grenadiers at Ticonderoga, and can tell you what it cost to attack the breast work and abbatiss at that place; a German artist at Philadelphia has engraved on a copper-plate, a plan and elevation of one of these redoubts, and prints of it are distributed all over the country."

To preserve the Colour and Form of Plants and Flowers

S I R,

ALTHOUGH it is not essentially necessary to preserve the colour and form of those plants which are used in medicine, yet it is certainly desirable and there is great reason to believe that the less change the plant undergoes before it is used, the more of its native properties it retains; besides, as the preservation of beautiful leaves and flowers in their original shape and colours, and putting them at once in a state in which they can suffer no subsequent change, but from very long time and accident, will possibly afford an agreeable amusement to many of your readers, I therefore send you a particular account of a process by which this may be effected; which is attended neither with trouble nor expence.

Yours, &c.

X.

Wash a sufficient quantity of fine sand, so as perfectly to separate it from all other substances; dry it; pass it through a sieve to clear it from any gross particles which would not rise in the washing; take an earthen vessel, of a proper size and form, for every plant and flower which you intend to preserve; gather your plants and flowers when they are in a state of perfection, and in dry weather, and always with a convenient proportion of the stalk; heat a little of the dry sand, prepared as above, and lay it in the bottom of the vessel, so as equally to cover it; lay the plant or flower upon it, so as that no part of it may touch the sides of the vessel; sift or shake in more of the same sand, by little and little, upon it, so that the leaves may be extended by degrees, and without injury, till the plant or flower is covered about two inches thick; put this vessel into a stove or hot-house, heated by little and little to the 50th degree; let it stand there a day or two, or perhaps more, according to the thickness and succulence of the flower or plant; then gently shake the sand out upon a sheet of paper, and take out the plant, which you will find in all its beauty; the shape as elegant, and the colour as vivid, as when it grew. Some flowers require certain little operations to preserve the adherence of their petals; particularly the tulip, with respect to which it is necessary, before it is buried in the sand, to cut the triangular fruit which rises in the middle of the flower; for the petal will then remain more firmly attached to the stalk.

A hortus siccus, prepared in this manner, would be one of the most beautiful curiosities that can be.

A. Correspondent

A Correspondent has favoured us with some interesting Particulars of the Life of Mrs. Margaret, alias Carolina Rudd; as they appeared to be Original, and bear strong marks of Authenticity, we shall insert them.

— “Nothing extenuate,
“Nor ought set down in Malice.”

WITHIN the memory of man, and I believe it may with truth be said, there never yet was such capital forgeries committed, nor for so long a time successfully carried on, as those by the two Perreaus and Mrs. Rudd. The high sphere of life they lived in, the many persons of rank they were acquainted with, and the known extensive and profitable profession of Mr. Robert Perreau, threw a blind over every suspicion that might arise of their being guilty of such atrocious offences. The Perreaus have endeavoured to defend themselves, and accuse Mrs. Rudd as the origin and instigation of their being guilty of the crimes laid to their charge; in return, Mrs. Rudd answered their defence, and though she owned herself guilty of being accessory to the forgery, yet pleaded strongly in her own behalf, as having done it through compulsion.

Margaret, alias Carolina Rudd was the daughter of an honest and industrious apothecary, in the town of Lurgan, in Ireland, whose name was Youngson, and though his practice did not bring him in a vast income, yet with that, and the contract he had for making of pot-ash, for the use of the linen manufacture there, he found means to support his family in a decent manner. He had also six or seven small cabbins or huts, which he let at the rent of eight or ten pounds per annum, which were all mortgaged, and at his death fell into the mortgagees hands.

After the death of Mr. Youngson, Margaret was left under the care and protection of the sister of Mr. S—— of Ballymarron. She was then at the boarding-school, and being of a gay and volatile disposition, began to discover her wild inclinations very early in life, and soon after the death of her father, her unruly deportment, and her imprudent actions, obliged her mistress to send her home, as her behaviour was of great prejudice to her school. She had now attained the age of sixteen or seventeen years, and gave striking marks of her future foibles. It need not be mentioned, that a young woman, endowed with a sprightly wit, a lively temper, and an agreeable person, did not fail of meeting with plenty of admirers, who met with no material discouragement. This was the case with Margaret, and every day brought some fresh adorer, to buoy up her vanity by flattering her charms.

Among the number of her admirers was Mr. Rudd, a lieutenant of an Irish brigade, then stationed at that place; this gentleman was the son of an eminent grocer at St. Albans, who bestowed on him a very liberal education, and when he was of proper age, sent him to the university, in order to qualify him for the pulpit; but the young gentleman not approving this sedentary life, he acquainted his father with his sentiments, who obtained him the above post through the interest of Mr. West and Jones. Whether Mr. Rudd made any impression on the heart of this young heroine, or whether the prospect of a future support induced her, we cannot tell; certain it is, that they were married by the Rev. Mr. ———, a minister in the Lutheran religion. Mr. Rudd's father dying soon after, he took his wife over to England, with a resolution to live happy and retired, with his dear Caroline, upon the estate his father had left him, said to be about 3000l.

Mr. Valentine Rudd, and his amiable consort, being come over to England, they resided in Hertfordshire, supported and maintained themselves tolerably and decently on the money that arose from Mr. Rudd's half-pay, the rents of his estate, and by breaking in a little at a time upon the estate itself. In this manner, they lived for some time, to all appearance happy and uninterrupted, nor did any discontent seem to appear, nor was there any animosity or dislike observed on either side, but harmony and affection seemed to smile upon them till the summer of 1766, when an unfortunate circumstance happened, which removed that entire confidence and reliance Mr. Rudd put in the honour and fidelity of his faithful Peggy, as he used to term her.

In the above summer of 1766, Mr. and Mrs. Rudd quitted their house in the country, to reside in London, the encroachment they had made on their estate, obliging them to live within a narrower compass: Mr. Rudd therefore took the first floor of the house of one Mr. Marceilles, a taylor, in Princes-street, Cavendish-square. Unfortunately, they had not long lived in their new situation, before one Capt. Benjamin Bowen Read, came likewise to lodge in the second floor ; he was looked upon as a young gentleman of a good family, and of a good fortune. Dwelling in the same house, and not deficient in assurance, he soon contracted an acquaintance with Mr. Rudd and his wife ; the person and conversation of the female were too powerful not to attract the heart of a sprightly young fellow ; he, therefore immediately resolved to lay close siege to a garriſon, which his former experience in amorous intrigues, convinced him was not likely to hold out againſt a vigorous attack, but would ſoon ſurrender to the terms he ſhould offer ; accordingly, he directly ſet about gaining the good graces of that lady, and, as ſame reports, with ſuch ſucceſs, that they ſoon began to lay plans for her elopement, that they might indulge their amorous intercourſe uninterrupted by the fears of the watchful eye of a deceived huſband.

However, Mr. Rudd's affection for his wife continued as ſtrong as at firſt ; nor had he the leaſt ſhadow of doubt and ſuſpicion of any amorous intrigue carried on between her and the captain till the month of October, 1766, when Capt. Benjamin Bowen Read left his apartment in Prince's-ſtreet, and went to lodge at the houſe of one Bradshaw, a ſurgeon and apothecary, in Ratcliffe Highway.

A ſhort time after the captain had quitted his lodgings, Mr. Rudd intercepted a letter directed to his wife ; obſerving the hand-writing to be rather maſculine, his curioſity was roused, and having opened the letter, he, for the firſt time, ſuſpected the honour his faithful Peggy had conferred upon him ; and though he had not been an eye-witneſs of their familiarity, yet the letter breathed too tender expreſſions to leave him the leaſt doubt of the antling ornament his wife had adorned his brows with. Mrs. Rudd had no ſooner returned from a viſit ſhe had been making, than her huſband, throwing her the letter, and at the ſame time giving her a look of anger and contempt, expreſſed his ſurpriſe and aſtoniſhment, that as a married woman ſhe ſhould carry on a correſpondence with a young fellow, whom they had ſo ſlight an acquaintance with. This ſudden ſtroke a little diſconcerted the lady, but as ſhe was ſeldom at a loſs for excuſes, ſhe ſoon recovered herſelf, attempted to laugh it off as only a frolick of the captain's, and endeavoured by every evaſive method to calm his ſuſpicions ; but 'twas in vain, the letter was too poignantly worded to permit him to give way to any of her artificeſ, and he kept remonſtra-ting to her in very harſh terms : words preſently aroſe, and, for the firſt time a ſerious quarrel enſued between them. Mr. Rudd left her in a rage, and the lady retired to lie in a different bed from her huſband.

Mrs. Rudd, who had long wiſhed for an opportunity to elope, took advantage of this quarrel, and the next morning, tying up ſome of her moſt valuable things, ſhe left the houſe before any of the family was ſtirring, and ſecretly went to the lodging of her Cicibeoat Ratcliffe Croſs, in whoſe arms we ſhall leave her for a ſhort time, and return to her huſband.

Mr. Rudd, whoſe uneaſineſs of mind permitted him to have little or no ſleep, was no ſooner got up than he went into the room where ſhe had lain that night, in order to forgive what had paſſed, and in hopes of bringing her back to her former duty ; but how great was his ſurpriſe to find her eloped ! he immediately concluded, ſhe muſt have gone to the captain's, and reſolved to take every ſtep to find her out, and recover her, if poſſible.

Not many days paſſed, before by a very ſtrict enquiry, he learnt where the captain lodged, and directly repaired to the houſe ; but although he was firmly convinced his wife was at that time in the houſe, he was not permitted to ſee her. He went ſeveral times afterwards, but it was in vain, and he almoſt deſpaired, though he was determined to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to reclaim a woman for whom he had ſo great a regard.

About the month of March, 1767, Capt. Read is ſaid to have been obliged to go abroad, or abſcond, on account of ſome debts he had contracted. Mr. Rudd now had an opportunity of finding his wife, and, out of a generoſity of ſentiment, he took a lodging for her, and ſupported her in it. Capt. Read had not been long abſent before the perſon, at whoſe houſe Mrs. Rudd lodged during the time ſhe lived with Capt. Read, had the aſſurance to arreſt Mr. Rudd for the board and lodging of his wife, and other neceſſaries ſupplied her, to the amount of ninety pounds. Mr. Rudd for want of bail was ſent to the king's-bench, and remained there ſome time ; at length he procured ſome friends to bail him : but although he had experienced his wife's ungenerous treatment, and he might likely have caſt the plaintiff if it had come to a trial, as Capt. Read was the proper perſon who ought to have paid the debt ; yet, ſo tender was he of her, her, that rather than expose her in a court of judicature, he compounded the matter, and thus quietly put an end to the business.

Mr. Rudd now lived entirely separate from his wife, his own lodging being in Buckingham-court, and those he had taken for Mrs. Rudd being in Scotland-yard, at the house of one Mr. Thompson: they continued thus till the year 1767, when misfortunes that had happened, and debts which had been contracted, and which he was obliged to pay, had so far reduced him, as to oblige him to sell his estate in Hertfordshire, to satisfy his creditors: this being done, he found the remainder of his cash to amount to about the sum of one thousand six hundred pounds.

About this time Mrs. Rudd expressed her dislike of her lodgings at Mrs. Thompson's, and having obtained her husband's consent to leave them, went and lodged at one Mr. Scott's, in Charles-street, Westminster. Mr. Rudd was now in such perfect expectation of his wife's contrition and amendment, that he went often to visit her at her new apartments, and there was then all the prospect to believe, that had her behaviour continued in the manner she then acted, a perfect reconciliation would have been brought about, all former foibles forgiven, and the rest of their lives passed happy and uninterrupted, without either of their names being exposed to public censure.

Though the regard she had for Capt. Read, was for a while smothered by his absence, yet it failed not to blaze out again the very first opportunity. About the month of September, she received a letter from the captain, or some of his emissaries, acquainting her that he was at Guilford, in Surry: this news awakened all her former fondness for her lover, and she a second time prepared for an ungenerous elopement from her husband, who had given her such strong proofs of his love and generosity. She accordingly, having furnished herself with a post-chaise, made the utmost expedition to the captain, and remained with him two days and two nights. How, after this fresh instance of her misconduct, she could imagine her husband would again be the dupe to her insinuating methods, is wonderful! but certain it was, she returned to Mr. Scott's, with as perfect a composure, as if she had only been upon a trifling visit. It was now in vain, she sent for Mr. Rudd: he refused to see her, and was determined not to maintain a woman who was so abandoned, and who tried every means to bring both herself and him into disgrace.

Although Mr. Rudd would no longer see his wife, yet he resolved, that he would leave her clear of any debts that he knew of: he therefore went to Mrs. Scott's, paid her what was due, and gave her notice, that she should no longer trust his wife on his account; and soon after had an advertisement inserted in the Daily Advertiser, forbidding all persons to trust his wife on his credit.

She remained not a very long time after this at Mrs. Scott's house, but went back to Mrs. Thompson's, who finding her husband would no longer pay for her board, she refused to let her remain there. When Mrs. Rudd found she was not able to succeed with Mrs. Thompson, she by some means or other found out the house of one Mr. Hyde, where she lodged and boarded from the beginning of the month of November, 1767, till about the middle of January, 1768, about twelve weeks in all.

About this time, some friends interposed between Mr. Rudd and his wife, and a treaty was set on foot between them, either for a total separation, or a reconciliation between them. Mr. Hyde, who had been deceived in respect to Mrs. Rudd, cheerfully entrusted her with board and lodging, looking upon Mr. Rudd as a man of fortune, and he should get his money of him some time or another. But Mr. Rudd refusing payment, Mr. Hyde brought an action at law against him for the money, which was tried the first sittings (April 26, 1768) in Easter term, at Westminster-hall. Mr. Solicitor-General and Mr. Mansfield being counsel for Mr. Rudd, who was obliged to pay the money; but as the public may chuse to know some further particulars of this cause, and to prove the authenticity of our assertions, we shall give an abstract of the brief of one of the counsel.

The plaintiff at first, when Mrs. Rudd came to live with him, was told by Mrs. Thompson, that she lived apart from the husband; but, he being represented as a man of fortune, the plaintiff conceived that he should be able to make him pay, and took Mrs. Rudd into his house upon that peril, and told Mrs. Rudd frequently that he was not uneasy about payment; that she might stay there a year, and then he would sue her husband and make him pay; but the plaintiff did not chuse to stay so long for when he found that Mrs. Rudd was likely to be reconciled to her husband.

he began to grow clamorous for his money, and refused to let her stay any longer, unless he was paid; and he sent Mr. Rudd a bill, charging a guinea and an half a week for his wife's board and lodging; this, he thought a very extravagant demand, and much beyond what he could afford to pay for his wife's maintenance, and at first, he was determined not to pay any thing, as the plaintiff had trusted her at his peril, knowing that she had eloped from her husband; nay, he had actually read the advertisement put in the Daily Advertiser by Mr. Rudd's order: however, as Mr. Rudd was likely to be reconciled to his wife, he was recommended to pay the plaintiff what was reasonable and have done with him: and accordingly, he did make him an offer of a guinea a week. No; the plaintiff would not accept it, but at once brings an action; and as Mr. Rudd had once made the offer he would not recede from it, but has paid 12 guineas into court, and little imagined the plaintiff would have been so rash as to stand a trial for the remainder.

The question now to be tried is, what the plaintiff ought to recover of the defendant for the expences of his wife who had eloped from him, and was well known by the plaintiff to live separate from him; and here it is to be observed, that if the defendant, under the circumstances of the case, was obliged to maintain his wife at all, it could only be in a reasonable way, and according to his degree and estate.

It is also presumed, that the money paid into court is, at all events, a full satisfaction to plaintiff for the board and lodging of Mrs. Rudd, for she lodged in his two pair of stairs, and the manner of the plaintiff's living was very mean, and she found her own tea, sugar, wine, coals, and candles.

It seems to be a settled rule of law, that the necessaries supplied a wife, whilst she lives separate from the husband, should be only necessary and convenient for the husband's estate as well as degree.—How is it in the present case? the husband, Mr. Rudd, is a lieutenant on half pay on the Irish establishment, which produces him 32l. a year; and he has the interest of about 1600l. the money left from the sale of his estate, which produces him, at 4 per cent. 60l. a year, so that his whole income is but 96l. a year, and if he was to pay 1l. 11s. 6d. a week for his wife's board and maintenance, he would have nothing left for her to live on, without breaking in upon the principal of his little fortune; wherefore, it is hoped that the court and jury will consider the money paid into court as an ample satisfaction for the plaintiff's demand, considering the defendant's degree and estate.

To prove the manner of Mrs. Rudd's living at Mrs. Thompson's, what she there paid a week, and that she lived apart from her husband. Call Ann Thompson, who will also prove, that the plaintiff was made acquainted with Mrs. Rudd's situation.

Ann Thompson. When he took her in, and that he trusted her at his peril, and that he even read and knew of the advertisement being inserted by Mr. Rudd, which was acknowledged by the plaintiff's wife to Mrs. Thompson; and Mrs. Thompson will also depose, that a guinea a week is an ample satisfaction to plaintiff.

Histories of the Tete-a-Tete annexed; or; Memoirs of the Ryegate Amorous, and Lady Pyeald.

IN the variety of amorous connections which the commencement of each month introduces to our readers, many characters are portrayed with strong traits of criminality, error, and folly. In the first list may be chiefly found the married libertines, whose obscure and concealed infringements on the laws of morality proceed from a vicious mind. In the second may be traced those, who freed from guardians and parental monitors, authorized by wealth, and seduced by passion, yield to their inordinate desires, and dissipate a splendid fortune, or a flourishing estate, in requiring the favours of their extravagant mistresses. The last catalogue is as numerous as either of the former, being neither confined to age or youth; and as their whimsical passions are strongly tinged with ridicule, they lavish their fortunes upon those Thais's, who hold them in sovereign contempt, and may, therefore, with propriety be styled the laughable lovers.

The amour with which we shall now present our readers, does not derive its source from mutual fondness, as may easily be imagined, but from revenge on the one side, and interest on the other; two motives that rarely meet upon these occasions. A lady bordering on the verge of sixty, and a sprightly youth of three and twenty, form an union so risible and preposterous, that we should scarcely credit its reality, had not Horace declared there was a Venus, cui placet impares jungere formas. Our hero and heroine wish not to lay claim to a noble ancestry, nor are their progenitors greatly celebrated in history; but she being exalted to the rank of a peeress, we doubt not but our readers will be interested in the anecdotes of her life. Lady Pyebald, the wife of a nobleman, who with propriety holds the most distinguished seat in the regions of gallantry, was lineally descended from a broken tradesman, within the confines of this metropolis. The voice of fame, though sometimes not to be credited, seems to have spoken truth in proclaiming her ladyship an illegitimate daughter; be this as it may, she was bound apprentice to a milliner near Leicester-fields. It is reported, that during her apprenticeship, she was strongly solicited by a young officer, who was not unsuccessful in recommending his suit. This affair remained a profound secret to all but one of her female intimates, whose envy at her ladyship's exaltation, has since induced her to reveal it. Whilst she was in this station she caught the eye of his lordship, who was equally the patron of the countesses and the beggar: like a second Quixote, he beheld the charms of his Dulcinea with exquisite sensations. Can we then be surprized that he should stoop to conquer? or that the peerless beauty of so bright an angel should allure the lascivious eyes of lord Pyebald?

A milliner's shop is, perhaps, after the stage, the most favourable situation for a pretty female to display her charms in; and the facility of access to every passenger, renders it a very critical seat for a handsome girl to avoid the consequences attendant on the importunities of wealth and rank. His lordship entered the shop, and gave orders for some ruffles, which were to be carried to a certain lodging he constantly kept for his temporary intrigues. He gave his address in a fictitious name, but the young lady knew his rank and character; and she profited of the occasion to carry home his order. He was punctual to the time he had appointed, and a very agreeable tete-a-tete ensued, in which he made her such overtures, as induced our heroine to pay them attention. Among others, he proposed setting her up in a genteel shop, and recommending her to several good customers. Accordingly we find her soon after in this situation, when his lordship paid his visits to her very regularly.

Thus situated, tasting the sweets of this connexion, she resolved to exert all her powers, and animate all her charms, to rivet the chains of her admirer, and preclude the interposition of a rival. To this end she called in the auxiliaries of dress, in which she had some taste, that was displayed to advantage. These assiduities to please had their desired effect; and notwithstanding his lordship's well known penchant for variety, he was not suspected of having any connexion for a considerable time, but with this emphasis of his affections. Finding her influence so firmly established, she resolved to try a bold stroke, and grasp a coronet. A fit of illness favoured her design; she perceived his lordship greatly affected at her situation, and in one of those tender intervals in which he expressed his grief for her complaints, she seized him by the hand, and tenderly kissing it, said, "My lord, death has no terrors to me, could I but quit this life with an irreproachable character—your lordship has it in your power to make me happy, amidst all the agonies of my disorder—make me your wife, and I shall yield my last breath without a pang." This unexpected address greatly disconcerted his lordship—he was for a minute speechless; but he so forcibly intreated a reply, that he was compelled to answer, and require a short time to consider of it. At this instant Dr. H—— entered, and released his lordship from his embarrassment. After Esculapius had prescribed for his patient, lord Pyebald took him aside, and informed him of the request Mrs. ——— had made; and asked the doctor what he would advise him to do! To which Dr. H—— replied, "She is on the brink of the grave—she cannot live four and twenty hours." This information had a greater weight with his lordship than even Mrs. S——'s solicitation, and he immediately resolved to comply with what he judged was her dying request.

No sooner was the gordian knot tied than she daily recovered, not a little to the mortification of his lordship, whose affection gradually cooled as her health became restored. They now seldom met but at meals, and the lover was so entirely lost in the husband, that they had separate beds, and his lordship gave a loose to his passion for variety. Revenge soon fired her breast, and she resolved, in her anger, upon retaliation with the first man that pleased her fancy. Nevertheless, we cannot find that for several years any accusation could be brought against her; probably, after the first emotions emotions of her wrath subsided, prudence dictated to her to combat her resentment.

At length, however, viewing the gradual decrease of her charms, she feared that the opportunity would slip of ensuring another conquest, if she delayed any longer making the attempt. Whilst she was meditating upon this subject, chance threw the Ryegate hero in her way. Their unexpected meeting was occasioned by lord Pyebald's absence, when he waited upon him about business. His name being announced to her ladyship, he was introduced to her, and his person and address made so great an impression upon our heroine; that she concluded fortune had thrown him in her way to accomplish those wishes she had just been ruminating upon.

Our hero, though he was not a beau garçon, was young and agreeable: the fair sex had, for some years, been the objects of his chief attention, and he had not been unsuccessful in his pursuits. He possessed a fluency of speech, with an agreeable tone of voice, and had that kind of rhetoric which is very apt to prevail with the ladies. The Ryegate hero received his birth in the town from whence he has derived his title. His father is a private gentleman, who plumes himself upon having a vote for knight of the shire; is a great stickler for patriotism and liberty, and strenuously exclaims against ministerial influence. Our hero was in his youth placed under the tuition of a clergyman, who endeavoured to inspire him with a great veneration for classic lore. Amorofo was charmed with Ovid, as that poet's sentiments entirely coincided with his own; but crooked Greek hurt his eyes, and to preserve them he carefully avoided Homer and all his Grecian successors.

Whilst he was still pursuing his studies, the belles of Ryegate were not insensible of his polite address, and his epistles breathed all the warmth of the tender passion which he had caught, or rather stolen from his classic master: for having naturally no turn for poetry, it was much easier to copy from an English translation, than to puzzle his brain in scanning of rhymes, which he was conscious would be far inferior, so that he purchased poetic fame at a very easy rate, and made impressions from the antient bards, upon the modern Ryegate beauties.

His father thinking that he had gleaned from the patriotic Romans a sufficient quantity of their heroic sentiments, to support his zeal for his country's cause, judged it time to fix Amorofo in some business; and accordingly gave him a recommendatory letter to Mr. S——, an eminent merchant of this city, whose political sentiments entirely coincided with his own. Amorofo accordingly repaired to the metropolis, when Mr. S—— received him with great cordiality, as the son of his old friend, and placed him in his counting house.

London, that great mart of intrigue, as well as commerce, afforded a noble field for our hero to display his amorous abilities. He was soon introduced to some demoiselles, whom he then thought upon the ton; but a little experience undeceived him, and he could, in a short time, discriminate between a grisette and a woman of spirit. Yet this experience, short as it was, Amorofo thought pretty dearly purchased.

Ranelagh, and the other polite public places, he often frequented, and has more than once made his appearance at the Pantheon. By his address and complacency he got into good company, and as he no longer appeared a cit on the west side of Temple Bar, he often mingled with his superiors. Among others of that class he formed a kind of intimacy with a member of the lower house, who judged that Amorofo could be of some service to him in a correspondence he was desirous of entering upon with a young lady of fortune, who had lately retired from London into Wales, upon a family visit: but the member being conscious of his want of literary abilities, having, indeed, very much neglected his studies, and scarce ever used his pen but upon a frank or receipt; he was fearful that, by betraying his ignorance on paper, he should lose his mistress. He revealed the secret to Amorofo, and the latter agreed to be secretary, and write to the lady in his name. Our hero accordingly entered upon the task, and with the assistance of his old friend Ovid, secured the lady for his patron, and obtained a considerable sum for hush money. This supply came very opportunely, as his dissipation had thrown him into such embarrassed circumstances as were likely soon to threaten his liberty.

It was about this period that he gained admittance to lady Pyebald, and made such an impression on her, that though she could have entirely finished the business that Amorofo then came about, she desired him to return the next day about the same hour. Our hero did not want discernment upon these occasions: he very judiciously thought he had made an impression on lady Pyebald, and that she entertained a partiality for him. In this opinion he returned the next day, dressed to the best advantage, and might, with propriety, have been stiled the Maccaroni Cit.

It were needless to say that an eclaircissement soon ensued. Lord Pyebald was still in the country, so that there was no kind of impediment to their frequent rendezvous, which were conducted with great privacy. These interviews were seldom less frequent than thrice a week, and continued so for a considerable time, till a fit of illness obliged Amoroso to leave town for the benefit of the country air. He has accordingly retired within a few miles of her ladyship's country house, and for his amusement, or rather the appearance of business, he has the superintendence of the education of some young gentlemen.

Lady Pyebald's visits being now from necessity rather diminished, our hero may, upon the complete recovery of his health, turn his thoughts to some more juvenile object, though her ladyship's attachment is equally strong as at the commencement of the alliance; and her liberality is as unbounded as her passion: wherefore Amoroso has no reason, in point of interest, to desire a discontinuance of the partiality she entertains for him.

To this renowned votary of Venus, lady Pyebald is cordially united; and when our readers consider the foundation and different circumstances of their passion, they must be satisfied that they exhibit as pretty a picture of risible gallantry, as can be met with in this metropolis.

When her ladyship cannot conveniently visit him in the country, she amuses herself by parading the streets of this metropolis in an evening (for our heroine has an utter aversion to make her public appearance in day light) and her pyebalds may be seen, prancing through the streets between the hours of eight and nine, whilst she is ruminating upon her lover, and anticipating those joys in imagination, which she expects in a few days to realize. It is supposed, however, by the design that has been sent us of this lady, that she has lately had as severe a fit of illness, probably owing to her lover's absence, as at the time she made an honourable conquest of his lordship.

The History of Blanca Rubea of Padua.

OF all the heroines recorded in history, the most extraordinary, the most intrepid, and the most beautiful, was a woman but little known out of the precincts of her native country; but whose name is to this day revered by her country with the most ardent esteem, and a sort of games every year celebrated at Padua to continue the remembrance of her virtues. The woman I mean was Blanca Rubea.

Blanca was the daughter of a nobleman at Padua, and was born in the year 1235: from her infancy she testified the most extraordinary degree of courage, even greater than that usually found among men. Her beauty surpassed her mental endowments; and, as she grew up, it procured her numberless suitors. But she disdained them all, declaring that it was unworthy a generous woman to marry any who owned themselves to be slaves; and professing that, while her country continued in bondage she disdained to be a bride. All her ardour however was unable to rouse her spirited country into a sense of their freedom; wherefore she undertook to shew them, in her own person, an example of heroic fortitude. Petrarch describes her, as most patient of labour, and undergoing fatigue with the most surprising constancy. Moderate in diet, but altogether abstaining from strong liquors, though at that time much in fashion even among the softer sex. Ever modest, but ever daring: she utterly abjured the needle and the distaff, and, instead of these, buckled on her brazen armour, grasped her spear and target, and remained whole nights without sleeping, and whole days without taking any rest. If necessity at any time compelled her to submit to fatigue, the earth was her bed, and her shield served her for a pillow. She abandoned the society of women, and all her companions were selected from such commanders as had gained reputation in war. But, though she conversed with such, yet she ever kept at the most respectful distance, and was as much an enthusiast in guarding her virtue, as in the profession of arms. Such was the woman that undertook to break the bonds of her country, and vindicate their ancient freedom.

Among the number of those, who at that time resided in Padua, was Baptista Porta, a young foldier of fortune, who appeared most forward to imitate her example; and, though a foreigner, seemed more touched with the misery of the people, than they themselves seemed to be. His valour charmed her, but but his wisdom more ; in short, after in the most solemn manner, having promised to labour with her in the restoration of the city's liberties, she consented to be married to him, and their nuptials were accordingly celebrated with the utmost pomp and magnificence.

Acciolinus was at that time the tyrant of the place, and held the citizens in the most unufferable bondage ; however, being obliged, upon a certain occasion, to leave the city with his forces, Baptista, and Bafianus, who was deputy-governor, caused the gates to be shut, and soon after sent Acciolinus an open defiance, and openly asserted the cause of liberty. It is impossible to express the rage and resentment of Acciolinus upon this occasion ; but, moderating his passion, he pretended to be willing to accede to a treaty, and proposed the citizens such terms as they found it their interest not to refuse.

In the mean time, however, all these negotiations were but a pretence to cover his real design ; for in the night he had placed in ambush, near one of the gates, a body of the most courageous of his troops, ordering them that, as soon as ever the gates should be opened to admit those who were to transact the negotiation, they should rush into the city, and put all the inhabitants, without distinction, to the sword. These orders were executed with punctuality, and, unfortunately for the unhappy citizens, with too much success. A scene of slaughter ensued upon opening the gates ; murders, rapes, and all the horrid cruelties of an incensed, barbarous, avaricious, enemy, ensued.

In the midst of this carnage, Baptista was seen manfully fighting with the intrepid Blanca, his wife, by his side. Their courage for a while seemed to make victory doubtful ; but at last the husband, oppressed with wounds and fatigue, fell without a groan. Blanca still however stood over his dead corpse with a portended spear, and fought with surprising intrepidity ; but what could she do against a multitude ? the citizens were almost all slain, and she an only survivor ; in short, when no longer able to wield her sword, she was taken captive, and brought before Acciolinus the conqueror.

Neither fatigue nor sorrow had yet impaired her beauty ; she appeared before him in all the lustre of charms, and even his savage nature was moved at her distress. He therefore gave orders that she should be attended in the most elegant manner, and mixed a look of passion with his natural severity. Soon, however, his pity was converted into love, and he strove, by all the arts of insinuation and flattery, to accomplish his designs ; but he found her inexorable. He now therefore was resolved to try more forcible methods, and had her brought up to an apartment two stories high, where he began to execute his brutal purposes ; but she, bravely running to the window, threw herself out, and fell seemingly lifeless upon the pavement.

She was at last, however, though with much difficulty, recovered from her fall, and, no sooner was her former health restored, than the tyrant again renewed his base solicitations ; still however finding that she detested him, he ordered her to be bound hand and foot, and in this manner forced from her what he had so long desired to possess.

At length, being loosed from those hateful and insufferable bonds, she pretended to dissemble her sorrow, and so far prevailed on her attendants, as to be permitted to visit her dead husband in his tomb.

It was an old burying-place belonging to her family ; and there some poor surviving citizen had carried the body of Baptista all covered over with wounds. Upon entering this gloomy mansion, with a lamp in her hand, she quickly saw the dead body ; and, hanging over it for some time with silent agony, at length she broke forth into the most passionate exclamations, calling out upon the corpse, that was stretched before her, to lend some pity, to look upon her forlorn situation, and to regard the most miserable wretch that ever enjoyed the light : in this manner she continued for some time ; when, hearing the trampling of her attendants feet coming to take her away, with all the force she was possessed of she pulled the ponderous tombstone down upon herself ; which, falling, crushed her to death in an instant : and thus she found a common grave with the dear object of all her affections. The same stone still continues to cover this brave and constant couple, and is shewn to travellers, who visit Padua, to this day.

PAPER, therefore, represents coin; and coin represents real value. That is, the one is a sign of wealth. The other is the sign of that sign.—But farther. Coin is an universal sign of wealth, and will procure it every where. It will bear any alarm, and stand any shock.—On the contrary. Paper, owing its currency to opinion, has only a local and imaginary value. It can stand no shock. It is destroyed by the approach of danger; or even the suspicion of danger.

In short. Coin is the basis of our paper credit; and were it either all destroyed, or were only the quantity of it reduced beyond a certain limit, the paper circulation of the kingdom would sink at once. But, were our paper destroyed, the coin would not only remain, but rise in value, in proportion to the quantity of paper destroyed.

From this account it follows, that as far as, in any circumstances, specie is not to be procured in exchange for paper, it represents nothing, and is worth nothing.—The specie of this kingdom is inconsiderable, compared with the amount of the paper circulating in it. This is generally believed; and, therefore, it is natural to enquire how its currency is supported.—The answer is easy. It is supported in the same manner with all other bubbles. Were all to demand specie in exchange for their notes, payment could not be made; but, at the same time that this is known, every one trusts, that no alarm producing such a demand will happen, while he holds the paper he is possessed of; and that if it should happen, he will stand a chance for being first paid; and this makes him easy. And it also makes all with whom he traffics easy.—But let any events happen which threaten danger; and every one will become diffident. A run will take place; and a bankruptcy follow.

This is an account of what has often happened in private credit. And it is also an account of what will (if no change of measures take place) happen some time or other in public credit. The description I have given of our paper circulation implies, that nothing can be more delicate or hazardous. It is an immense fabrick, with its head in the clouds, that is continually trembling with every adverse blast and every fluctuation of trade; and which, like the baseless fabrick of a vision, may in a moment vanish, and leave no wreck behind.—The destruction of a few books at the bank; an improvement in the art of forgery; the landing of a body of French troops on our coasts; insurrections threatening a revolution in government; or any events that should produce a general panic, however groundless, would at once annihilate it, and leave us without any other medium of traffic, than a quantity of specie scarcely equal in amount to the money now drawn from the public by the taxes. It would, therefore, become impossible to pay the taxes. The revenue would fail. Near a hundred and forty millions of property would be destroyed. The whole frame of government would fall to pieces; and a state of nature would take place.—What a dreadful situation? It has never had a parallel among mankind; except at one time in France after the establishment there of the Royal Mississippi bank. In 1720 this bank broke; * and, after involving for some time the whole kingdom in a golden dream, spread through it in one day, desolation and ruin.—The distress attending such an event, in this free country, would be greater than it was in France. Happily for that kingdom, they have shot this gulph. Paper credit has never since recovered itself there; and their circulating cash consists now all of solid coin, amounting, I am informed, to no less a sum than 1500 millions of Livres; or near 67 millions of pounds sterling. This gives them unspeakable advantages; and, joined to that quick reduction of their debts which is inseparable * from their nature, places them on a ground of safety which we have reason to admire and envy.

These are subjects on which I should have chosen to be silent, did I not think it necessary, that this country should be apprized and warned of the danger which threatens it. This danger is created chiefly by the national debt. High taxes are necessary to support a great public debt; and a large supply of cash is necessary to support high taxes. This cash we owe to our paper; and, in proportion to our paper, must be the productiveness of our taxes.—King William's wars drained the kingdom of its specie. This sunk the revenue, and distressed government. In 1694 the bank was established; and the kingdom was provided with a substitute for specie. The taxes became again productive. The revenue rose; and government was relieved.—Ever since that period our paper and taxes have been increasing together, and supporting one another; and one reason, undoubtedly, of the late increase in the productiveness of our taxes has been the increase of our paper.

Was there no public debt, there would be no occasion for half the present taxes. Our paper circulation might be reduced. The balance of trade would turn in our favour. Specie would flow in upon us. The quantity of property destroyed by a failure of paper credit (should it in such circumstances happen) would be 140 millions less; and, therefore, the shock attending it would be tolerable. But, in the present state of things, whenever any calamity or panic shall produce such a failure, the shock attending it will be intolerable.—May heaven soon raise up for us some great statesman who shall see these things; and enter into effectual
N O T E.

* Their debts consist chiefly of money raised by annuities on lives, short annuities, anticipations of taxes for short terms, &c. During the whole last war they added to their perpetual annuities only 12 millions sterling, according to Sir James Steuart's account; whereas we added to these annuities near 60 millions. In consequence therefore of the nature of their debts, as well as of the management they are now using for hastening the reduction of them, they must in a few years, if peace continues, be freed from most of their incumbrances; while we probably (if no event comes soon that will unburthen us at once) shall continue with them all upon us.

measures, if not now too late, for extricating and preserving us!

Public banks are, undoubtedly, attended with great conveniencies. But they also do great harm; and, if their emissions are not restrained, and conducted with great wisdom, they may prove the most pernicious of all institutions; not only, by substituting fictitious for real wealth; by increasing luxury; by raising the prices of provisions; by concealing an unfavourable balance of trade; and by rendering a kingdom incapable of bearing any internal tumults or external attacks, without the danger of a dreadful convulsion: But particularly, by becoming instruments in the hands of ministers of state to increase their influence, to lessen their dependence on the people, and to keep up a delusive shew of public prosperity, when perhaps, ruin may be near. There is, in truth, nothing that a government may not do with such a mine at its command as a public bank, while it can maintain its credit: nor, therefore, is there any thing more likely to be improperly and dangerously used.—But to return to what may be more applicable to our own state at present.

Among the causes that may produce a failure of paper-credit, there are two which the present quarrel with America calls upon us particularly to consider.—The first is, “An unfavourable balance of trade.” This, in proportion to the degree in which it takes place, must turn the course of foreign exchange against us; raise the price of bullion; and carry off our specie. The danger to which this would expose us is obvious; and it has been much increased by the new coinage of the gold specie which began in 1772. Before this coinage, the greatest part of our gold coin being light, but the same in currency as if it had been heavy, always remained in the kingdom. But, being now full weight, whenever a wrong balance of foreign trade alters the course of exchange, and gold in coin becomes of less value than in bullion, there is reason to fear, that it will be melted down in such great quantities, and exported so fast, as in a little time to leave none behind; * the consequence of which must prove, that the whole superstructure of paper credit, now supported by it, will break down.—The only remedy, in such circumstances, is an increase of coinage at the mint. But this will operate too slowly : and, by raising the price of bullion, will only increase the evil.—It is the bank that at such a time must be the immediate sufferer : For it is from thence that those who want coin for any purpose will always draw it.

For many years before 1772, the price of gold in bullion had been, from 2 to 3 or 4 per cent. higher than in coin. This was a temptation to melt down and export the coin, which could not be resisted. Hence arose a demand for it on the bank ; and, consequently, the necessity of purchasing bullion at a loss for a new coinage. But the more coin the bank procured in this way, the lower its price became in comparison with that of bullion, and the faster it vanished ; and consequently, the more necessary it became to coin again, and the greater loss fell upon the bank.—Had things continued much longer in this train, the consequences might have proved very serious. I am by no means sufficiently informed to be able to assign the causes which have produced the change that happened in 1772. But, without doubt, the state of things that took place before that year must be expected to re-hazardous paper credit.—Mr. Conduit, Sir Isaac Newton's successor in the mint, has proposed, in direct contradiction to the laws now in being, that all the bullion imported into the kingdom should be carried into the mint to be coined ; and only coin allowed to be exported. "The height, he says, of paper credit is the strongest argument for trying this and every other method that is likely to increase the coinage. For whilst paper credit does in a great measure the business of money at home, merchants and bankers are not under a necessity, as they were formerly, of coining a quantity of specie for their home trade ; and as paper credit brings money to the merchants to be exported, the money may go away insensibly, and not be missed till it be too late : And where paper credit is large and increasing, if the money be exported and the coinage decrease, that credit may sink at once ; for want of a proportionable quantity of specie, which alone can support it in a time of distress."—See Mr. Conduit's observations on the state of our gold and silver coins in 1730, page 36 to 46.

turn. The fluctuations of trade, in its best state, render this unavoidable. But the contest with our colonies has a tendency to bring it on soon ; and to increase unspeakably the distress attending it.

All know that the balance of trade with them is greatly in our favour ; * and that this balance is paid partly by direct remittances of bullion ; and partly by circuitous remittances through Spain, Portugal, Italy, &c. which diminish the balance against us with those countries.—During the last year they have been employed in paying their debts, without adding to them ; and their exportations and remittances for that purpose have contributed to render the general balance of trade more favourable to us, and, also, (in conjunction with the late operations of the bank) to keep up our funds. These remittances are now ceased ; and a year or two will determine, if this contest goes on, how far we can sustain such a loss without suffering the consequences I have described.

The second event, ruinous to our paper-circulation, which may arise from our rupture with America, is a deficiency in the revenue. As a failure of our paper would destroy the revenue, so a failure of the revenue, or any considerable diminution of it, would destroy our paper. The Bank is the support of our paper ; and the support of the Bank is the credit of government. Its principal securities, are a capital of near eleven millions lent to government ; and money continually advanced to a vast amount on the land tax, Sinking fund, exchequer bills, navy bills, &c. Should, therefore, deficiencies in the revenue bring government under any difficulties, all these securities would lose their value, and the Bank and government, and all private and public credit, would fall together.—Let any one here imagine, what would probably follow, were it but suspected by the public in general, that the taxes were so fallen, as not to produce enough to pay the interest of the public debts, besides bearing the ordinary expences of the nation ; and that, in order to supply the deficiency, and to hide the calamity,

N O T E.

* According to the accounts of the exports to, and imports from the North American colonies laid before parliament ; the balance in our favour appears to have been, for 11 years before 1774, near a million and a half annually.

it had been necessary in any one year to anticipate the taxes, and to borrow of the bank.—In such circumstances I can scarcely doubt, but an alarm would spread of the most dangerous tendency.—The next foreign war, should it prove half as expensive as the last, will probably occasion such a deficiency; and bring our affairs to that crisis towards which they have been long tending.—But the war with America has a greater tendency to do this; and the reason is, that it affects our resources more; and is attended more with the danger of internal disturbances.

Some have made the proportion of our trade depending on North America to be near one half. A moderate computation makes it a third.* Let it, however be supposed to be only a fourth. I will venture to say, this is a proportion of our foreign trade, the loss of which, when it comes to be felt, will be found insupportable. In the article of tobacco alone, it will cause a deduction from the Customs of at least 300,000*l. per ann.* † including the duties paid on foreign commodities purchased by the exportation of tobacco. Let the whole deduction from the revenue be supposed to be only half a million. This alone is more than the kingdom can at present bear, without having recourse to additional taxes in order to defray the common and necessary expences of peace. But to this must be added a deduction from the produce of the excises, in consequence of the increase of the poor, of the difficulties of our merchants and manufacturers, of less national wealth, and a retrenchment of luxury. There is no possibility of knowing to what these deductions may amount. When the evils producing them begin, they will proceed rapidly; and they may end in a general wreck before we are aware of any danger.

† The annual average of the payments into the exchequer, on account of the duties on tobacco, was for five years, from 1770 to 1774, 219,117*l.* exclusive of the payments from Scotland.—Near one half of the tobacco trade is carried on from Scotland; and above four-fifths of the tobacco imported is afterwards exported to France, Germany, and other countries. From France alone it brings annually into the kingdom, I am informed about 150,000*l.* in money.

In 1775, being alas! the parting year, the duties on tobacco in England brought into the Exchequer no less a sum than 298,202*l.*

In order to give a clearer view of this subject, I will in an appendix, state particularly the national expenditure and income for ten years, from 1764 to 1774. From that account it will appear, that the money drawn every year from the public by the taxes, falls but little short of a sum equal to the whole specie of the kingdom; and that, notwithstanding the late increase in the productiveness of the taxes, the whole surplus of the national income has not exceeded 320,000*l. per ann.* This is a surplus so inconsiderable as to be scarcely sufficient to guard against the deficiencies arising from the common fluctuations of foreign trade, and of home consumption. It is nothing when considered as the only fund we have for paying off a debt of near 140 millions.—Had we continued in a state of profound peace, it could not have admitted of any diminution. What then must follow, when one of the most profitable branches of our trade is destroyed; when a third of the empire is lost; when an addition of many millions is made to the public debt; and when, at the same time, perhaps, some millions are taken away from the revenue?—I shudder at this prospect.—A kingdom on an edge so perilous, should think of nothing but a retreat.

SECT. IV. Of the Honour of the Nation, as affected by the War with America.

ONE of the pleas for continuing the contest with America is, “That our honour is engaged; and that we cannot now recede without the most humiliating concessions.”

With respect to this, it is proper to observe, that a distinction should be made between the nation and its rulers. It is melancholy that there should be ever any reason for making such a distinction. A government is, or ought to be, nothing but an institution for collecting and for carrying into execution the will of the people. But so far is this from being in general the fact, that the measures of government, and the sense of the people, are sometimes in direct opposition to one another; nor does it often happen that any certain conclusion can be drawn from the one to the other.—I will not pretend to determine, whether in the present instance, the dishonour nour attending a retreat would belong to the nation at large, or only to the persons in power who guide its affairs. Let it be granted, though probably far from true, that the majority of the kingdom favour the present measures. No good argument could be drawn from hence against receding. The disgrace to which a kingdom must submit by making concessions, is nothing to that of being the aggressors in an unrighteous quarrel; and dignity, in such circumstances, consists in retracting freely, speedily, and magnanimously.—For, (to adopt, on this occasion, words which I have heard applied to this very purpose, in a great assembly, by a peer to whom this kingdom has often looked as its deliverer, and whose ill state of health at this awful moment of public danger every friend to Britain must deplore) to adopt, I say, the words of this great man—“Restitute is dignity. Oppression only is meanness; and justice, honour.”

I will add, that prudence, no less than true honour, requires us to retract. For the time may come when, if it is not done voluntarily, we may be obliged to do it; and find ourselves under a necessity of granting that to our distresses, which we now deny to equity and humanity, and the prayers of America. The possibility of this appears plainly from the preceding pages; and should it happen, it will bring upon us disgrace indeed, disgrace greater than the worst rancour can wish to see accumulated on a kingdom already too much dishonoured—Let the reader think here what we are doing.—A nation, once the protector of liberty in distant countries and the scourge of tyranny, changed into an enemy to liberty, and engaged in endeavouring to reduce to servitude its own brethren—A great and enlightened nation, not content with a controuling power over millions of people which gave it every reasonable advantage, insisting upon such a supremacy over them as would leave them nothing they could call their own, and carrying desolation and death among them for disputing it.—What can be more ignominious?—How have we felt for the brave Corsicans, in their struggle with the Genoese, and afterwards with the French government? Did Genoa or France want more than an absolute command over their property and legislations; or the power of binding them in all cases whatsoever?—The Corsicans had been subject to the Genoese; but, finding it difficult to keep them in subjection, they ceded them to the French.

—All such cessions of one people by another are disgraceful to human nature. But if our claims are just, may not we also, if we please, cede the colonies to France?—There is, in truth, no other difference between these two cases than that the Corsicans were not descended from the people who governed them, but that the Americans are.

There are some who seem to be sensible that the authority of one country over another, cannot be distinguished from the servitude of one country to another; and that unless different communities, as well as different parts of the same community, are united by an equal representation, all such authority is inconsistent with the principles of civil liberty. But they except the case of the colonies and Great-Britain; because the colonies are communities which have branched forth from, and which, therefore, as they think, belong to Britain. Had the colonies been communities of foreigners, over whom we wanted to acquire dominion, or even to extend a dominion before acquired, they are ready to admit that their resistance would have been just.—In my opinion, this is the same with saying, that the colonies ought to be worse off than the rest of mankind, because they are our own brethren.

Again. The United Provinces of Holland were once subject to the Spanish monarchy; but, provoked by the violation of their charters; by levies of money, without their consent; by the introduction of Spanish troops among them; by innovations in their antient modes of government; and the rejection of their petitions, they were driven to that resistance which we and all the world have ever since admired; and which has given birth to one of the greatest and happiest Republics that ever existed.—Let any one read also, the history of the war which the Athenians, from a thirst of empire, made on the Syracusans in Sicily, a people derived from the same origin with them; and let him, if he can, avoid rejoicing in the defeat of the Athenians.

Let him, likewise, read the account of the social war among the Romans. The allied states of Italy had fought the battles of Rome, and contributed by their valour and treasure to its conquests and grandeur. They claimed, therefore, the rights of Roman citizens, and a share with them in the legislation. The Romans disdaining to make those their fellow-citizens, whom they had always looked looked upon as their subjects would not comply; and a war followed, the most horrible in the annals of mankind, which ended in the ruin of the Roman republic. The feelings of every Briton in this case must force him to approve the conduct of the allies, and to condemn the proud and ungrateful Romans.

But not only is the present contest with America thus disgraceful to us, because inconsistent with our own feelings in similar cases; but also because condemned by our own practice in former times. The colonies are persuaded that they are fighting for liberty. We see them sacrificing to this persuasion every private advantage. If mistaken, and tho' guilty of irregularities, they should be pardoned by a people whose ancestors have given them so many examples of similar conduct. England should venerate the attachment to liberty amidst all its excesses; and, instead of indignation or scorn, it would be most becoming them, in the present instance, to declare their applause, and to say to the colonies.—“We excuse your mistakes. We admire your spirit. It is the spirit that has more than once saved ourselves. We aspire to no dominion over you. We understand the rights of men too well to think of taking from you the inestimable privilege of governing yourselves; and, instead of employing our power for any such purpose, we offer it to you as a friendly and guardian power, to be a mediator in your quarrels; a protection against your enemies; and an aid to you in establishing a plan of liberty that shall make you great and happy. In return, we ask nothing but your gratitude and your commerce.”

This would be a language worthy of a brave and enlightened nation. But alas! it often happens in the political world, as it does in religion, that the people who cry out most vehemently for liberty to themselves are the most unwilling to grant it to others.

One of the most violent enemies of the colonies has pronounced them “all Mr. Locke’s disciples.”—glorious title!—How shameful is it to make war against them for that reason?

But farther. This war is disgraceful on account of the persuasion which led to it, and under which it has been undertaken. The general cry was last winter, that the people of New England were a body of cowards, who would at once be humbled into submission by a hostile look from our troops. In this light were they held up to public derision in both houses of parliament; and it was this persuasion that, probably, induced a nobleman of the first weight in the state to recommend, at the passing of Boston Port Bill, coercive measures; hinting at the same time, that the appearance of hostilities would be sufficient, and that all would be soon over, sine clade.—Indeed no one can doubt, but that had it been believed some time ago, that the people of America were brave, more care would have been taken not to provoke them.

Again. The manner in which this war has been hitherto conducted, renders it still more disgraceful.—English valour being thought insufficient to subdue the colonies, the laws and religion of France were established in Canada, on purpose to obtain the power of bringing upon them from thence an army of French papists. The wild Indians and their own slaves have been instigated to attack them; and attempts have been made to gain the assistance of a large body of Russians.—With like views, German troops have been hired; and the defence of our forts and garrisons trusted in their hands.

These are measures which need no comment. The last of them, in particular, having been carried into execution without the consent of parliament, threatens us with imminent danger; and shows that we are in the way to lose even the forms of the constitution.—If, indeed, our ministers can at any time, without leave, not only send away the national troops, but introduce foreign troops in their room, we lie entirely at mercy; and we have every thing to dread.

SECT. V Of the Probability of Succeeding in the War with America.

LET us next consider how far there is a possibility of succeeding in the present war.

Our own people, being unwilling to enlist, and the attempts to procure armies of Russians, Indians, and Canadians having miscarried; the utmost force we can employ, including foreigners, does not exceed, if I am rightly informed, 30,000 effective men. Let it however, be called 40,000. This is the force that is to conquer half a million at least * of determined men fighting.

N O T E.

* A quarter of the inhabitants of every country are fighting men.—If, therefore, the colonies consist only of two millions of inhabitants, the number of fighting men in them will be half a million.

ing on their own ground, within sight of their houses and families, and for that sacred blessing of liberty, without which man is a beast, and government a curse. All history proves, that in such a situation, a handful is a match for millions.

In the Netherlands, a few states thus circumstanced, withstood, for thirty years, the whole force of the Spanish monarchy, when at its zenith; and at last humbled its pride, and emancipated themselves from its tyranny.—The citizens of Syracuse also, thus circumstanced, withstood the whole power of the Athenians, and almost ruined them.—The same happened in the contest between the house of Austria, and the cantons * of Switzerland.—There is in this case an infinite difference between attacking and being attacked: between fighting to destroy, and fighting to preserve, or acquire liberty.——Were we, therefore, capable of employing a land force against America equal to its own, there would be little probability of success. But to think of conquering that whole continent with 30,000 or 40,000 men to be transported across the Atlantic, and fed from hence, and incapable of being recruited after any defeat—This is indeed a folly so great, that language does not afford a name for it.

With respect to our naval force, could it fail at land, as it does at sea, much might be done with it; but as that is impossible, little or nothing can be done with it, which will not hurt ourselves more than the colonists.—Such of their maritime towns as they cannot guard against our fleets, and have not been already destroyed, they are determined either to give up to our resentment, or † destroy themselves: The consequence of which will be, that these towns will be rebuilt in safer situations; and that we shall lose some of the principal pledges by which we have hitherto held them in subjection.—As to their trade; having all the necessaries and the chief conveniences of life within themselves, they have no dependence upon it; and the loss of it will do them unspeakable good, by preserving them from the evils of luxury and the temptations of wealth; and keeping them in that state of virtuous simplicity which is the greatest happiness. I know that I am now speaking the sense of some of the wisest men in America. It has been long their wish that Britain would shut up all their ports. They will rejoice, particularly, in the last restraining act. It might have happened, that the people would have grown weary of their agreements not to export or import. But this act will oblige them to keep these agreements; and confirm their unanimity and zeal. It will also furnish them with a reason for confiscating the estates of all the friends of our government among them, and for employing their sailors, who would have been otherwise idle, in making reprisals on British property.

Their ships, before useless, and consisting of many hundreds, will be turned into ships of war; and all that attention, which they have hitherto confined to trade, will be employed in fitting out a naval force for their own defence; and thus the way will be prepared for their becoming, much sooner than they would otherwise have been, a great maritime power. This act of parliament, therefore, crowns the folly of all our late measures.—None who know me, can believe me to be disposed to superstition. Perhaps, however, I am not in the present instance, free from this weakness.—I fancy I see in these measures something that cannot be accounted for merely by human ignorance. I am inclined to think, that the hand of Providence is in them working to bring about some great ends.——But this leads me to one consideration more, which I cannot help offering to the public, and which appears to me in the highest degree important.

In this hour of tremendous danger, it would become us to turn our thoughts to Heaven. This is what our brethren in the colonies are doing. From one end of North America to the other, they are fasting and praying. But what are we doing?—Shocking thought! we are ridiculing them as Fanatics, and scoffing at religion.—We are running wild after pleasure, and forgetting every thing serious and decent at Masquerades;—We are gambling in gaming houses; trafficking for boroughs; perjurying ourselves at elections; and selling ourselves for places.—Which side then is Providence likely to favour?

In America we see a number of rising states in the vigour of youth, inspired by the noblest of all passions, the passion for being free; and animated by piety.—

Here we see an old state, great indeed, but inflated and irreligious; enervated by luxury; encumbered with debts; and hanging by a thread.—Can any one look without pain to the issue? May we not expect calamities that shall recover to reflection (perhaps to devotion) our libertines and Atheists?

Is our cause such as gives us reason to ask God to bless it?—Can we in the face of Heaven declare, “that we are not the aggressors in this war; and that we mean by it, not to acquire or even preserve dominion for its own sake; not conquest, or empire, or the gratification of resentment: but solely to deliver ourselves from oppression; to gain reparation for injury; and to defend ourselves against men who would plunder or kill us?”—Remember, reader, whoever thou art, that there are no other just causes of war; and that blood spilled, with any other views, must some time or other be accounted for.—But not to expose myself by saying more in this way, I will now beg leave to recapitulate some of the arguments I have used; and to deliver the feelings of my heart in a brief, but earnest address to my countrymen.

I am hearing it continually urged—“Are they not our subjects.”—The plain answer is, they are not your subjects. The people of America are no more the subjects of the people of Britain, than the people of Yorkshire are the subjects of the people of Middlesex. They are your fellow subjects.

“But we are taxed; and why should not they be taxed?”—You are taxed by yourselves. They insist on the same privilege.—They are taxed to support their own governments; and they help also to pay your taxes by purchasing your manufactures, and giving you a monopoly of their trade. Must they maintain two governments? Must they submit to be triple taxed?—Has your moderation in taxing yourselves, been such as encourages them to trust you with the power of taxing them?

“But they will not obey the parliament and the laws.”—Say rather, they will not obey your parliament and your laws. Their reason is: They have no voice in your parliament. They have no share in making * your laws.—“Neither have most of us.”—Then you

N O T E.

so far want liberty; and your language is, “We are not free, why will they be free?”—But many of you have a voice in parliament: None of them have. All your freehold land is represented: But not a foot of their land is represented. At worst, therefore, you can be only enslaved partially.—They would be enslaved totally.—They are governed by parliaments chosen by themselves, and by legislatures similar to yours. Why will you disturb them in the enjoyment of a blessing so invaluable? Is it reasonable to insist, that your discretion alone shall be their law; that they shall have no constitutions of government, except such as you shall be pleased to give them; and no property except such as your parliament shall be pleased to leave them?—What is your parliament?—Powerful indeed and respectable: But is there not a growing intercourse between it and the court? Does it awe ministers of state as it once did?—Instead of contending for a controuling power over the governments of America, should you not think more of watching and reforming your own?—Suppose the worst. Suppose, in opposition to all their own declarations, that the colonists are now aiming at independence.—“If they can subsist without you;” is it to be wondered at?—Did there ever exist a community, or even an individual, that would not do the same?—“If they cannot subsist without you;” let them alone. They will soon come back.—“If you cannot subsist without them;” reclaim them by * kindness; engage in England, stated by William Molyneux, Esq; Dublin.—In arguing against the authority of communities, and all people not incorporated, over one another; I have confined my views to taxation and internal legislation. Mr. Molyneux carried his views much farther; and denied the right of England to make any laws even to regulate the trade of Ireland. He was the intimate friend of Mr. Locke; and writ his book in 1698, soon after the publication of Mr. Locke’s treatise on government.

N O T E S.

What I have said, in part 1st. sect. 3d. of subjecting a number of states to a general council representing them all, I suppose every one must consider as entirely theoretical; and not a proposal of any thing I wish may take place under the British empire.

* Some persons, convinced of the folly as well as barbarity of attempting to keep the colonies, by slaughtering them, have engage them by moderation and equity. It is madness to resolve to butcher them. This will make them detest and avoid you for ever. Freemen are not to be governed by force; or dragooned into compliance. If capable of bearing to be so treated, it is a disgrace to be connected with them.

“If they can subsist without you; and also you without them,” the attempt to subjugate them by confiscating their effects, burning their towns, and ravaging their territories, is a wanton exertion of cruel ambition, which, however common it has been among mankind, deserves to be called by harder names than I chuse to apply to it.—Suppose such an attempt was to succeed: would it not be a fatal preparation for subduing yourselves? Would not the disposal of American places, and the distribution of an American revenue, render that influence of the crown irresistible, which has already stabbed your liberties?

Turn your eyes to India: There more has been done than is now attempted in America. There Englishmen, actuated by the love of plunder and the spirit of conquest, have depopulated whole kingdoms, and ruined millions of innocent people by the most infamous oppression and rapacity.—The justice of the nation has slept over these enormities. Will the justice of heaven sleep?—Are we not now execrated on both sides of the globe?

N O T E.

have very humanely proposed giving them up. But the highest authority has informed us, with great reason, “That they are too important to be given up.”

—Dr. Tucker has insisted on the depopulation, produced by migrations from this country to the colonies, as a reason for this measure. But, unless the kingdom is made a prison to its inhabitants, these migrations cannot be prevented; nor do I think that they have any great tendency to produce depopulation. When a number of people quit a country, there is more employment and greater plenty of the means of subsistence left for those who remain; and the vacancy is soon filled up. The grand causes of depopulation are, not migrations, or even famines and plagues, or any other temporary evils; but the permanent and slowly working evils of debauchery, luxury, high taxes, and oppression.

P A R T III.

*Now Jesus loved Martha, and her Sister.

THE mighty influence which human beings have upon the character and happiness of one another, and the minute casualties by which they are often associated, cannot but appear, to reflecting minds, among the most mysterious arrangements of Providence. The very persons, who might have probably been wise and blessed, had they fallen into proper company, are frequently corrupted and undone, by insensibly forming imprudent connexions: and, although I sincerely believe, that some of the sweetest pleasures, which the soul can taste, must arise from the society of women, yet by some strange infatuation men often convert it into a source of misery. Either they expect too much, and being necessarily disappointed are chagrined and soured; or else from unreasonable and unworthy prejudices against a sex, whom the Almighty created for their companions and comforters, they are precluded from a felicity which no other object in this world can equally supply.

Where—I had almost enquired, where is the singular mortal, that can keep the balance even? Is it not, with a very few exceptions, abuse on the one side, or adulation upon the other? We would willingly recommend the just medium, and warn you, my younger brethren in particular, against either extreme. That of disparaging the sex seems, as I before hinted, the mode at present. Many of the particulars I have already considered. Amongst those which I have not, we may reckon the charge of female scandal, which we have heard advanced, reiterated, and dwelt upon with so much exultation.

That female scandal is circulated very freely amongst vulgar and uninstructed women, without generous feelings or the restraints of religion, we as freely confess. But can it surprise any who reflect, that those, who want in themselves a fund of worth or intelligence, should not be much inclined to discover or acknowledge it in others, or to search for matter of rational and harmless entainment, when the joy of finding fault, so natural to the uncorrected malignity of illiberal minds, can be obtained without labour from the conjectures of idleness, the rumours of misrepresentation, and the imperfections of humanity?

The narrow sphere to which most females are confined, and their frequent communication with one another in the absence of men, joined to the unamiable competitions which must often take place where there is little enlargement or benevolence, will too readily excite such persons to amuse themselves at the expense of others.

But what is all this to those that are better taught, and have better affections, whose hearts stream with tenderness, whose imaginations sparkle with vivacity, and whose intellects are improved by useful reading and polite conversation? Amongst this class of women, it is but justice to declare, we have not found the malicious sneers, or the impertinent tattle, so commonly imputed to the sex at large. Whether the same thing can be always said even of those men, from whose sense and breeding it might be justly hoped, let my male hearers themselves determine.

Of this I am sure, that our divine master and model expressed himself with peculiar gentleness, where women were concerned. We have before remarked the beautiful manner in which he reproved the over-solicitous Martha, as well as praised her sweetly-pensive sister. It is true indeed, that, when upon a particular occasion his mother presumed to direct him in the exercise of his miraculous power, he said to her, not only with an air of reprehension as the case required, but with a plainness of language, which, considering especially to whom he spoke, is apt to hurt a modern ear—"Woman, what have I to do with thee," that thou shouldst take upon thee to tell me how and when my miracles are to be wrought? But then it should be observed, that though it is a mode of expression not admitted amongst us, to call a person, Woman, when we are speaking to her, if she be one whom we think entitled to any respect, yet some of the politest authors of antiquity make the most accomplished, and the best bred princes use it in addressing themselves to ladies of the highest rank: and even servants too are represented as adopting the same style when they spoke to their Mistresses. Such was the simlicity of ancient days!—But when the Woman of Canaan replied to our Saviour, with the most respectful and affectionate earnestness, in behalf of her much-afflicted daughter, did he not besides at first seeming to neglect her petition, and then for some time to refuse it with coldness, if not aversion, proceed, as though all this were not discouraging enough, to embitter his refusal with a phrase apparently harsh and humiliating in the extreme? Gracious Redeemer! What an aspect dost thou here assume! Is this agreeable to thy usual tenderness? Is this like the Physician and the Friend of human nature?—Mark the sequel. Our honest petitioner, inspired by her piety and her distress, eloquent and irresistible from the feelings of a mother's bosom, at once turns with a happy dexterity on our Saviour's words, and extracts arguments from the very language of unkindness. "Against hope she believes in hope." She conquers: she triumphs. A treatment so strange in appearance, on the part of Jesus, was not intended to overwhelm this worthy creature's heart, but to illustrate by trying her faith; and to furnish himself with an opportunity of indulging his God-like benevolence, by the warmest applause, and the amplest compliance.—"O Woman, great is thy faith: be it unto thee, even as thou wilt: and her daughter was made whole from that very hour."

It might be added, that when female penitents were censured without mercy by sanctimonious pretenders, our saviour omitted not to plead their cause; and that his reproofs, even to the greatest sinners of the sex, were tempered with mildness; though in rebuking the hypocritical and hard-hearted of ours, he uses a style of the most awful severity. No, my brothers, noble minds cannot endure the idea of insolence to the weak and the wretched; least of all, when it skulks under the mask of religion.

But to go on with our subject; amongst the imputations against the women, we must not forget to take notice of one, that might indeed be dispensed, did it not sometimes involve individuals of much merit in other respects, and refer to a species of pride irreconcilable with the lovely meekness and modest pliancy which ought always to characterize the sex, and the want of which no talents, no allurements, can ever sufficiently compensate.

compensate. I mean the Affectation of a Superior Understanding.

Ignorant people, and enthusiastic lovers, may be delighted with the harangues and decisions of those women whom they admire as very handsome, or very wise; but men of a different stamp, and a cooler temper, will take the liberty to be of another opinion. Were it right for you, my female friends, to pique yourselves on any thing, believe me it should only be on a gentle disposition, and a complacent deportment, on domestic qualities, and useful accomplishments. By these you will always be sure to please the best judges, and in the greatest numbers.

That many of you are endowed with admirable capacities, and that you have improved them with diligence and success, we do not barely acknowledge, we are ready to maintain and prove it, before the whole school of Chesterfield's disciples. When I mention him on this occasion, I really am at a loss to conceive, how he could form so mean an opinion of female understanding; for, certainly, amongst the many women of condition in different countries, to whose company he had always ready access, he must have met with a number respectable for their mental powers and acquisitions. We, whose opportunities of this kind have been comparatively few, can yet affirm without flattery, that we have found, in some ladies of fashion, not only much brilliancy of fancy, but equal solidity of judgment and acuteness of penetration. To whatever follies such persons may be exposed, from the prevalence of luxury and the parade of rank, it must still be allowed, that their education is usually conducted on a larger scale, and with more liberal views, than that of the lower classes; as they have commonly the advantage also of more elegant and instructive conversation. Neither is it probable that, in the society of a man like Chesterfield, women of wit and knowledge would be much disposed to suppress their attainments.

But you, my sisters, will not be forward to exhibit yours, if you would be advised by one who is better affected to your interest and reputation. Whether, as his Lordship contends, your sex in general are incapable of arguing with closeness and precision; whether, if they are, as we confess ourselves at times ready to think is the case with the majority, the defect be owing to their frame, or their culture; or whether in reality it be a defect, considering their state and destination, I will not nicely inquire. I am certain, that in early comprehension, natural taste, sprightly imagination, quick discernment of characters, and wonderful address in suiting themselves to each, they frequently excel; nor are they seldom adorned with a considerable portion of knowledge and literature, when favoured by their genius and situation.

As to the love of dispute in either sex, it is never, I apprehend, a very pleasing quality. I am sure, it does not lead to the best style of conversation. They who indulge it, rarely convince, and not often delight any but themselves. None will say, it mends the temper, or improves the heart: and all must acknowledge, that it frequently disgusts and inflames. In a brisk youth inured to it at college, or a slipshod girl accustomed to talk away amongst her companions at school, it may easily be tolerated now and then, though commonly accompanied with a sufficient quantity of pertness and petulance. Nor is it worth while, to be offended at the peremptory prate of a silly woman, who fancies she cannot be mistaken, provided at least her noise may be soon escaped. But it is not quite so easy to avoid being seriously displeased, when persons of better intellects, and higher breeding in other articles, seem full of their own sense, fond of debating on all occasions, and forward to pronounce on all subjects, with a confidence which we do not very readily excuse even in the greatest masters. The greatest masters, indeed, are generally the least assuming. Modesty, it has been often remarked, is the usual attendant of exalted merit, and a bolder tone is assumed by superior spirits, only where insolence provokes, or necessity demands.

Ah, my female friends, did you in particular, did you but know how deeply the male heart is enchanted with those women, whose conversation presents the picture of simplicity and grace, of ease and politeness, in a groupe; the spirit of whose conversation is a compound of sprightliness, sense, and modesty; who seldom dispute, and never wrangle; who listen with attention to the opinions of others, and deliver their own with diffidence, more desirous of receiving than of giving conviction, more ambitious to please than to conquer! Such, believe me, are sure of conquering in the noblest sense.

Paint to yourselves, by way of contrast, a woman who talks loud, contradicts bluntly, looks sullen, contests pertinaciously, and, instead of yielding, challenges submission. How different a figure! How forbidding an object! Feminality is gone: Nature is transformed: whatever makes the male character most rough and turbulent, is taken up by a creature, that was designed to tranquillize and smooth it. In place of a "charmer, charming never so wisely," what do we behold? A clamorous, obstinate, contentious being, universally disgusting and odious; fit only to be chased from the haunts of humanity, those peaceful haunts which it seeks to disturb—Merciful Heaven! shelter us from its violence, in the blessed sanctuary of domestic love and joy, or in the sweet harmonious choir of friendship.

How have we pitied a man of sense and spirit, who has had the infelicity of being connected for his life with a self-sufficient and obdurate woman! A pusillanimous creature, or a doating fool, may submit to her humours with little difficulty. But the other is shocked to the soul: astonishment and indignation seize him by turns: he is wounded in his tenderest sensibilities, and wrung with disappointment where he was interested most. He sought a partner, and found a plague: he expected a soft, affectionate, sympathizing friend, and met with a bosom foe. The beauty of an Angel, the wealth of the Indies, were such a woman mistress of them, would both be insufficient, in his eyes, to atone for her behaviour. But, O my brothers, how delightfully is the heart vanquished and captivated, when an unpretending female appears before it, with Reason, Fancy, and Virtue in her train, and discovers, in her family and amongst her friends, all the loveliness of smiles and sympathies, of placid address, and gentle insinuation!

But may there not be occasions, where wisdom and worth, in women as in men, are called upon to assert themselves, with a dignity that shall repress the forward, and over-awe the insolent? Certainly: and to give such proceeding the name of pride were unjust. But, on the other hand, to mistake the demands of pride, which are boundless, for that dignity which seldom wishes to stand forth, is ignorant. It is yet more so, to imagine, that the male heart can either be gained by arrogance, or preserved by opposition.

The very best men are so made, as to be soothed by ready compliance, and chilled by habitual stubbornness, in women. To female capacity they will frankly allow all the respect it can deserve, if that respect be not confidently claimed. To female excellence they will resign the empire of the breast with pleasure. But remember, young women; such excellence for ever precludes the affectation of power, will rarely appear to exert it, and will generally prevail by submitting.

Perhaps, Gentlemen, one reason why the most accomplished of our sex are fond of conversing with the most agreeable of the other, is because with them they are relieved from that rivalry of genius, and those contrarieties of opinion, which too often impair, not to say poison, the enjoyments of male society. Sentiment, imagination, variety, complacency, and all the pretty playfulness of minds that only wish to please and be pleased, fill up, in the former case, those intervals of leisure that succeed the fatigue and anxiety of business, the abstraction of study, or the straining of the faculties on whatever account. Surely, my brothers, they do not much consult either easy or elegant gratification, who prefer, to this kind of entertainment, the low pernicious company of prostitutes, or the noisy and intemperate intercourse of rakes.

When men of debauched principles appear happy, on the retiring of cultivated and virtuous women from table or elsewhere, they might be asked, What do you gain by it? Does the conversation become either livelier, or more refined? Or will you say, that your behaviour in general takes a better cast? You will scarcely say, that it is improved in politeness. But it is improved in freedom—O yes; the cruel restraints of decency are removed: you are now at liberty to burst forth into clamour, oaths, obscenity, prophane-ness, defamation of the sex, and—if you are so disposed, to get drunk into the bargain. Glorious privileges! Worthy, no doubt, to be highly prized by reasonable beings, by persons of education, and by gentlemen.

To speak seriously; Is a sensible and manly youth desirous of passing his leisure hours in a species of pleasure equally sociable and innocent; of acquiring quiring the most proper demeanour, with the gentlest, and, at the same time, the easiest, turn of thought and expression, as well as right habits of the best kind? Instead of sauntering in coffee-houses, running to taverns, or rambling after loose women and giddy girls, let him associate with a few of both sexes, who join good breeding, and liberal sentiments, to purity of mind and manners. Of empty and effeminate boys, it can scarcely be expected, that they will put any value on such society. It may likewise be observed, that if the company of women only is sought, the deportment will be in danger of sinking into too much softness, as it will be apt to roughen into the rude, the boisterous, or the awkward, if that of men is habitually preferred. Elegance and spirit united form the just temperament, which is produced by both. When a virtue at once mild and masculine is added, what can be figured more completely estimable?

It must be acknowledged, that the company of women entitled to respect, for their sense and worth, requires more attentions, and a stricter regard to the rules of breeding, than are commonly thought necessary in the presence of men: and this necessity is represented, by libertines, as one of those confinements that are not to be long or often endured by a youth of spirit. Now, amongst this tribe, a Youth of Spirit is only a finer name for a young man who determines to gratify his passions without controul, and admires the documents of those who have set him example. What ensues? Impatient of the restraint which female delicacy would lay upon him, he hies away to some of those lost creatures, who like the great tempter, "go about, seeking whom they may devour." If the consequence should be irretrievable ruin, as God knows how often it is, he may date that ruin from the period when he began to grow weary of associating with his virtuous relations, and other deserving persons, of the female sex.

Think of the infatuated youths, who in rapid and terrible succession, fall sacrifices to the violated laws of their country. How common is it for them to confess, at the tree of ignominy, that they were first led astray by bad women! Of the men you have formerly known, who did not die in disgrace, but went out of life with what the world calls a fair reputation, have you reason to believe, that there are none now, in anguish of soul, tracing back their final destruction to an early acquaintance with bad women?—That, in the future state, many virtuous men will, with everlasting joy and gratitude, ascribe, under God, their confirmation and progress in virtue, chiefly to their having been much conversant with female worth, I have no doubt.

My dear brothers, if ye "knew the gift of God," how highly would you prize whatever restraint tended to keep you from the paths of the Destroyer! But the truth is, that, in the society I recommend, a young man, who does not wish to go astray, will feel himself under no fetter; will, on the contrary, find an easy scope for the indulgence of his imagination, and of his heart, on every proper subject; and will learn genuine courtesy without labour or study. Amiable women of genteel education are, indeed, beyond comparison, the best mistresses of this science, for two reasons. In the first place, they best understand it; having from Nature a peculiar aptitude to please, with a wonderful facility in adapting themselves to the tempers of others, and from Culture a ready acquaintance, which they soon acquire, with such forms of politeness as, without the aid of insincerity, give an elegance and a heightening to the native emanations of a good mind. In the next place, they teach it without appearing to teach it, by a secret power over the conceptions of their scholars; who, naturally ambitious of approving themselves to such agreeable tutoresses, learn it from them insensibly, and yet effectually; as people in general catch the sentiments and manners of those they esteem.

Who indeed, but brutes, could behave with wilful or deliberate rudeness before persons, whose character, whose conversation, whose very air, is calculated to impress respect? Into such company, it may be presumed, the ferocious, the blustering, the coarse, the overbearing, or the noisy, will not often be disposed to intrude. There, alas! they would find little pleasure. But, should they be there by accident, is it not possible some of them might be subdued, and transformed into a happier turn and better deportment? is it not reasonable to hope, that in this school the conceit of youth might be taught modesty; the pedantry of the college exchanged for the ease of the entertaining entertaining companion, and the urbanity of the accomplished gentleman; the stiffness and acrimony of the disputant tempered and moulded into a pleasing deference; the practice of yielding and obliging might beget a promptness to yield and oblige; the observance of decency improve into the love of goodness; or, to express the whole in a few words, every rougher passion and ungracious habit vanish away, as the furliness of winter disappears before the genial influence of the spring.

But, to experience such desirable effects, the society under consideration must be cultivated with steadiness and relish; two things, indeed, very closely connected; and, I add, from earliest youth, before—what? Hear me, O hear me, and receive instruction—before the soul is poisoned with Sensuality, that most dangerous, most destructive, most epidemical of all disorders, from which I fear she rarely recovers.

Amongst those men that were early infected with the love of sensual pleasure, we have known individuals, who, in the conversation of virtuous and sentimental women, were visibly embarrassed, awkward, and constrained, like clowns in the presence of their superiors. Unaccustomed to such a situation, and conscious of that meanness which Vice must inwardly feel before the dignity of her Rival, they seemed to be out of their element, restless and unhappy, till they returned to more congenial associates, with whom they might give loose to all the licentiousness of their ideas and appetites.

Trust me, Sirs; chaste society is never thoroughly agreeable even to the politest libertines, whatever disguise they may wear, or whatever ease they may assume. Such society silently reproaches their crimes, and reminds them of those innocent delightful days which they once knew, and can now only recollect with a sigh. Happy the youth, that has no reflection of this kind to chill the ardour of his honest sensibilities, or damp the harmless gaiety of his soul, among the worthiest people of either sex. Ah, my young friend, what felicity would you forego, what misery would you incur, should you ever be guilty of aught that might incite you secretly to hate, or dread, the presence of Virtue!

Do you love your health, your honour, your quiet, your reputation, your most valuable connexions, your highest interests on earth, or in Heaven? Be persuaded to take the counsel of a friend.—What is it?—If at any time passion or example, courtezans or debauchees, should attempt to corrupt you; instead of parleying, or deliberating, or even lingering to dispute, fly to the best and most improved woman of your acquaintance. In her company you will be safe, as in a “City of Refuge:” by her approbation you will be confirmed in those principles, and that conduct, which only can insure it: in conversing with her, your fancy will be amused, your understanding exercised, and your heart nourished: every improper idea will give place to better sentiments: every wrong bias will be counteracted:—what shall I say more? Virtue arrayed by the Graces, attended by the Smiles, and beheld in the person of such a woman, will look so supremely engaging, that the low arts, and unhallowed labours, of profligates and harlots to beguile you, must appear in your eye contemptible and hateful. Who, that has been accustomed to a palace, would quit it for a sty? Who, that has contracted a taste for whatever is excellent in poetry, or painting, would descend to take pleasure in a wretched dauber, or a common versifier? Who, that is smitten with “the beauty of holiness,” can look with delight on the loathsomeness of sin? Is the difference less striking, or will the contrast be less strongly felt by an ingenuous youth, between a worthy and sensible person of the other sex, and the victims of Infamy in either?

Let monks and misanthropes pretend to what they will; the soul of man will seldom be long satisfied without the entertainment of female conversation. It was so formed by the unerring Creator; nor perhaps will any thing, next to “the wisdom that is from above,” guard it more powerfully against the forcery of Vice, than the near and frequent view of Female Excellence.

If we might be permitted to quote our own observation, as any kind of evidence on this point; it is certain, we have ever found those the most honourable, moral, and conscientious men, who had the greatest regard for women of reputation and talents. May we not venture to add, that genuine Piety, the piety of sentiment and affection, the piety which governs life, is, as far as our sex are concerned, to be met met with most commonly among such men?

The same depravity, indeed, that doubts the existence of virtue in female nature, is often attended with a strange inclination to dispute the truth of Religion itself; as, on the other hand, he, who preserves that purity which loves and cherishes its resemblance in the pure, will be under no temptation to question the being, attributes, or claims, of the great Architype of all perfection. Have you ever known an instance, in which the man who became disaffected to modest women appeared to maintain any steady veneration for his Maker? As to the elevated joys which the good are taught to expect hereafter; I declare, for my own part, I never knew an individual who laughed at the notion of female virtue, that seemed to show, upon any occasion, the smallest solicitude to secure them, if indeed he believed a word of the matter. Account for this coincidence as you please; the fact I take the liberty to affirm.

I am sufficiently aware, that such men will affect to despise much of what has been now advanced on the subject of both sexes, as the language partly of ignorance, partly of enthusiasm, and partly of what they are prone to call want of Liberality. But on examining my most secret sensations, I feel that I can return their pretended contempt with real pity; convinced by a thousand proofs, that they are truly objects of the last, while they know from a thousand experiments, that the first is only a mask, to conceal, if possible, the inquietude of conscious guilt and folly.

To conclude; after all we have said respecting the Advantages to be derived by Young Men from the Society of Virtuous Women, much must be left to your own reflections. Represent to yourselves a youth of good sense, and good dispositions, dedicating a considerable share of his social hours to the conversation of a few females, who were chaste but not severe, frank but not indelicate, good-natured but with proper dignity, serious and lively by turns, polite and sincere at the same time, elegant without vanity, knowing without pride, and pious without ostentation: you, my brothers, can better imagine than I can describe, the improvements which he must necessarily receive from such communications.

When I spoke of a Few Females, I did not think only of the young. Those men who should deny attractive qualities to women advanced or advancing in life, and avoid their company on that account, would betray a bad understanding and a worse taste. Whatever they may think of the assertion, nothing can be more true, than that many, very many, of the most accomplished and most agreeable companions, are to be found among such of the other sex, as have outlived the allurements of youth, with the little conceits, affectations, and follies, to which it is subject, and have matured, by recollection and experience, the best acquisitions of their early days. Perhaps, indeed, one of the surest marks of sobriety, and intelligence, is having a pleasure in the conversation of age.

Blessed are those of both sexes, who, by the sweetest symphony of minds and hearts attainable in this world, together with the daily practice of all the Christian Virtues, are preparing for the immortal concert, of the sons and daughters of God. Take care, beloved and honoured, we call upon you in God's name to take care, lest any of you should, by a contrary course, expose yourselves to the infamy and horror of an everlasting exclusion from that divine assembly. Save me, almighty Father, save this people, save the youth of this generation, from a doom so dreadful; and grant of thine infinite mercy, through our only Mediator, that the intercourses of time may lay a foundation for the triumphs of eternity. Amen.

Copy of Mrs. Rudd's Letter to the Right Hon. Lord Viscount Weymouth, one of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State.

Jan. 15, 1776.

My Lord,

IT is not from a principle of tenderness for a man whose conduct to me has obliterated every sentiment of that nature in my breast, that I now take the liberty of addressing your lordship; the more unbiassed motive, a regard for impartiality influences me to state a few facts for your lordship's consideration, the importance of which, I flatter myself, will be evident the moment they are known.

The endeavours made to save Mr. Robert Perreau your lordship well knows are very numerous; I do not wish to prevent their obtaining that success which, (if we may credit public report) they are likely to be attended with; but, my Lord, the advocates of this unhappy unhappy man take such unjustifiable methods to gain their point as ought, for the sake of common justice, to be exposed.

In order to make him the object of royal mercy, they take advantage of the concealment in which his secret transactions are hidden from the public eye, and represent him as always having been in affluent circumstances, as a man who was no stockjobber, whose paternal affection induced him to negotiate the bonds from which they pretend he had no emolument, who believed his brother and I were actually married; and that this belief inspired him with a confidence which otherwise he would not have possessed. It is my intention, my Lord, to confine myself to facts, which have taken place since my unfortunate connection with the Perreau family, otherwise I could trace Robert Perreau's Alley Transactions, and recite several instances of his indigence for many years previous thereto. In the beginning of the Year 71, 'till the close of the year 73, Daniel conducted their transactions in his own name; paid with the fortune I brought him all the losses they incurred during that period, but divided the profits with his brother. In the course of this time, they had among others, a capital loss with Messrs. Byde and Archer, bankers, for which they gave their joint bond for the payment of 1500*l*. Daniel's credit not being of itself sufficient. At the conclusion of the year 73, my fortune being almost exhausted, they separated their interest, and carried on their Alley business independently of each other. Robert employed Mr. Thomas Trower, broker, with whom he lost several hundreds that winter, when he lost likewise 800*l*. with Mr. Richard Brown of Golden-Square, whose broker was Mr. Cassilet. —After this, Robert employed as his broker Mr. Samuel Schola, with whom he had repeated and considerable losses, the last of which was about three weeks prior to the discovery of the forgeries, and nearly to the amount of two thousand pounds. —I beg leave, my Lord, farther to observe, that all the gentlemen I have mentioned were subpoena'd to, and attended at my trial; but with many other witnesses were not called, the court intimating that there was no occasion for further evidence, and my counsel thinking it most honourable for me to be acquitted upon the case of the prosecution, to which I cheerfully con-sentent, as I wished not to expose the Perreaus more than was absolutely requisite for my own vindication.

I am next to remark to your lordship, that, upon the strictest examination, it has not appeared, that any of the money raised by the forgeries (except the 4000*l*. which paid for Harley-street House) was applied to Daniel's use; and that Robert actually benefited by the forgeries, the following fact will of itself sufficiently prove.

The fifteen Ayr bank bonds which Daniel borrowed from Doctor Brooke, were the day after carried back to the Doctor for indorsement by Robert Perreau, who then got Mr. Aylet, attorney, to convert them into cash at Messrs. Drummond's bank, which cash Robert immediately paid to Mr. George Vaughan, laceman, in the Strand, in discharge of a debt of his own; these three gentlemen were also subpoena'd to my trial, but not called for the reasons before assigned.

In regard of Robert's pretended belief of his brother's marriage with me, the latter has in his defence, which he published after his trial, declared that Robert was acquainted with the insuperable bar to a legal union. —What induced Daniel to contradict this assertion, made in so solemn and public a manner, I cannot pretend to say, unless it proceeds from that unaccountable influence which Robert has continually exercised over him ever since I knew them — Doctor Brooke very well knows that, in the winter of the year 74, (when I was on the most intimate and friendly footing with Robert and his wife) that he frequently conversed with them upon the subject of our not being married. —In full confidence that your lordship will allow the facts I have presumed to state their due weight, and make such use of them, as you, in your superior wisdom and goodness, shall see proper. I remain,

With the highest respect,

My Lord,

Your lordship's most obedient,

And most humble servant,

M. C. RUDD.

English Theatre.

Covent-Garden.

ON Monday evening the 25th of Feb. a new Mask, called The Syrens, written by Capt. E. Thompson, was performed at this Theatre, of which the Dramatis Personæ were as follow :

Grenade,

Grenade,	Mr. Mattocks.
Borcas,	Mr. Reinhold.
Carlos,	Mr. Dubellamy.
Forecastle,	Mr. Wilson.
Traverse,	Mr. Mahon.
Gale,	Mr. Quick.
Druid,	Mr. L'Estrange.
Zephyr, Satyr, &c. &c.
Parthenope,	Mrs. Mattocks.
Doris,	Miss Barfanti.
Margery,	Mrs. Pitt.

The scene of this piece is laid on the coast of the Syrens, which Ulysses is (in the Odyssy of Homer) related to have passed when he stopped the ears of his companions, that they might not yield to their enchanting songs and enticements. In the Masque, the principal Syren, called Parthenope, (who has, besides her allurements, the power of magic) foreknowing that a British vessel would pass her coast, raises a storm, which casts all the persons aboard on her enchanted ground. Grenade, the captain, his wife Cornelia, his friend Carlos, mariners and attendants, make up the groupe. The sorcerer's uses all her endeavours to seduce Grenade from his fidelity and affection to his wife Cornelia, whom (the better to effect her purposes) she inspires, by the influence of her magic, with a sudden passion for Carlos. The honour of Grenade however continues unshaken, and his love undiminished, notwithstanding Parthenope produces his wife apparently yielding to the solicitations of Carlos. In return for this noble firmness, a British Druid comes to his relief, who counteracts the spells of the enchantress, restores the reason of Cornelia, delivers her to her lord undishonoured, and repentant of her momentary frailty. The wrecked vessel is also repaired by the power of the Druid, and thereby a means of escape given to the whole party from this land of dangerous enchantment. These events compose what may be called the serious part of the masque, which is judiciously relieved by the whimsical conversation and various characters of the wretched sailors, an attendant of Cornelia, and a wanton nymph of the island.

To attempt a dramatic piece in the stile of the Syrens was a very bold undertaking. It admits of no medium. The nature of the fable allows great scope for the poet's imagination, as he is not confined to allotted space (if the phrase be allowed.) The few pieces of this kind now on the stage, are offsprings of as great geniusses as this or any other country ever produced; and are written with an unbounded fire of fancy, originality of idea, language, and character. Indeed the warmth and energy of the diction could not be produced by any thing less than an enthusiasm equal to that said to be felt by Virgil's Sybil. It cannot be matter of surprize if we do not approve of the piece before us, as it is entirely deficient of the above-mentioned requisites, so essentially necessary in an entertainment where the imagination may sport at will, and where a poverty disgusts. The serious part of this piece has little or no merit; the comic is no more respectable.

If the author has been too frigid in his language, the composer, Mr. Fisher, cannot be charged with having imbibed the infection. Natural genius and scientific knowledge are happily blended in the music, and several of the airs would not disgrace the first Italian masters. Indeed the only objection that occurs to the music is, too great a similitude to their stile, which, though it receives the approbation of the Connoscenti, does not immediately strike the multitude until by repetition it becomes familiar. We are firmly persuaded, that if Mr. Fisher would exercise his talents for composition something more than he has lately thought proper, he would acquire a degree of reputation equal to what he has as an instrumental performer.

On Tuesday the 19th March another new Farce called The Impostors, or, A Cure for Credulity, was performed at this theatre: the characters were as follow:

Lopez,	Mr. Woodward.
Don Creduloso de	} Mr. Wilson.
Moyados,
Pedro,	Mr. Wroughton.
Alguazil,	Mr. Thompson.
Alphonso,	Mr. Lewis.
Jacintha,	Mrs. Pitt.
Inis,	Mrs. Williams.
Florentine,	Miss Dayes.

Alphonso and Lopez (professed sharpers) enter, and the former regrets their having come to Merida, where gaming is not so much in vogue as to promise them any considerable harvest. While they are in consultation on the means of raising supplies, they are alarmed by the cry of murder, and Alphonso draws his sword, goes to the side of the stage, and is there met by Don Creduloso, who is attacked by three ruffians; but upon being opposed, they retreat, and then the old man expresses the warmest gratitude to his deliverers, and informs them, that a young gentleman had made professions of love to his daughter Florentine, but that he was obliged to discourage his pretensions on account of his brother, a short time previous to his disease, having enjoined him to give her to Don Pedro de Menbrilla: and that the preference given to Pedro occasioned the first lover to attempt his assassination.

Upon this Alphonso flies into his arms, declaring himself to be the identical Pedro; and this Lopez confirms, adding, that on the road they were robbed of all their wealth. Creduloso is overjoyed at the sight of his expected son-in-law, and proposes the marriage to be celebrated the next day. They retire, and wait for remittances to enable them to pay their respects in a proper manner. Creduloso calls his daughter, and introduces her to Alphonso. While they are in conversation, he calls Lopez aside, and puts a purse into his hand, which he says contains 100 pistoles. He refuses to receive it, but being pressed, consents to run the hazard of offending his master; observing, that though he would on no consideration accept the favour from an indifferent person, he may perhaps from the father of his intended wife.

The men retire, and a conversation ensues between Florentine and Jacintha, her aunt, who declares herself strongly in favour of a young nobleman at Madrid; but the young lady opposes her advice, and declares she will not be sacrificed to wealth or title.

The second act opens with a short scene between Creduloso and Alphonso, in which the Don promises to give his daughter an addition of 10,000 pistoles, as a mark of gratitude to Alphonso for having saved his life. The servant of the real Pedro enters as Alphonso leaves the stage, and the master almost instantly follows; he declares himself, and claims the lady, upon which Lopez accuses him, of being the principal of the banditti, by whom his master and he had been robbed.

No arguments will prevail on Creduloso to believe Alphonso an impostor; but some measures for an eclairsissement being proposed, he acknowledges that he is not the person whose character he assumed; but declares himself to be an Italian prince. The father breaks into the most extravagant raptures at this intelligence, and orders preparations for the wedding next day; but an Alguazil brought by Pedro recollects to have had Lopez in custody, and on that account thinks himself justifiable in taking both him and his master to prison. Florentine discovers Pedro to be the person she had fallen in love with at the theatre in Madrid, and readily consents to marry him; which being agreed to by the father and aunt, they solicit the release of the impostors, and the piece concludes.

The story of this piece is professedly taken from Le Sage's Gil Blas; and although we cannot pay the dramatist any great compliment either on the refinement of his diction, the management of his fable, the sublimity of his allusions, or, in a word, on the excellence of his tout ensemble; it would be unjust were we not to say, that the farce provoked most hearty peals of laughter; it may therefore serve as well as any other such Bartholomew-fair-like droll for a heel-piece to the performance on a benefit night.

Drury-Lane.

On Thursday evening the 7th March, a new comedy of two acts, written by Mr. Colman, called The Spleen, or Islington Spa, was performed at this theatre; the characters of which follow:

Rubric,	Mr. King.
Doyley,	Mr. Parsons.
Aspin,	Mr. Baddeley.
Dr. Macchoof,	Mr. Moody.
Jack Rubric,	Mr. Palmer.
Merton,	Mr. Brereton.
Folio,	Mr. Whitfield.
Mrs. Rubric,	Mrs. Hopkins.
Eliza,	Miss P. Hopkins.
Letitia,	Mrs. King.
Tabitha,	Mrs. Love.
Maid,	Mrs. Davies.

The love story of this little piece differs from the common ones of almost every comedy and farce, because the lovers are married, and their difficulties are in the avowal of their marriage, which is disagreeable to the father, Mr. Rubric, a Bookseller in Paternoster-Row. Mr. Rubric, a citizen of taste, has a country-house at Islington. Mrs. Rubric's account of the elegant amusements of Islington Spa; her preparations to go to her country-house in the stage; and her sister Tabitha's moral remarks on her dissipation, are laughable enough, but ran out into too great length, as the circumstances are common and trivial. Old Rubric had engaged his daughter Eliza to Mr. Doyley, an old woollen-draper from behind St. Clement's, who had retired to Islington for the air and the recovery of his health. Aspin, a brother of Mrs. Rubric, disapproving of Mr. Rubric's extravagance, and and his method of disposing of his daughter, enters into a plot with Merton, Eliza's concealed husband, and an officer from Gibraltar, and young Rubric, just arrived from Cambridge, to defeat the designs of the old people. They equip Letitia, a female cousin of Miss Rubric's, as a modern foppish physician; he is introduced to Mr. Doyley, but is observed to pass the night in the chamber of Miss Eliza. Doyley on this discovery, wants to get clear of a bond which he had given Rubric; but Rubric is not disposed to give it up. Matters, however, are made up by Doyley's agreeing to pay half the forfeit, and Aspin's generosity in giving the other half, and Eliza is delivered to Merton.

Our readers will see that the fable of this piece is extremely trivial, and the incidents uninteresting. The principal attention of the author must have been to the characters and dialogue of his comedy. We have several objections to the former; one of which might be made to all Mr. Colman's plays, (except when he writes in partnership) that they put us in mind of superior productions either in Latin or French. The splenetic man in this comedy is so much inferior to Moliere's Malade Imaginaire, that putting us in mind of him is ill-judged, as we are hindered by regret from allowing to the character of Doyley the little merit which it may possess.

We have more than one reason for disliking that of Rubric. It is a caricature; and what is much worse, it seems as if drawn to indulge some private resentment against an odd, but worthy man. No man who knew the original, can mistake the portrait in its general features; but Mr. Colman has shaded it with faults which were not in the original. Every body knows that a late celebrated bookseller, not a hundred miles from St. Paul's church-yard, was bustling, and fond of projects; but none of his acquaintance will give credit to Mr. Colman, when he endeavours to blot his memory with avarice or meanness. The scene with Machoof, the farrier, could therefore be only the effect of ill-nature. This is reprehensible, as it is directed against a good private man; and the more reprehensible, as that man is dead.

Aspin is a man of consequence in the conclusion, but does not appear sufficiently so before.

Merton's character is not marked by any distinguishing circumstance.

Young Rubric was meant by the author as something extraordinary. He is so. In his images and allusions we will venture to say that he hints at the whole stock of Mr. Colman's learning; and the author must have forgot himself when he ascribed so much to a Cambridge student: but perhaps he only meant to appease by way of compliment, the living son for injuries to the deceased father. This young man, however, is much the most smart and witty in the author's groupe, and he rifles the regions of science often for conceits. Things should not always move in straight lines, curves are often most beautiful and convenient, and a cork is drawn out of a bottle by a spiral.

Mrs. Rubric is such a character as never existed. No woman in London, above an idiot, could say, that Islington Spa is frequented by Mrs. Rummer from the King's Arms, and many other people of quality.

Tabitha, an old maiden sister of Mrs. Rubric, is very well imagined; and Eliza is insignificant. But Letitia is extravagant and absurd. The present race of physicians have quitted the solemn affectations and fopperies of the last and former ages; but surely they would be much better represented by a man than a woman, especially as the author's fancy is so frigid as not to make this circumstance afford a little laughter.

The wit and dialogue of this piece will hardly keep it long in esteem with the public. They are sometimes lively, but generally pert and affected.

On Saturday the 23d March, a new musical piece, called Valentine's Day, written by a Mr. Heard, was represented after the Orphan for the benefit of Mr. Reddih.

This little drama met with rather an unfavourable reception. It would be breaking a butterfly on the wheel, were we to enter into a strict examination of it; and as it was a mere benefit-night performance, it would be going out of our way to dwell much upon its defects; suffice it therefore, that although we so far join with the audience in condemnation of it, that we allow it wanted terseness of dialogue, brilliancy of wit, and strength of fable, yet we protest we have seen worse singing pieces received with applause. Jeremy Jingle had some humour, and the music had great prettiness about it.

Oratorio Intelligence.

Drury-Lane.

On Wednesday evening, March 20, was performed at this theatre, for the first time, A Lyric Ode on the Fairies, Witches, and aerial Beings of Shakespeare. This poem is said to be written by a young gentleman of Oxford, and had many strokes of genius and imagination in it. The music, we hear, is composed by Mr. Linley, junior, who has (since his return from Italy) been a student under that most excellent musician doctor Boyce. This composition must be allowed to be an extraordinary effort of genius in so young a man.

The History of the Female Sex: In a Series of Letters. (Continued from p. 148.)

L E T T E R III.

Unhappy State of Women in America, Siberia, and Russia—New Testament prohibited to be read by them in England—Women purchased—Affecting Anecdote of an American Wife—Agreeable Situation of Females in polished Nations.

ACCORDING to my proposal in my last, I proceed to explain how Polygamy is derived from savage manners and from voluptuousness in warm climates.

With respect to the first, sweetness of temper, a capital branch of the female character, displays itself externally, by mild looks, and gentle manners. But such graces are scarce perceptible in a female savage; and even in the most polished would not be perceived by a male savage. Among savages, strength and boldness are the only valued qualities: In these qualities females are miserably deficient; and for that reason are contemned by the males, as beings of an inferior order. The North American tribes glory in idleness: The drudgery of labour degrades a man in their opinion, and is proper for women only. To join young persons in marriage is accordingly the business of parents; and it would be unpardonable meanness in the bridegroom to shew any fondness for the bride. Young men among the Hot-tentots are admitted into society with their seniors at the age of eighteen; after which it is disgraceful to keep company with Females. In Guiana, a woman never eats with her husband, but after every meal attends him with water for washing. A woman in the Caribbee islands is not permitted to eat even in presence of her husband; and yet Labat, in his voyages to the American Islands, assures us, that the women there obey with such sweetness and respect, as never to give their husbands occasion to remind them of their duty; 'an example,' adds our sage author, 'worthy the imitation of Christian wives, who are daily instructed from the pulpit in the duties of obedience and conjugal fidelity, but to very little purpose.' Dampier observes in general, that, among all the wild nations he was acquainted with, the women carry the burdens, while the men walk before, and carry nothing but their arms. Women even of the highest rank are not better treated. The sovereign of Giaga, in Africa, has many wives, who are literally his slaves: One carries his bow, one his arrows, and one gives him drink; and, while he is drinking, they all fall on their knees, clap their hands, and sing. Not many centuries ago, a law (see 34th and 35th Hen. VIII.) was made in England, prohibiting the New Testament in English to be read by women, prentices, journey men, or serving men. What a pitiful figure must the poor women have made in that age! In Siberia, and even in Russia, the capital excepted, men treat their wives in every respect as slaves. The regulations of Peter I. put marriage upon a more respectable footing among people of rank; and yet such are the brutal manners of the Russians, that tyrannical treatment of wives is far from being eradicated.

The low condition of the Female Sex among savages and barbarians paved the way to Polygamy. Savages, excited by a taste for variety, and still more by pride, which is gratified by many servants, delight in a multiplicity of wives. The pairing principle, though rooted in human nature, makes little figure among savages, yielding to every irregular appetite; and this fairly accounts why Polygamy was once universal. It might indeed be thought, that animal love, were there nothing else, should have raised women to some degree of estimation among the men. But Male Savages, utter strangers to decency or refinement, gratify animal love with as little ceremony as they do hunger or thirst.

Hence appears the reason of a custom that will surprise those who are unacquainted with antient customs; which is, that women were purchased for wives, as other goods are purchased. Women by marriage became slaves; and no man will give away his daughter to be a slave, but for a valuable consideration. The practice practice was universal. I begin with the Jews. Abraham bought Rebekah, and gave her to his son Isaac for a wife. Jacob, having nothing else to give, served Laban fourteen years for two wives. In the Iliad, Agamemnon offers his daughter to Achilles for a wife, and says, that he would not demand for her any price. Pausanias reports of Danaus, that, no suitors appearing to demand any of his daughters, he published, that he would give them without dowry. In Homer there is frequent mention of nuptial gifts from a bridegroom to his bride's father. From terming them gifts, it is probable that the former method of purchase was beginning to wear out. It wore out before the time of Aristotle, who infers, that their forefathers must have been a very rude people. The antient Spaniards purchased their wives. We have the authority of Herodotus and of Heraclides Ponticus, that the same was practised in Thure. And the latter adds, that, if a wife was ill-treated, her relations could demand her back, upon repaying the price they got for her. In the Roman law mention is made of matrimony per æs et libram, which was solemnised by laying down a quantity of brass, with a balance for weighing it, understood to be the price paid for the bride. This must have been once a reality, though it sunk down to be a mere ceremony, after it became customary for a Roman bride to bring a dowry with her. The Babylonians and the Assyrians, at stated times, collected all the marriageable young women, and disposed of them by auction. Rubruguis, in his voyage to Tartary, ann. 1253, reports, that there every man bought his wife. They believe, he adds, that their wives serve them in another world as they do in this; for which reason, a widow has no chance for a second husband, whom she cannot serve in the other world. Olaus Magnus remarking, that among the antient Goths no dowry was provided on the bride's part, gives a reason, better suited perhaps to the time he lived in than to what he describes. Among the Goths, a man gave a dowry for his bride, instead of receiving one with her; to prevent pride and insolence, that commonly accompany riches on the woman's part: As if the hazard of petulancy in a wife would hinder a man to accept a dowry with her: A sad doctrine for an heiress. Giraldus Cambrensis, in his description of Wales, says, that formerly they hardly ever married without a prior cohabitation, it having been customary for parents to let out their daughters to young men upon trial, for a sum of money told down, and under a penalty, if the girls were returned. This I believe to be a mistake. It is more probable, that in Wales men purchased their wives, as was done all the world over, with liberty to return them, if they proved not agreeable. The bride's parents retained the dowry, and her chance for a husband was as good as ever.

The same custom continues among barbarous nations. It continues among the Tartars, among the Mingrelians, among the Samoides, among the Ostiaks, among the people of Pegu, and of the Molucca islands. In Timor, an East Indian island, men even sell their children to purchase more wives. The prince of Circassia demanded from the prince of Mingrelia, who was in suit of his daughter, a hundred slaves loaded with tapestry and other household furniture, a hundred cows, as many oxen, and as many horses. We have evidence of the same custom in Africa, particularly in Biledulgerid, among the negroes on the sea coast, and in Monomotapa. Among the Caribbees there is one instance where a man gets a wife without paying for her. After a successful war, the victors are entertained at a feast, where the general harangues on the valour of the young men who made the best figure. Every man who has marriageable daughters is fond to offer them to such young men without any price. The purchasing of wives is universal among the wild Arabs. When the bargain is concluded, the bridegroom is permitted to visit the bride: If she answer not his expectations, he may turn her off, but has no claim for the price he paid. The inland negroes are more polished than those on the coast; and there is scarce any remains among them of purchasing wives: The bridegroom makes presents to his bride, and her father makes presents to him. There are remaining traces in Russia of purchasing wives. Even so late as the time of Peter I, the Russians married without seeing each other; and, before solemnization, the bride received from the bridegroom a present of sweetmeats, soap, and other little things.

The purchasing of wives made it a lawful practice to lend a wife as one does a slave. The Spartans lent their wives to their friends; and Cato the elder is said to have done the same. The Indians of Calicut frequently exchange wives.

If brutish manners alone be sufficient to degrade the Female Sex, they may reckon reckon upon extreme harsh treatment when purchased to be slaves. The Gias, a fierce and wandering nation in the central parts of Africa, being supinely idle at home, subject their wives and slaves to every sort of drudgery, such as digging, sowing, cutting wood, grinding corn, fetching water, &c. These poor creatures are suffered to toil in the fields and woods, ready to faint with excessive labour, while the monsters of men will not give themselves even the trouble of training animals for work, though they have the example of the Portuguese before their eyes. It is the business of the women among the wandering Arabs of Africa, to card, spin, and weave, and to manage other household affairs. They milk the cattle, grind, bake, brew, dress the victuals, and bring home wood and water. They even take care of their husbands' horses, feed, curry, comb, bridle, and saddle them. They would also be obliged, like Moorish wives, to dig, sow, and reap their corn, but luckily for them the Arabs live entirely upon plunder. Father Joseph Gumilla, in his account of a country in South America, bordering upon the great river Oroonoko, describes pathetically the miserable slavery of married women there, and mentions a practice that would appear incredible to one unacquainted with the manners of that country, which is, that married women frequently destroy their female infants. A married woman, of a virtuous character and good understanding, having been guilty of that crime, was reproached by our author in bitter terms. She heard him patiently to an end, with eyes fixed on the ground; and answered as follows: 'I wish to God, Father, I wish to God, that my mother had by my death prevented the manifold distresses I have endured, and have yet to endure as long as I live. Had she kindly kissed me at my birth, I should not have felt the pain of death, nor numberless other pains to which life hath subjected me. Consider, Father, our deplorable condition. Our husbands go to hunt with their bows and arrows, and trouble themselves no farther. We are dragged along, with one infant at our breast, and another in a basket. They return in the evening without any burden: We return with the burden of our children; and, though tired out with a long march, are not permitted to sleep, but must labour the whole night in grinding maize, to make chicha for them. They get drunk, and in their drunkenness beat us, draw us by the hair of the head, and tread us under foot. And what have we to comfort us for slavery, perhaps of twenty years? A young wife is brought in upon us, who is permitted to abuse us and our children, because we are no longer regarded. Can human nature endure such tyranny! What kindness can we shew to our female children equal to that of relieving them from such servitude, more bitter a thousand times than death? I say again, would to God that my mother had put me under ground the moment I was born.' One would readily imagine, that the women of that country should have the greatest abhorrence at matrimony: But all-prevailing nature determines the contrary; and the appetite for matrimony overbalances every rational consideration.

Nations polish by degrees; and, from the lowest state to which a human creature can be reduced, women came in time to be restored to their native dignity. Attention to dress is the first symptom of that progress. Male Savages, even of the grossest kind, are fond of dress. Charlevoix mentions a young American hired as a rower, who adjusted his dress with great care before he entered the boat; and at intervals inspected his looking-glass, to see whether the violence of his motion had not discomposed the red upon his cheeks.

We read not of vanity for dress in females of such savage nations: They are too much dispirited to think of being agreeable. Among nations in any degree humanised we find a different scene. In the isthmus of Darien Government has made some progress, as a Chieftain is elected for life: A glimmering of civility appears among the inhabitants; and, as some regard is paid to women, they rival the men in dress. Both sexes wear rings in their ears and noses, and are adorned with many rows of shells hanging down from the neck. A female in a sultry climate submits to fry all day long under a load of twenty or thirty pounds of shells; and a male under double that load. Well may they exclaim with Alexander, "Oh Athenians! what do I not endure to gain your approbation?" The female Caribbeans and Brasilians are not less fond of ornament than the males. Hot-tentot Ladies are fond of dress, and strive to outdo each other in adorning their krosses, and the bag that holds their pipe and tobacco: European Ladies are not more vain of their silks and embroideries. Women in Lapland are much addicted to finery. They wear broad

broad girdles, upon which hang chains and rings without end, commonly made of tin, sometimes of silver, weighing perhaps twenty pounds. The Greenlanders are nasty and slovenly, eat with their dogs, make food of the vermin that make food of them, seldom or never wash themselves; and yet the women, who make some figure among the men, are gaudy in their dress. Their chief ornaments are pendants at their ears, with glass beads of various colours; and they draw lines with a needle and black thread between their eyes, across the forehead, upon the chin, hands, and legs. The negroes of the kingdom of Ardrah in Guinea have made a considerable progress in police, and in the art of living. Their women carry dress and finery to an extravagance. They are clothed with loads of the finest fattins and chintzes, and are adorned with a profusion of gold. In a sultry climate they gratify vanity at the expence of ease. Among the inland negroes, who are more polished than those on the sea-coast, beside domestic concerns, the women sow, plant, and reap. A man however suffers in the esteem of the world, if he permit his wives to toil like slaves, while he is indulging in ease. From that auspicious commencement, the Female Sex have risen in a slow but steady progress to higher and higher degrees of estimation. Conversation is their talent, and a display of delicate sentiments: The gentleness of their manners, and winning behaviour, captivate every sensible heart. Of such refinements Savages have little conception: But when the more delicate senses are unfolded, the peculiar beauties of the Female Sex, internal as well as external, are brought into full light; and women, formerly considered as objects of animal love merely, are now valued as faithful friends and agreeable companions. Matrimony assumes a more decent form, being the union, not of a master and slave, but of two persons equal in rank uniting to form a family. And it contributed greatly to this delicious refinement, that in temperate climes animal love is moderate, and women long retain good looks, and power of procreation. Thus marriage became honourable among polished nations; which of course banished the barbarous custom of purchasing wives; for a man, who wishes to have his daughter properly matched, will gladly give a dowry with her, instead of selling her as a slave.

Father Charlevoix is of opinion, that the Canadian fishery, if properly improved, would be more likely to enrich that country than the fur trade. Besides a great variety of other fish in the lakes and rivers, particularly that of St. Lawrence, are sea-wolves, sea-cows, porpoises, the lencornet, the gobarque, the sea-plaife, salmon trouts, turtles, lobsters, the chaourafou, sturgeon, the achigau, and the gilt-head. The sea-wolf, so called from its howling, is an amphibious creature. His head resembles that of a dog: he has four very short legs, of which the fore ones have nails, but the hind ones terminate in fins. The largest are said to weigh two thousand pounds, and are of different colours. Their flesh is good eating, but the profit of it lies in its oil, which is proper for burning, and currying of leather. Their skins make excellent coverings for trunks, and though not so fine as Morocco leather, they preserve their freshness better, and are less liable to cracks. The shoes and boots made of those skins let in no water, and when properly tanned, make excellent and lasting covers for seats. The Canadian sea-cow is larger than the sea-wolf, but resembles it in figure. It has two teeth of the thickness and length of a man's arm, that, when grown, look like horns, and are very fine ivory, as well as its other teeth. Some of the porpoises of the river St. Lawrence are said to yield a hoghead of oil, and of their skins are made waistcoats, which are excessively strong, and musket-proof. The lencornet is a kind of cuttle fish, quite round, or rather oval: there are two sorts of them, which differ only in size; some of them being as large as a hog-head, and others but a foot long: they catch only the last, and that with a torch: they are excellent eating, roasted, boiled, or fricased; but they make the sauce quite black. The gobarque has the taste and smell of a small cod. The sea-plaife is excellent eating; and they are taken with long poles, armed with iron hooks. The chaourafou is an armed fish, resembling a pike; but is covered with scales, that are proof against a dagger: some of them are above five feet long, and about the thickness of a man's thigh: this fish is said even to catch and devour birds; in order to which, he conceals himself among the canes or reeds, in such a manner manner that nothing is to be seen besides his weapon, which he holds, raised perpendicularly, above the surface of the water: the fowls, which come to take rest, imagining the weapon to be only a withered reed, make no scruple of perching upon it; but they are no sooner alighted, than the fish opens his throat, and so suddenly makes at his prey, that it rarely escapes. The Indians pretend their teeth are a sovereign remedy against the tooth-ach, and that, by pricking the part most affected with one of them, the pain instantly vanishes. The sturgeon is both a fresh and salt-water fish, from 8 to 12 feet long, and proportionably thick: the smallest have a flesh of a most delicate grain, and are excellent eating. The achigau, and the gilt-head, are fish peculiar to the river St. Lawrence.

The forests of Canada are not so well stocked with birds as its rivers are with fishes. They contain two kinds of eagles; the largest of which have a white head and neck, and prey upon hares and rabbits, which they carry up to their nest; but the other are grey, and prey on birds and fishes. The falcons, goshaws, terrels, are the same as in Europe: the partridges are grey, red, and black, with long tails, which they spread out as a fan, like a turkey-cock, and make a very beautiful appearance. Woodcocks are very scarce in Canada; but snipes, and other water-game, are plentiful. A Canadian raven is said by some writers to eat as well as a pullet, and an owl better. Blackbirds and swallows are birds of passage here, as well as in Europe, and three kinds of larks are found here, one species little different from European ones. No fewer than twenty-two different species of ducks are to be met with in Canada; and a great number of swans, turkeys, geese, bustards, teal, water-hens, cranes, and other large water-fowl, but always at a distance from houses. The cranes, of which some are white, and light grey, are said to make excellent soup. The Canadian wood-pecker is a beautiful bird. The thrushes and gold finches here differ little from those of Europe. The chief Canadian bird of melody is the white-bird, which is a kind of ortolan, very shewy, and remarkable for announcing the return of spring. The fly-bird is thought to be the most beautiful of any in nature; with all his plumage, he is no bigger than a cock-chaffer, and he makes a noise with his wings like the humming of a large fly: his legs are like two needles, and from his bill, which is of the same thickness, a small sting proceeds, with which he pierces the flowers, and thereby nourishes himself with the sap: the female has nothing striking in its appearance; but the male is a perfect beauty, having on his head a small tuft of the most beautiful black, his breast red, his belly white, his back, wings, and tail green, like that of a rose bush; specks of gold scattered all over the plumage, add greatly to its beauty; and an imperceptible down produces the most delightful shadings that can be imagined. Rattlesnakes are found in Canada, some of them as thick, or thicker, than a man's leg: when he moves, his tail, which is covered with rows of scales, rattles, whence he has his name. His bite is mortal, but an herb grows wherever this reptile is found in this country, called the rattle-snake's-plant, which is an infallible antidote to the poison of his bite, by chewing it, and applying it in the nature of a plaister to the wound. The rattle-snake seldom bites passengers, unless he is provoked or trod upon. The Indians, however, pursue them, and greatly prize their flesh, which they eat.

The forests of Canada present a most beautiful and awful appearance, and contain a vast variety of trees, among which are two sorts of pines, the white and the red; four sorts of firs: two sorts of cedar and oak, the white and the red; the male and female maple; three sorts of ash-trees, the free, the mungrel, and the bastard; three sorts of walnut-trees, the hard, the soft, and the smooth; vast numbers of beech trees, and white wood; white and red elms, and poplars. The Iroquois hollow the red elms into canoes, some of which, made out of one piece, will contain twenty persons. About November the bears and wild cats take up their habitations in the hollow elms, and remain there till April. Here are also found cherry-trees; plumb-trees; the vinegar-tree, the fruit of which, being infused in water, produces vinegar; an aquatic plant, called atoca, the fruit of which may be made into a confection; the white-thorn; the cotton-tree, on the top of which grow several tufts of flowers, which when shaken in the morning, before the dew falls off, produce honey that may be boiled up into sugar, the seed being a pod, containing a very fine kind of cotton; the sun-plant, which resembles a marigold, and grows to the height of seven or eight feet; Turkey corn; French beans; gourds; melons; capillaire; and the hop-plant.

Canada, while possessed by the French, exclusive of Louisiana, was divided into the provinces of Canada Proper, and Sanguenay; the former of which, lying towards the south-west, was subdivided into thirteen districts: and the latter, lying towards the north-east, into six: all, or most of them, taking their names from the principal settlements or forts in them.

Canada Proper, before the late war, was said to be inhabited by an hundred and eighty thousand French, who lived in affluence, being free from all taxes, and having full liberty to hunt, fish, fell timber for fuel or building, and to sow and plant as much land as they could cultivate. Their great hardship was the winter cold, which is there so excessive from December to April, that the greatest rivers are frozen over, and the snow lies commonly two or three feet deep on the ground, though it extends no farther north than 48°. of latitude.

The principal places in this province are Montreal and Trois Rivières.

The former stands on an island in the river St. Laurence, which is ten leagues in length, and almost four in breadth, at the foot of a mountain which gives name to it, about half a league from the south-shore. While the French were in possession of Canada, both the city and island of Montreal belonged to private proprietors, who had improved it so well, that the whole island was become a most delightful spot, and produced every thing that could administer to the conveniencies of life. The town, since it hath been in the hands of the English, hath suffered extremely by fires. When reduced by general Amherst, it was of an oblong form, well peopled, and surrounded by a wall, flanked with eleven redoubts, which served instead of bastions. The streets were well laid out, and the houses built in a very handsome manner. The ditch was about eight feet deep, and of a proportionable breadth, but dry. Here was also a fort or citadel, the batteries of which commanded the streets of the town, from one side of it to the other. These fortifications have been much improved by the English. The town itself is divided into two parts, the upper and the lower; in the last the merchants and men of business generally reside. Here likewife, before the peace, was the place of arms, the royal magazines, and the nunnery hospital. The upper town, however, contained the principal buildings, such as the palace of the governor, the houses of the chief officers, the convent of Recollets, the Jesuits church and seminary, the free school, and the parish church. The governor's palace is a large fine building. Besides a general hospital, the neighbourhood of this city contains many elegant villas; and all the vegetables of Europe grow in it. In short, when it fell into the hands of the English, all the banks of the river from thence to Quebec were but one continued village, adorned with fine plantations, and gentlemen's seats at proper distances. The inland trade of this town, and the rest of Canada, while they were possessed by the French, was with the Indian natives: they sent to the West-Indies racoon, fox, and beaver fur, skins of deer, and other branches of the peltry trade; and Indian corn, with what they call lumber, or wood. Their wine, brandy, cloth, linen, and wrought iron, came from Europe: and the native Indians took from them toys and trinkets of all kinds, duffil blankets, guns, powder, ball, kettles, hatchets, tomahawks, brandy, and tobacco. There was then a species of traders called courcurs des bois, who carried on a trade with nations unknown to all the world besides. In June a fair was held at Montreal, to which Indians resorted from the distance of a thousand miles, with peltry, and other Indian commodities; and the French from all parts of Canada. This fair sometimes lasted for three months. The resort of savage nations to it was incredible, and great disorders and tumults often happened; the Indians being so fond of brandy, that they sometimes for a dram gave the courcurs des bois all they had in the world. In the neighbourhood of the island, on which the town stands, is a great number of others, particularly that called the Isle of Jesus, which is about eight leagues in length, and two in breadth. There are also several lakes; among others that of St. Louis, and that formed by the opening of the river des Outaouais, or the Great River, into the river St. Laurence. On the banks of the last of these rivers likewise, not far from Montreal, are two villages of Iroquois Christians; one called Sault St. Louis, and other La Montaigne.

The town called Trois Rivières, or the K k Three

Three Rivers, has its name from three rivers, which join their currents about a quarter of a mile below it, and fall into the great one of St. Laurence. It is much resorted to by several nations that come down those rivers to it, and trade with it in various kinds of furs; and the country about it is pleasant, and fertile in corn, fruits, &c. A great number of handsome houses stand on both sides the rivers. This town gives name to a district, and stands about thirty leagues up the river St. Laurence from Quebec.

The other places of most note in this province are Gaspé, St. Jean Isle, Miscou Isle, Richlieu Isles, Isle Conti, St. Francois, Notre Dame des Anges, St. Alexis, St. Michael, St. Joseph, forts Frontenac, Niagara, near which is the famous fall, Fort Detroit, Michilichimenac, and many others.

The province of Seguinoy takes its name from the river so called, which issues from the lake of St. John, and falls into that of St. Laurence at Tadoussac, about thirty leagues below Quebec. This river is the boundary of the province on that side.

Quebec, the capital, not only of this province but of all Canada, and an episcopal see, is situated at the confluence of the rivers St. Laurence and St. Charles, or the Little River; and on the north side of the former, near Cape Diamond, about one hundred and forty leagues from the sea, or from Cape Rose or Rosieres. The river St. Laurence here is not above a mile in breadth, though not less than four or five leagues between it and the Isle of Orleans. It is built on a rock, partly of marble and partly of slate. The haven, which lies opposite the town, is safe and commodious, and about five fathom deep. Before the city was taken by the English, it is said to have made a very fine appearance. Among the principal edifices were, the episcopal palace; the cathedral; the fort or citadel, which was the residence of the governor-general; the house and church of the Recollets; the church of the Ursuline nuns, in which is the tomb of Monsieur Montcalm, who commanded the French, and was killed at the battle of Quebec, in which also fell that young hero Wolfe, who commanded the English; the sumptuous college of the Jesuits; the intendant's house, the king's magazines, &c. The city is divided into the upper and lower, and was well fortified when the English laid siege to it. The fort or citadel stands on the brink of the rock, and is a fine work: a pretty large esplanade, and a gentle declivity, the whole making a very fine platform, lies between the fort and the summit of Cape Diamond. About half a quarter of a league towards the country lies the hospital-general, which is the finest house in all Canada. The harbour is flanked by two bastions, that are raised twenty-five feet from the ground, which is about the height of the tides at the time of the equinox. In short, the fortifications of Quebec, at the time it was taken by the English, were as complete as the best engineers in the world could render them; and if it had not been for the amazing good fortune, and the more amazing intrepidity of the British troops, they might have bid defiance to all the power of Europe. When Charlevoix was at Quebec, he reckoned the inhabitants not to exceed seven thousand; but they were certainly above double that number when it was conquered by the English.

About three leagues from Quebec, before the war, was a most awful place of retirement, which excited in all who approached it, sentiments of reverence and sacred horror, which were more increased by the company of its inhabitants who were Hurons, or wild Indians, converted to christianity, simple in their manners, and fervid in their devotions, though of a tribe the fiercest and most untractable of all the American savages. They had a chapel built upon the same model as that of the famous holy house of Loretto in Italy, and therefore it was called the Huron village of Loretto. Between Quebec and Montreal, in sailing up the river St. Laurence, the eye is entertained with beautiful landscapes, the banks being in many places very bold and steep, and shaded with lofty trees, and in others crowded with villages, of which there are also many on the islands, wherewith the channel of the river is interspersed. After passing the Richlieu islands, the air becomes so mild and temperate, that the traveller thinks himself transported into another climate. Of the other places in this province, the most considerable are Sillery, Tadoussac, Port-Neuf, Beau-Port, St. Anne, St. Nicholas, Port-Cartier, Chechequedec and Necouba.

The different tribes of Indians in Canada are almost innumerable. It is not our intention, nor indeed in our power, to trace out all these; many of them are hardly known, even by name, to Europeans. Some of them, mentioned in the most early accounts, are now not to be found ; for those barbarians often carry on wars to the extermination of one another. The most considerable tribes at present are, the Iroquois, the Hurons, Miamis, Nokes, Oumamis, Outagamis, Sakis, Illinois, Oubaches, Otters or Doutres, Savannois, Sioux, Assiniboils, and Christinaux. The last seven live towards the north-west, about the rivers Missouri and Oubache, and about Lake Superior and Assiniboil. To the north of the island of Montreal the country is thinly peopled ; but a few villages belonging to the old inhabitants are to be met with, among which are those belonging to the Nepissings, so called from a lake of that name, who are the true descendants of the Algonquins, and still preserve the purity of that language. The French established some ports on the banks of Lake Superior, where they traded with the Christinaux and Assiniboils. In short, a traveller can know very little more of this country than a man may learn by an inspection of the map. He may wander one thousand miles on the banks of the finest lakes and rivers in the world, without meeting with a human creature ; and should he meet with any, they are generally so stupid, so cruel, so barbarous, or shy, that they scarcely deserve that denomination. Most of them appear to be void of all notions of agriculture, and subsist by fishing and hunting ; and they daily decrease in populousness, though they commonly allow themselves a plurality of wives : few of their tribes contain above six thousand souls, and many of them not two thousand. These barbarians are clothed chiefly with skins, but in different forms : those who are most admired and esteemed among them, and consequently have the greatest authority, are such as distinguish themselves either as hunters or warriors. They are all very superstitious, most of them having confused notions of a good and evil genius, and believing the sun to be the great divinity of the world. Many of them also believe transmigration, and that the deceased are fond of the same exercises and enjoyments in the other world that gave them delight in this.

Sketch of the Military and Civil Character of Lord George Germaine.

TO examine living characters, and to investigate the actions of men who are yet engaged on the Theatre of life, in order to hold up a striking picture of them to the world and to themselves, requires a more minute attention than writers, in general, employ, and a greater share of candour and impartiality than they are, in general, found to possess. The spirit of party too frequently calls the writer to this work, and, with the instructions necessary to proceed, infuses into his mind a thousand prejudices which must end in falsehood and misrepresentation. Private pique will operate to the same unworthy designs : and even an eager, inconsiderate friendship will, sometimes, prove as disadvantageous to the object of its praise and admiration as the most hostile opposition.

To attain excellence in biographical writing, higher abilities are necessary than ordinary observers may suppose ; and it is for this reason, that he who attains to eminence in this species of composition seldom receives the applause which he deserves. To possess the means of ascertaining the real actions of the individuals who are the objects of his consideration will be of little avail, if he has not acquired a knowledge sufficient to determine upon dubious actions, and the power of looking, with discernment, into the secret recesses of the human heart ; a faculty truly essential to him who undertakes to examine the private actions of a being so changeable and so capricious as man. He must also possess a judgment capable of selecting such parts of private life, as will form the most affecting picture ; with an eloquence and energy sufficient to impress the observations, which may arise from them, upon the bosom and conviction of the reader. These various qualifications are necessary to him who wishes to derive a reputation from the character of a Biographical writer.

But he who is employed in observing upon the life and actions of one who is no more, has a very considerable advantage over the person whose pen is employed in the investigation of living characters. The former has an object for his contemplation, whose state being determined, may be received with less fear of contradiction. Death having given the last stamp to his hero's character, it may be more particularly ascertained. They who have received favours may now declare his bounty without the imputation of interest ; and they who thought themselves injured, may speak their sentiments without apprehension. Friends will now allow some imperfections, and enemies own that he possessed some virtues, which while he lived to preserve by continual service, and foment by frequent opposition, opposing zeal would never suffer them to acknowledge. So that the general opinion of mankind being, as it were, fixed by death, the writer has a criterion whereby to form his judgment, and a land-mark which may direct his course in the nice and delicate enquiry. But he who observes upon a character yet existing, and is actually engaged in pursuing the business of life, with diligence and activity, labours under superior difficulties. The lesser circumstances of human action which, perhaps, affords more distinguishing marks of character than the important and public engagement of life, are now attained with difficulty, and can very seldom be ascertained in such a manner as to satisfy the mind, whose enquiries, being free from passion and prejudices, are governed by the desire of justice and the love of virtue.

The actions of living men are oftentimes at a great distance from completion, when they appear to be fully determined and entire. They cannot always be said to derive their colour from the moment in which they happen; and it may be often necessary to examine a long train of successive events before judgment can be decisive upon the matter. So that the observation of the philosopher seems to be well founded in reason, that a man's life and character cannot be fully ascertained till death has taken away all power of variation. A painter requires the object he means to represent to be in a motionless posture before him, in order to produce an exact similitude upon the canvass; while he finds it impossible to catch the likeness of a figure hastily passing by him, unless it possess some singularity which strikes so forcibly upon the memory of the artist, that he can paint it from the representation which is impressed there. A writer therefore discovers uncommon boldness, and, I think, imprudence also, who ventures beyond the leading actions of living characters, and descends into the secret recesses of their private life. For even if success could be secured in such a design, which is very improbable, it would not always be a mark of wisdom to carry it into execution: all men have their weaknesses and imperfections, and all weaknesses and imperfections ought not to be exposed to public view. It is inconsistent both with policy and humanity, when a man endeavours to hide his failings from the world, to thwart his wishes. To draw aside the veil with which he has covered them, is to discover what was never intended to be known; and being known, to make the possessor of them less careful about any future concealment. It is to interrupt the designs of virtue, to take away the sense of shame from the mind of the offender, and to teach him the art of being wicked without a blush. But to paint the leading features of living characters; to observe upon those actions which by their excellence or atrociousness are of consequence in the world; to alarm the bad by a display of their vices, to encourage the good by a publication of their virtues; to shield the innocent from the tongue of calumny, and to dissipate the cloud of incense which needy flattery raises around the infamous, is the duty of every man whose leisure and abilities enable him to give a due attention to subjects of this important nature. He cannot, surely, exert his thoughts to a more wise and salutary purpose, nor employ his pen in an office of more real honour to himself and importance to mankind.

The nobleman whose actions and character we are about to consider, from the extent of his abilities, the eminence of his former and present stations, with the singularity of his fortunes, becomes a subject of very extensive consideration; without looking farther into his private life than can be well ascertained, and is absolutely necessary to confirm the opinions which may be deduced from his conduct in more public capacities.

LORD GEORGE SACKVILLE, or, as we may now more properly style him, LORD GEORGE GERMAIN, * entered into life with so many and various advantages, that the eminence which he attained, may be considered as a situation to which they naturally conducted him. He was the younger son of the duke of Dorset, a nobleman of a most respectable and distinguished character, who had been the early favourite and chosen companion of his sovereign George the second. With these advantages he possessed great natural abilities improved by education, and highly polished by every elegant accomplishment which is generally thought to belong to his exalted rank. He entered upon the Military line, and his advancement was not, as may be supposed, attended with

delay. In the battle of Fontenoy he was actually engaged, and behaved with a spirit which seemed to justify the choice of his profession. Without mentioning the particular circumstances of his rise in the army, it may be sufficient to observe, that it was not supposed to transcend his deserts. But it was soon discovered that he possessed abilities equal to any employment whereto they might be directed, when on the appointment of his father to the Lieutenancy of Ireland, his lordship was named to be secretary of state for that kingdom; the duties of which office he administered with great ability and acknowledged reputation.

His character, as a man of very superior talents, was now universally established: and they who, in their speculations, anticipated the events of future times, beheld him invested with the first honours of his profession and his country. On the failure of the secret expedition against Rochfort in 1757, he was appointed, with the Duke of Marlborough and general Waldegrave, to enquire into the ill-success of that great, national project. But though he had a person of the highest rank and an officer of known courage joined with him in his trust, it was considered, by the nation in general, as a matter which almost entirely depended upon him: and tho' his colleagues were men of distinguished honour and integrity, both government and the people depended chiefly on the sagacity of lord George Germain to unfold the hidden causes, why this stupendous armament did not answer its original destination.

Without attending his lordship thro' all his different promotions, we shall beg leave to consider him at once as commander in chief of the British forces in Germany; to which important post, he succeeded in 1759, on the death of the duke of Marlborough. Here then we must consider this nobleman as arrived at the highest pinnacle of power and importance which he ever attained; an height from which fortune, who seemed tired of protecting him, resolved to cast him down; and to aggravate his misfortune, she effected her fatal purpose at a time, when he had not the least suspicion of such an event, and therefore, could not be, in the least, prepared to guard against it. The battle of Minden, which produced so much glory to his country, covered him with disgrace; and he, perhaps, was the only man in the British service, who had reason to look back upon the trophies of it with heaviness of heart. He, certainly, suffered most severely for the misconduct of that day. The violence of popular fury exerted all its powers against him; and with tumultuous joy applauded the sentence which disgraced him. But when this rage had spent its fury and began to subside; when the minds of men, inflamed by a popular opinion, had time to cool upon the matter; he was, generally, considered as a man who had been treated with uncommon severity, not to say injustice; that he had acted as well as his situation would admit; and if he was guilty of an error, it must proceed from the failure of his judgment, and not, as it had been industriously propagated, from fear of danger. Many did not scruple to assert, upon a more exact attention and minute intelligence, that this officer was sacrificed to the private disgust of prince Ferdinand; and that this antipathy arose from motives, which, while they were very disgraceful to the prince, ought to have conferred singular honour on the integrity and diligence of the unfortunate general.

It is well known that prince Ferdinand and lord George Germain had differed in opinion concerning some military operations; and that the latter being of opinion against some motions of the army proposed by the former, as very disadvantageous, he opposed those designs with so much firmness, that they were not put into execution. Besides, the English general, by diligently exercising his sagacity in a minute attention to his duty, had rendered himself very disagreeable to the commander in chief, as it appeared to thwart some designs of an avaricious nature, which his highness was supposed, at that time, to meditate, and which, by the inattention of a succeeding officer, it is believed that he actually accomplished. If these circumstances are true, and we must own there are most probable grounds for the suggestion, it is very natural to conclude, that the prince would not pass by a favourable opportunity of procuring lord George Germain's removal from a station, wherein, by a patriotic vigilance, he prevented the interests of his country from being made subservient to the gainful projects of an individual, however eminent for abilities, or however dignified by station.

To enter into a particular detail of all the transactions which produced the disgrace of our accomplished officer, to repeat the calumnies which were propagated against him, and to echo, at this distance, distance, the popular clamours which pursued him, would be needless and, we trust, irksome to the reader; we shall, therefore, wave a minute description, and only mention what is absolutely necessary to give a just idea of this interesting and singular period of his lordship's life.

We have already observed, that previous to the battle of Minden, prince Ferdinand and the British general did not accord together with that harmony which the cause wherein they were both engaged seemed to demand; and, on the eve of it, when his serene highness had determined to attack the French army, and had actually formed a plan for that purpose, he did not communicate his design to lord George, who from the station he held was, most certainly, entitled to such a mark of confidence; abstracted from the utility which must naturally flow to the service from such a communication. But the base passions of the man mingled with the great designs of the hero; and the glory of the approaching day would be incomplete, if private resentment failed of its gratification. On the day of battle, from what appeared to be a perplexity in the orders of prince Ferdinand, the British general delayed to advance with the horse as he was commanded, so that the cavalry was declared to have been prevented by such neglect from having that decisive share in the business of that day, which would have rendered the victory far more perfect and entire. In the thanks which his highness published to the army on the occasion, lord George Germain's name was not only entirely omitted, but a heavy censure of his conduct was implied in the particular compliments which the prince thought proper to address to the marquis of Granby.

When the news of this important victory reached London, it was accompanied with reports very unfavourable to the British commander. He was represented as a most atrocious coward, whose fear had rendered the success of the allied army incomplete, frustrated the bravery of the British cavalry, and brought an eternal disgrace upon his country and himself. The press now teemed with accusations against this unfortunate nobleman; and the many who attacked as well as the very few who attempted to defend him, resting their assertions upon vague and indeterminate authorities, were equally unsuccessful in throwing any light upon the subject; while the former, being more congenial to the spirit of the people, were universally believed, and the latter as generally reprobated and despised. In short, the cry was against him; his name was become detestable, and his character loaded with every term of ignominy and reproach. The facts which had occasioned the displeasure of the prince, varied every hour, and every change brought accumulated guilt along with it; and though they were not ascertained for serious men to reason upon them, the people, having once possessed the idea that lord George had played the coward, were hurried away into an excess of outrage against him. The courage, however, which he was accused of wanting on the plains of Minden seemed to be fully restored to him, when, after resigning his command in Germany, he dared to return to England, and encounter the intemperate fury of his exasperated countrymen. On his arrival, his conduct bore the strongest marks of conscious innocence. He immediately addressed the public, humbly requesting a suspension of their opinion concerning him, 'till a court-martial, which he had desired, should determine his innocence or his guilt. After stripping him of all his military employments, the king was pleased to grant his lordship a court-martial: and the public waited the event of it with impatience, that his guilt might be confirmed, or his innocence made manifest. The trial lasted many days, during the course whereof, the noble prisoner displayed all the powers of his comprehensive mind. His defence was admirable, and compelled the slow applause even of his enemies; but, notwithstanding its judicious arrangement, skilful arguments, and persuasive eloquence, it availed him nothing in the main point to which it was directed; and he was found guilty of disobeying the orders of his commander prince Ferdinand, and adjudged incapable of serving his king and country in any military capacity whatever. To encrease the severity of this sentence, the king signified his pleasure, that it should be given out in public orders in every part of his dominions where troops were stationed, assigning, at the same time, the most mortifying reason that could be suggested for such a publication; "That officers being convinced, that neither high birth nor great employments can shelter offences of such a nature, and that seeing they are subject to censures much worse than death to a man who has any sense of honour, they may avoid the fatal consequences arising from disobedience of orders."

ders." But the measure of lord George Germain's disgrace did not seem to have been full, 'till the king, with his own hand, struck his name from the list of privy counsellors.

The general officers who sat as the judges of this unfortunate commander, in finding him guilty, did what they thought their duty; and a rigid love of disciplined them, we presume, to pass a sentence of such severity on the delinquent. Nay, it was whispered, at the time, and universally believed that the majority of the court were of opinion that the offence should be punished with death; but the number did not prove sufficient for the fatal verdict; as the mercy of our laws has ordained that, in military trials, two-thirds of the judges must agree in order to produce a capital conviction.

That the king should be highly offended, does not surprize us; nor do we wonder at the method which he took to show his indignation. He was, himself, a man of dauntless courage and hated a coward. He was proud of the military character, and, therefore, despised, from his heart, any one who had disgraced it. But there was another and, to him, a more affecting circumstance, which occasioned an uncommon displeasure in the royal breast on this occasion: The neglect of duty was in Germany; and in a battle, whereon, in a great measure depended the safety of his darling electorate; so that if the peculiarity of his disposition be considered, with the particular circumstances which now awakened it, his conduct will appear to be perfectly natural and consistent. However, to the cool, philosophic investigator of this nobleman's case, he must, surely, appear to be overcharged in the severity of his sentence; and that, whether it was a perplexity in himself or in the orders; whether it was through a deficiency of judgment or of knowledge that he was so unfortunate as to offend, the punishment appears, very greatly, to outweigh the offence. The imputation of fear was, at once, both frivolous and false; and the testimony of that evidence who declared he saw the marks of terror in his lordship's countenance, when he delivered the orders of prince Ferdinand to him, was so ill supported and so well confronted, that the charge fell, at once, to the ground, and was considered, by many, as false and malignant.

It was not probable that a man who had never discovered any marks of pusillanimity should be deserted by his spirits and sunk into a poltroon, at a time when so much honour was at stake; and that he possessed more courage than was necessary for his credit at Minden, is evident, from the composed and manly spirit which he since discovered in his duel with governor Johnstone—a spirit which, we believe, he would not have been able to assume, if he was afflicted with that fearful disposition which has been so positively attributed to him. Prince Ferdinand, without doubt, wished to render the service disagreeable to the English general; and though the difference of the orders might be accidental, and by no means framed with a view to betray him, it appears very probable that his highness readily seized the opportunity, which lord George's doubts and hesitations afforded, to effect his removal.

At this distance of time, when all prejudice may be supposed to yield to a calm and unbiassed survey of events so long passed and over, it appears that popular fury was much concerned in the disgrace of this unfortunate officer. His was an unfashionable cause. Not only the nation in general, but the court was against him: so that the principal evidence for the crown was hastily promoted; and the officer whose testimony was most essential to the prisoner, was obliged to sell his commission, and depend for support on the bounty of his noble friend with whom he was sacrificed.

Here then we may make a pause, and ruminate on the caprices of fortune and the uncertain state of worldly grandeur. This nobleman, in a few months, was deprived of all his honours; tried by men, the greater part of whom he had commanded; and adjudged by them to be unworthy of his profession, and to have disgraced the character of a soldier. He was publicly stigmatised as a coward in every part of the globe, banished from the presence of his sovereign, and held in universal detestation by his countrymen and fellow-citizens.

We write with the freedom of history; and the impartial spirit which dictates these sentiments, will not suffer us to pass over a circumstance, though it points out an unfavourable line in his lordship's character. He appeared at this time to possess but few personal friends. Under the oppression of a sentence which was, most certainly, a very severe one, the number of those who dared to hazard opinions in his favour was very small indeed! The court seemed to imbibe the spirit of all ranks of men men when it condemned him, and his sentence was passed, as it were, with the general assent of the nation. Even the pity of the English people, which discovers itself towards the most hardened and atrocious malefactors, did not appear to dart one ray towards this unpopular nobleman.

Among the many political reasons which might be given for this strong tide of displeasure, it may be observed, that the army thought themselves disgraced by their late commander, and the navy raised its head on the occasion, and almost forgot the fate of an unfortunate Admiral. But there was another circumstance which shrunk the number of his lordship's private friends into nothing. —The haughtiness of his temper was intolerable, and had displayed itself in every situation of life. They who had favours to ask were treated with an inattention which aggravated disappointment; and they who received them, lost half their satisfaction by the manner in which they were conferred; while persons of all ranks who had concerns of business with him were witnesses to that haughty demeanour, which tends to make men more unpopular than even crimes themselves. He was, almost universally, censured as a coward; and no one stood forth to vouch for those private virtues, those winning graces, which are ever found to accompany courage; while his proud and haughty disposition found an obvious parent in the cowardice whereof he was accused. Except his own particular connections, and those whom he involved in his disgrace, very few, indeed, have ever been mentioned as bearing him any affection. One officer, since promoted to a considerable rank in the army, who had been greatly favoured by the disgraced commander, remained firmly attached to his friend, and forsook him not in the most frowning hour of misfortune: and his fidelity has not missed of its reward; for the late appointment of the noble lord was accompanied with the order of the Bath to his faithful friend.

But it is time to quit this necessary digression, and return to the situation in which we left his lordship, covered with disgrace, and the object of popular detestation. Thus thrown at a distance from all possibility of employment, he had few hopes to solace him, but such as might arise from the prospect of another reign, when the rage of popular prejudice, amid a variety of new objects, would look at him no more; or mankind, awakened to a candid review of his conduct, would wonder at their past severity, and pronounce him innocent. I shall not, therefore, consider his lordship in this retired interval, but pass over the employments and natural impatience of it to the accession of our present most gracious sovereign.

Indeed, it had long been supposed by the more acute and investigating politicians, that amid the dishonour with which lord George was surrounded, his situation was regarded with a secret but tender concern by the favourite of Leicester-house; and that a ray of princely favour sometimes beamed from thence to illuminate the darkness of his disgrace. These suspicions, however chimerical some had esteemed them, were confirmed by his lordship's return to court soon after the present king ascended the throne. The clouds of obscurity were now dissipated by the royal countenance. The public prints, indeed, were not passive upon the occasion, but their apprehensions were read and were forgotten; while the discerning part of mankind looked forward to what has really happened, and foretold that this nobleman, though dead in his military capacity, would enjoy a state of renovation, arise in another form, and become a civil officer of the first importance.

His lordship having, at length, found a firm footing in the avenue which leads to power, his active spirit was not idle, but continually exerted itself in improving the advantage of his situation. He now began to avail himself of that eloquence and ability he was known to possess, and to figure, in the house of Commons, as an able parliamentary debater. —In this department of politics he tried his utmost strength, and wisely endeavoured to draw the attention of the public, so forcibly, to this new character, that the veil of oblivion might, if possible, be drawn over the other. This was a wise and prudent conduct: the times have been favourable to his design; and it may now be said, we think, to be crowned with success.

The first step he made to civil employment was an appointment to be one of the joint Vice-treasurers of Ireland: this he held but for a short time. However, it was sufficient to try the temper of the people with respect to him; and proved from the manner in which it was received, that the majority of the nation did not think such appointment improper in itself, or inconsistent tent with the dignity of the crown. Such was the idea now entertained of his parliamentary abilities, that the ministry and the opposition alike forgot the disgrace of the soldier, and wished to draw to their party the powerful orator and consummate statesman.

At this period, the remarkable productions of Junius first made their appearance in the public papers; and the conjectures of the curious politicians rested for a long time on lord George Germain as the author of them. The spirit with which these papers were written, the penetration they discovered, the matter they unfolded, the objects to which their severity was directed, and the powerful language in which the whole was clothed, found a very suspected origin in the extensive abilities of this nobleman. But however ill-founded these suspicions appear to have been, as they marked the public opinion of his talents and understanding, they increased his importance, and he became thereby an higher object of ministerial fear and conciliation.

Lord George once more felt himself to be a character of consequence, and by his subsequent conduct he appears to have acted with great caution in winning his way to the important station which he now possesses. Veering, by degrees, from an opposition which he foresaw would be fruitless, he became, at length, the firm and constant supporter of ministerial measures. The troubles of America had for some time been such an heavy and oppressive burthen to the shoulders of government, that, at times, it seemed to stagger beneath them. It was an act, therefore, of the highest prudence to call the abilities of this nobleman to its aid, by appointing him to be Secretary of State for the American department. This measure appears to meet with a very general approbation. The lively sarcasms of the orator, on this promotion, proceed only from the usual petulance of opposition; the writer of paragraphs and the epigrammatist have been less busy than might have been expected on the occasion; while moderate men rejoice that a nobleman distinguished for real discernment, deep investigation, and unremitting diligence, to whom well earned popularity must be peculiarly desirable, is elevated to an employment of such immediate importance to the honour and prosperity of the British empire.

A Cure for Worms. By Dr. Cook.

ASCARIDES, in medicine, is a species of worms, very small, slender and white, with sharp-pointed heads. They are generally lodged in the intestinum rectum, and sometimes higher up, even in the stomach, chiefly of children, and are frequently voided with their feces. They often adhere to the fundament, and are sometimes also pendent therefrom.

The symptoms by which it is known that worms are existing in the body, are the same in general, whatever be the species of them; but an itching in the arms is the almost constant sign of the ascarides being in the rectum. They occasion such uneasiness in some people, as even to make them faint; and generally are so troublesome in the night, as to deprive them of sleep. Sometimes there is so much heat in the intestines, as to cause a sensible tumour about the arms, and little exulcerations on the internal coat of the rectum. But as these small worms are voided in the stools, their presence is most certainly known by ocular demonstration; for there is no one sign but what is wanting in some patients: tho' this sort of worms are as difficult to destroy as any other, they are less dangerous.

These little worms being enveloped in mucus, makes it so difficult a matter to destroy them; the best known remedy is the Harroswgate water, if drank at the spring; or my quicksilver water, made by boiling water on four ounces of pure quicksilver, (called also Mercury) till one quart is wasted. When that is used, make more of the same Mercury the same way, and inject a gill by way of glyster, to be retained, after going to stool: This is my medicine, and method I use, which seldom fails, as all methods do sometimes, in certain persons, under different circumstances.

Flour of brimstone, a tea-spoonful more or less, as agrees with the constitution of the patient, in treacle, so as gently to purge the patient every day, has cured several. The fumes of burning tobacco, injected glyster-ways into the rectum, is of singular efficacy; as also suppositories of cotton dipt in the gall of an ox, may be of service. Decoction of favin, in water, hath been often used with success, when taken for some time; and repeated doses of rhubarb, with six or eight grains of calomel, also promises success.

The

Account of the Proceedings of the American Colonists, since the passing the Boston Port-Bill. (Continued from p. 195.)

WE have received, during the course of the present month, a confirmation of the defeat of the Provincials before Quebec, which, though it differs in no material particulars from that before inserted, we must not omit, as, by comparing this Congressional account with that which we still expect from General Carleton, the real loss on both sides may be pretty nearly estimated, allowing for garbling on both sides.

"Philadelphia, January 25, 1776.

"THE last letters from Canada bring an account of an unsuccessful attempt made to gain possession of Quebec by storm, on the 31st of December last, between the hours of two and seven in the morning.

"The General, finding his cannon too light to effect a breach, and that the enemy would not hearken to terms of capitulation, formed a design of carrying the town by escalade. In this he was encouraged by the extensiveness of the works, and the weakness of the garrison. When every thing was prepared, while he was waiting the opportunity of a snow-storm to carry his design into execution, several men deserted to the enemy. His plan at first was to have attacked the upper and lower town at the same time, depending principally for success against the upper town; but discovering, from the motions of the enemy, that they were apprized of his design, he altered his plan; and, having divided his little army into four detachments, ordered two feints to be made against the upper town, one by Col. Livingston, at the head of the Canadians, against St. John's Gate; the other by Capt. Brown, at the head of a small detachment, against Cape Diamond; reserving to himself and Col. Arnold the two principal attacks against the lower town.

"At five o'clock, the hour appointed for the attack, the General, at the head of the New-York troops, advanced against the lower town at Aunee de Mere. Being obliged to take a circuit, the signal for the attack was given, and the garrison alarmed before he reached the place; however, pressing on, he passed the first barrier, and was just opening to attempt the second, when by the first fire from the enemy he was unfortunately killed, together with his Aid-de-Camp, Capt. John M'Pherson, Capt. Cheeseman, and two or three more. This so dispirited the men, that Col. Campbell, on whom the command devolved, found himself under the disagreeable necessity of drawing them off.

"In the mean while, Col. Arnold, at the head of about 350 of those brave troops who with unparalleled fatigue had penetrated Canada under his command, and Capt. Lamb's company of artillery, had passed through St. Roques, and approached near a two-gun battery, without being discovered. This he attacked, and, though it was well defended for about an hour, carried it with the loss of a number of men. In this attack Col. Arnold had the misfortune to have his leg splintered by a shot, and was obliged to be carried to the hospital. After gaining the battery, his detachment passed on to a second barrier, which they took possession of. By this time the enemy, relieved from the other attacks, by our troops being drawn off, directed their whole force against this detachment, and a party sallying out from Palace-Gate attacked them in the rear.

"These brave men sustained the force of the whole garrison for three hours; but, finding themselves hemmed in, and no hopes of relief, they were obliged to yield to numbers, and the advantageous situation the garrison had over them.

"No regular return is yet come to hand, but, by the advices received, we learn, that our loss in killed and wounded amounts to about 60, and 300 taken prisoners, who are treated very humanely.

"Among the slain are Capt. Kendricks, and Lieut. Humphries, of the rifle-men, and Lieut. Cooper.

"After this unfortunate repulse, the remainder of the army retired about three miles from the city, where they have posted themselves advantageously, and are continuing the blockade, waiting for reinforcements, which are now on their march to join them.

"Every possible mark of distinction was shewn to the corpse of Gen. Montgomery, who was interred in Quebec on the 2d of January.

No other material advices from America have since our last been suffered to transpire. It is not to be supposed, however, that the Americans have continued inactive. Convinced that they have now nothing to trust to but implicit submission, or effectual resistance, they have, doubtless, before this time, determined which to adopt; but in a crisis so delicate, and so important, we will not hazard a conjecture which of the two they have made their choice. If resistance, the contest will be bloody; if submission, the contest is at an end; and, by the present temper of administration, there are no real grievances of which the Colonies have just reason to complain, but what government are ready to redress. The authority of the following paper will justify this opinion. It was communicated to the General Congress in the name, though it has since been affirmed without the knowledge, of Lord North, and by that Congress believed to be written by Mr. Grey Cooper, Under-Secretary to the treasury. The paper is as follows:

"That it is earnestly hoped by all the real friends of the Americans, that the terms expressed in the resolution of the 20th of February [1775] will be accepted by all the colonies who have the least affection for their king and country, or a just sense of their own interests.

"That,

"That these terms are honourable for Great-Britain, and safe for the colonies.

"That, if the Colonies are not blinded by faction, these terms will remove every grievance relative to taxation, and be the basis of a Compact between the Colonies and the Mother-Country.

"That the people in America ought, on every consideration, to be satisfied with them.

"That no farther relaxation can be admitted.

"The temper and spirit of the nation are so much against concessions, that, if it were the intention of administration, they could not carry the question.

"But administration have no such intention, as they are fully and firmly persuaded that further concessions would be injurious to the Colonies as well as to Great-Britain.

"That there is not the least probability of a change of administration.

"That they are perfectly united in opinion, and determined to pursue the most effectual measures, and to use the whole force of the kingdom, if it be found necessary, to reduce the rebellious and refractory Provinces and Colonies.

"There is so great a spirit in the nation against the Congress, that the people will bear the temporary distresses of a stoppage of the American trade.

"They may depend on this to be true."

We have already given an account of the skirmish which happened between a party of the King's troops near Norfolk in Virginia, since which the following intelligence has been received, which we have here copied verbatim:

Lord Dunmore has set fire to the towns of Norfolk and Portsmouth, in Virginia. The reason of his Lordship destroying those places was, the annoyance they gave to the ships of war; a few bombs were thrown into each place, and the friends of the Provincials set fire to every house, the owner of which was supposed to be well-affected to Government. Upwards of 300 houses were burnt down in the fine town of Norfolk.

In the Journal of the Proceedings of the Congress at Philadelphia, we find the following resolution:

In Congress, July 19, 1775.

"Whereas the Government of Great-Britain have prohibited the exportation of arms and ammunition to any of the Plantations, and endeavour to prevent any other nations from supplying us:

"Resolved, That for the better supplying the Colonies with the necessary means of defending their rights, every vessel importing gun-powder, salt-petre, sulphur, (provided they bring with the sulphur four times as much salt petre,) brass field-pieces, or good muskets fitted with bayonets, within nine months from the date of this resolution, shall be permitted to load and export the produce of these Colonies to the value of such powder and stores aforesaid, the non-exportation agreement notwithstanding: And it is recommended to the Committees of the several Provinces to inspect the military stores so imported, and to estimate a generous price for the same, according to their goodness, and permit the importer of such powder and other military stores aforesaid to export the value thereof, and no more, in produce of any kind.

Philadelphia, Jan. 13.

This day the Continental Congress came to the following resolution:—"Whereas it appears to this Congress, that several evil-disposed persons, in order to obstruct and defeat the efforts of the United Colonies in the defence of their just rights, have attempted to depreciate the bills of credit emitted by the authority of this Congress:

"Resolved, therefore, That if any person shall hereafter be so lost to all virtue, and regard for his country, as to refuse to receive the said bills in payment, or obstruct or discourage the currency and circulation thereof, and shall be duly convicted by the Committee of the city, county, or district, or, in case of an appeal from their decision, by the Assembly, Convention, Council, or Committee of Safety, of the colony where he shall reside, such person shall be deemed, published, and treated, as an enemy to his country, and precluded from all trade or intercourse with the inhabitants of these Colonies.

CHARLES THOMPSON, Sec."

Proclamations from St. James's have already been published at the island of Barbadoes, forbidding the inhabitants of that island from having any correspondence with the United Colonies, on pain of being deemed rebels and traitors.

Similar proclamations have also been published in all the British islands of the West-Indies.

Some persons have been tarred and feathered for being zealous over-much in the cause of Government, which are all the advices of consequence which have this month been publicly circulated.

The History of the present session of the Irish Parliament. (Continued from p. 198.)

Monday, Feb. 19.

THE house resolved into a committee, Mr. Fitzgerald in the chair, on heads of a Bill to amend an act passed last session to regulate the Baking trade of the city of Dublin, and the liberties adjoining. Mr. Fitzgerald reported the same, and Mr. Redmond Morris was ordered to wait on his Excellency therewith.

A bill for amending the road from Kilcullen to Timolin, being come back from England, was read the first time; as were also

A bill to amend the road from Athy to Old Leighlin,

A bill to repeal the act for the repair of churches.

And a bill for electing members for such vacancies vacancies as may happen during a recess of parliament, by members being called up to the house of lords.

The house went into a committee, (Mr. Meade Ogle in the chair,) on the heads of the quarterage bill. This was opposed by Colonel Browne, as tending to distress the poor papists, and by Mr. Mason, who moved that Mr. Ogle should leave the chair. Mr. Redmond Morris, the Provost, Mr. Fortescue, and Mr. Bourke, jun. thought the bill very proper; but Mr. James Browne, Sir Lucius O'Brien, and Mr. Barry Barry were of opinion it would be oppressive on the poor manufacturers. After a very short conversation on this subject, the question was put and carried that the chairman should leave the chair, by a majority of seven. Ayes, 33; Noes, 26.

Mr. Damer reported the heads of a bill for amending and continuing several temporary statutes. In a clause relative to taking game, the committee had made an amendment to make the time of ending its commencement on the first of January, instead of the first of February. The question was put on agreeing with the committee. Ayes, 33; Noes, 39.

Mr. Barry Barry mentioned the discontents that had arisen from the embargo, that he had heard there was an order received to take it off as far as related to corn, and hoped to have information on that head.

Sir John Blaquiere said such orders were arrived, and a proclamation would issue to-morrow.

Mr. Gardiner observed, that although he was glad the corn trade of this country was relieved, yet he was anxious some remedy should be provided for the injury done to the constitution by the proclamation.

Mr. Barry Barry said, the taking off the embargo by one illegal proclamation, which had been laid on by another, was no favour, but rather tended to establish a right to exercise that unconstitutional authority.

Mr. George Ogle urged, the wound the constitution would receive, if a proper notice was not taken of the proclamation, and its illegality declared, of which he was so satisfied, that since no merchant had had the spirit to oppose it, he would contest it. He pledged himself to his country and to the house, that he would to-morrow turn merchant. He would ship a cargo of beef for France, and if it was stopped would bring his action, and leave it to a jury to determine how far a proclamation would act against law.

Sir William Osborne said the embargo did not affect the corn, which was not to be construed an article of provisions. He moved that an address be presented to his excellency, that he would order the king's letters, with the two proclamations issued in consequence thereof, to be laid before the house. This was agreed to nem. con.

Tuesday, Feb. 20.] The four bills returned from England, were read a second time.

The house in a committee, (Mr. Johnson in the chair,) went through heads of a bill to amend the act to prevent erecting of lime kilns in the city and liberties of Dublin.

Wednesday, Feb. 21.] The four bills returned from England, were committed, and ordered to be engrossed.

The heads of the lime-kiln bill were reported, and sent to the lord lieutenant, by Mr. Barry Barry.

Committed the heads of a bill to prevent the stealing of trees, shrubs, and flowers, (Mr. Robert Fitzgerald in the chair,) and made some progress therein.

Thursday, Feb. 22.] The four bills were read a third time, and passed the lords.

The house in a committee, (Mr. Fitzgerald in the chair,) made a further progress in the heads of a bill for the preservation of shrubs and flowers.

Mr. Hussey Burgh moved that the two proclamations relative to the embargo, with the act passed last sessions, giving a bounty on the exportation of corn should be read, which being read, he spoke to the following purport.

He observed, that a more important constitutional question had scarce ever come before the house, yet expressed his fears that it would not receive so solemn a determination as it deserved. The proclamation of Feb. 3, had laid an embargo on provisions, amongst which corn was construed to be included; a second proclamation on Feb. 10, had taken off the embargo on grain, which some gentlemen might think was putting an end to a mischief; but the proclamation contained two mischiefs; one against the property, and another against the liberty of the subject; and however the former might be done away, still the latter remained. When the first proclamation issued, it was in opposition to three positive corn acts, giving bounty on the exportation of corn; that of the 19 George II. that of the 6th George III. and that of the last sessions. We had a most plentiful harvest last summer, and just when that act, which from the cheapness of the corn was the farmers only protection from ruin, began to operate in their favour, and when necessary for our salvation as a people, it was repealed by a proclamation; So that the bounty of the Almighty was perverted into a curse by the poison of prerogative. Some had said that corn was not included in the meaning of the word provisions; but the British administration could not so mistake, for the interior cabinet had been long enough out of Scotland to learn that bread was provision. The second proclamation did not remedy the evil of the first, for it still asserted the claim, and by the terms allow the exportation, it implied a right to forbid. Thus this claim of the crown would have force, and if no counter-claim is made by the people, the point is given up. He remarked, that this was a claim of dispensing power, which kind of claim had struck the crown off one king, and the head off from another. If prerogative can suspend an act of parliament, it can consequently repeal, not only one but all which are favourable to liberty, even Magna Charta itself, and the Bill of Rights, in which the power of suspending acts of parliament was declared and enacted to be illegal. It was against against such a dispensing power Hampden struggled, and Ruffel bled. He then moved to resolve, "that every attempt to suspend the law, under colour of the prerogative of the crown, is ILLEGAL."

Mr. Gardiner seconded the motion.

Colonel Blowne. When it was first moved to have a committee to enquire into this embargo, I alone opposed it. I thought, Sir, that this was not the time to enquire into its legality or illegality, when Great Britain is put to so great an expence to bring her rebellious subjects in America to reason; I am now, Sir, the more convinced in that opinion, as the most exceptionable part of the embargo is explained away by a subsequent proclamation, I mean with regard to corn, that being removed, the embargo stands upon the same footing with all the other embargoes that have been laid on here since the revolution, with this additional circumstance, that it is more necessary now, than I ever remember it to be; besides the troops already sailed for America, there are at least 24,000 men more to embark for that country; the transports are all to be victualled at Corke, the fleet must likewise be victualled there, and provisions must also be bought there to victual the whole army and navy during the campaign in America. Sir, the very demand of provisions for this armament, is, in my opinion, more than sufficient for all the provisions now for sale in Ireland, and it is but reasonable that Great Britain should have the pre-emption of them; but, say gentlemen, this embargo will lower the price; I say no, if notwithstanding the embargo, there is an ample demand, the merchant will take care to have the full price of his goods, when he knows the buyer cannot supply himself at all events; so that, in my opinion, Ireland has not the least cause to complain of this embargo, unless we are piqued that we cannot supply the American rebels. Sir, the grievance with regard to corn is removed; but, say gentlemen, our corn-law has been infringed, and we must take notice of it. Sir, I beg of gentlemen to recollect that this great law is at present but a temporary one, and let us not by an injudicious zeal, prevent, perhaps, our obtaining a law to make it perpetual. Let us not in a passion, for a sixteen days embargo on corn by mistake, occasion a perpetual embargo to be laid on us upon that article in a very few years. A young plant has lately shewn its head in the British councils, which I recommend to this house to cherish, I mean an inclination there to encourage the trade and commerce of Ireland; let us not nip this plant in the bud by ill-timed rash resolves, and I doubt not it will soon become a fine tree, whose fruits will enrich and strengthen both Ireland and Great Britain. Sir, I am particularly against the motion now proposed, because it implies an unjust censure on the crown. I shall therefore move this amendment by prefixing the following words thereto; "Resolved, that it is now necessary to declare," if this amendment shall be adopted by the house, I mean then to give my negative to the resolution thus amended."

Mr. French agreed, that it was not only necessary now, but never was more necessary than now to declare the sense of the motion; that the embargo was not only illegal, but partial, as it was laid only on one kingdom, and not on the other, and thought it was only intended to gratify some avaricious contractors.

Mr. Holmes was of opinion the word Provisions in the first proclamation, meant only salted provisions, as warlike stores.

Mr. Mason urged a precedent for this measure, from an address to the lords justices, to pray they would issue such an embargo, and that when the king assented to the corn bounty laws, he did not intend thereby to abridge his prerogative of hindering corn from being sent to his enemies.

Mr. George Ogle said he should not say much there on the subject, he should bring it before a court of law where justice not numbers presided. He indeed remarked that the friends of this measure urged necessity; but that was a poor plea; the highwayman robs you through Necessity, and if you resist him shoots you through the head from Necessity;—a man runs away with a pretty girl, through Necessity; and if she refuses to comply, he is under a Necessity of ravishing her; but if even necessity is an allowable plea, pray what drove administration to that necessity? the precedent urged (by Mr. Mason) in the year 1698 was a contrary precedent, for it proves no embargo was laid, but in cause given of an address of the house.

Mr. Mason desired the journals of the house might be read for the above precedent, which was done.

Mr. Barry Barry quoted the embargo laid in England in the 7th of George III. when the house addressed the king to continue it, and yet two days after brought in a bill to indemnify those who acted in consequence of the first embargo. He observed also that this amendment proposed, was only to give colour to a negative; which gentlemen would be ashamed to give to the proposition.

Sir John Blaquiére thought it was not now necessary to declare a self-evident axiom; adding it was very improper to ground an opposition on the very corn act, which was a favour. But this was authorized by legal prerogative which has power to annoy an enemy, and America being in rebellion was a sufficient warrant for this embargo; for a vessel from Corke went over to the rebels with a cargo of provisions, and no embargo was laid on Great Britain, as it did not furnish the provisions necessary.

Mr. Gardiner corroborated the opinions of Mr. Burgh, saying though proclamations were a repeal of law, and it was not enough for administration to suffocate the laws in their birth, but they now sought to strangle them when brought forth.

Mr. Langrishe allowed the proposition to be just, but argued it was not necessary now to make such a declaration. He urged several points of prerogative, which though they had been regulated by law had no original foundation tion in either the common or the statute law, such as impressing seamen, and issuing proclamations for obliging ships to perform quarantine, both which were authorised by necessity.

Mr. Prime serjeant produced other instances of the king's prerogative in time of war, such as issuing a proclamation to call home subjects from foreign parts, and forfeiting their effects if they refuse obedience; and obliging suspected persons to give security they will not leave the kingdom without a royal licence.

Mr. Dillon thought the embargo not warranted by necessity, for no Irish merchants would risk the loss of a cargo of provisions by sending it to America.

Mr. Carleton enlarged on the prerogative of the crown.

Mr. Bushe said no thanks were due to administration for taking off an unconstitutional embargo from commercial, not constitutional motives; and maintained that rebellion was not war.

Mr. Serjeant Coppinger declared he thought the crown justified by necessity, which position was denied by Mr. Gorges Lowther.

Mr. Vice-treasurer was of opinion that it would be very indiscreet to enter into any resolution founded on the corn bounty, at a time we were in hopes of having a bill to perpetuate that bounty returned from England; and if it was agreed to, this resolution would not be a stronger declaration than that contained in the bill of rights.

Sir William Osborne said he looked upon the last proclamation as an absolute renunciation of any claim to dispensing power, which he should ever hold as illegal: he paid a compliment to the ministry of Ireland for having procured the embargo to be taken off by its timely representation of the doubt on the word Corn; nay it had been more friendly to freedom, for in order of council for the issuing this last proclamation, the words were should and might, which the administration here had wisely made more strong by changing them to shall and may.

This produced an altercation between sir William Osborne and Mr. Vice treasurer.

Mr. Flood insisted on the prerogative of the crown to issue proclamations in time of war, quoted many precedents, and said, that if a power is given to the crown by law, by law only that power could be taken away; but that admitting what many gentlemen had urged, yet necessity would often justify what it could not legalize.

Mr. Grattan answered Mr. Flood, and said, that Necessity was the tyrant's plea.—He made many just observations on what was urged by administration, and quoted many cases of proclamations and embargoes, which plainly proved the illegality of the present one.

Mr. Hufsey Burgh followed Mr. Grattan, and took a retrospective view of what had been given as argument since he first spoke in the debate.—He entered particularly into the legality of the proclamation, and answered fully every argument made in favour of it.—He then observed that an embargo must be pro Bono Publico, and equally laid in his majesty's dominions, or it would not be just; that in the present case war was not the cause—otherwise the embargo would exist in England as well as Ireland, provisions being as liable to be sent to America from thence as from here; but that he clearly saw, by the partiality of this proclamation, it was only a job of the minister to serve the English contractors.—He added, that the precedents which were quoted, instead of strengthening the arguments made by the minister and his friends, only weakened them, and that if he could have entertained a doubt, they would have removed them.—He mentioned, that all those sophistical arguments of gentlemen in administration were extracts and copies from a book wrote by sir John Davis, merely to flatter king James the first into an opinion that he should be absolute.

Mr. Langrishe and the prime serjeant spoke in reply; they were very concise, and were followed by

Mr. Yelverton, who entered pretty extensively in the debate as to the legality of the act, and concluded with a firm opinion from what had been said, and from his own observation that the embargo was an overbearing, arbitrary, illegal and partial act in his majesty's council, and quite repugnant to the principles of the constitution.

The question was then put on the amendment, and lost by a majority of 23, the ayes being 66, the noes 89, besides tellers. Mr. Gardiner and Mr. Hufsey Burgh, for the ayes.—Mr. Mason and Mr. Carleton for the noes; after which it being 33 minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned until next day.

Friday, Feb. 23.] A bill to confirm and establish an agreement made between John Wolfe, Esq; and Walter Burgh, Esq; for the preventing any suits concerning the last will of Richard Burgh, Esq; deceased, being returned from England, was read a first and second time.—Committed, reported and ordered to be engrossed.

Heads of a bill (presented yesterday by Mr. solicitor general) to establish an agreement between the archbishop of Armagh, sir Arthur Brooke, bart. and others, with the legatees of the late G. Vaughan, Esq; of the county of Donnegal, touching his will, were committed (Mr. Helen in the chair,) reported, and sent to the lord lieutenant.

A committee of the whole house, (Mr. Robert Fitzgerald in the chair,) finished heads of a bill to punish the destroying or stealing trees, plants, shrubs, &c.—To be reported to-morrow.

Saturday, Feb. 24.] Read a third time and passed to the lords the bill to confirm the agreement of John Wolfe and Walter Burgh, Esqrs.

Mr. Chapman presented heads of a bill for securing the liberty of the subject, which were forthwith forthwith gone through in a committee, reported and sent to the Lord Lieutenant.

Reported and sent to the Lord Lieutenant, the heads of a bill to prevent stealing trees, &c. adjourned till Monday f'e'n'night.

Monday, March 4.] A bill for explaining an act, intituled, an act for granting to his majesty an additional duty on the several commodities, goods and merchandizes therein mentioned, and for prohibiting the importation of all gold and silver lace, and of all cambricks and lawns, except of the manufacture of Great Britain, being returned from England, was read a first time, and ordered to receive a second reading to-morrow.

The purport of this bill is to declare that the preamble of the act thereby explained, shall not be construed to affect the addresses of both houses of parliament, for sparing out of this kingdom four thousand effective men.

Mr. Redmond Morris moved for a committee to examine into and report the state and fund of Dean Swift's hospital for idiots and lunatics.

Tuesday, March 5.] Read a second time, committed, and reported, and ordered to be engrossed the bill to explain the preamble of the act for granting additional duties.

Wednesday, March 6.] The bill to explain the preamble in the late act for additional duties, was read a third time, passed, and sent to the lords.

Thursday, March 7.] His Excellency sent for the house to attend him forthwith in the house of lords—It went, and being returned, the Speaker reported that his Excellency had given the royal assent to the six following bills, viz.

PUBLIC ACTS.

1. An act for explaining an act, intituled, an act for granting to his majesty an additional duty on the several commodities, goods, and merchandizes therein mentioned, and for the prohibiting the importation of all gold and silver lace, and of all cambricks and lawns, except of the manufacture of Great Britain.

2. An act to explain and amend an act, made in the eleventh year of the reign of his present majesty, intituled, an act to enable the Speaker of the house of commons to issue his warrants to make out new writs for the choice of members to serve in parliament in the room of such members as shall die during the recess of parliament; and for enabling the Speaker of the house of commons to make out new writs for the choice of members to serve in parliament, in the room of such members as shall, during the recess of parliament, become peers of Ireland, and be summoned to parliament.

3. An act for altering, amending, and making more effectual an act, intituled, an act for repairing the road leading from the Green of Kilcullen, in the county of Kildare, to the town of Athy, in the same county, and from thence through the town of Stradbally to the town of Timohoe in the Queen's County.

4. An act for repealing an act made in the thirteenth and fourteenth years of the reign of his present majesty, intituled, an act to explain and amend an act made in the third year of his late majesty King George the Second, intituled an act for the better keeping churches in repair, and for other purposes.

5. An act for altering and amending an act passed in the twenty-fifth year of the reign of his late majesty King George the Second, intituled an act for making and repairing the road leading from the town of Athy, in the county of Kildare, through part of the Queen's County, and through the town of Castlecorner, in the county of Kilkenny, to the town of Old Leighlin, in the county of Carlow, and from thence to and through the town of Leighlin-bridge, in the said county of Carlow.

PRIVATE ACT.

1. An act for confirming and establishing an agreement made between John Wolfe and Walter Burgh, Esqrs. concerning the real estate whereof Richard Burgh, formerly of Drumkeen, in the county of Limerick, and late of the city of Dublin, Esq; died seized, and for preventing all suits concerning the construction of the last will and testament of the said Richard Burgh, and other purposes.

No other bills being returned, the house adjourned till Monday next.

Monday, March 18.] The bill for the improvement of his majesty's revenue, and for the better preventing frauds in the collecting thereof, being come back from England, was read the first time. As was also, the glebe land bill.

The bill to regulate the election of members to serve in parliament.

When this last bill was read, Mr. Robert French paid some compliments to administration on its being returned from England, as four several bills of the same tenor had been lost on the other side of the water. Yet there were some gentlemen who were dissatisfied with that part of the bill which deprived many inhabitants of boroughs of voting, unless they had a certain rent charge, or a certain time of residence. For Colonel Rois moved for leave to bring in "Heads of a bill to regulate the election of members to serve in parliament, for a borough where the right of election was in the Protestant inhabitants, or the inhabitants and freeholders," and when leave was given, he was about to present the heads of a bill directly, but on the opposition he saw rising to such a sudden proceeding, he postponed it till to-morrow.

Tuesday, March 19.] The revenue, glebe land, and election bills, were read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

Colonel Rois presented heads of a bill for preserving the freedom of elections of members to serve in borough, where the right of election is in the Protestant inhabitants in general, or in the freeholders and inhabitants; which were read and committed for to-morrow.

Wednesday, March 20.] The house went into into a committee on the bill for the exchange of glebe-lands, Mr. Damer in the chair; and into a committee on the bill for the improvement of his majesty's revenue, Mr. Hellen in the chair; also into a committee on the bill to regulate elections of members of parliament, Mr. Robert French in the chair, which were reported and ordered to be engrossed.

The house went into a committee, Mr. Skeffington in the chair, on heads of a bill to regulate the elections of members to serve in parliament for boroughs, where the election was in the Protestant inhabitants at large, or in the freeholders and inhabitants, and went through the same without any debate. Mr. Skeffington reported, and colonel Ro's was ordered to carry the same to the Lord Lieutenant.

Ordered, on the motion of Sir Lucius O'Brien, that the house will next Friday morning resolve itself into a committee to take into consideration the state of the fisheries of this kingdom.

Thursday, March 21.] Read a third time the engrossed, revenue, election, and glebe-land bills, passed and sent them to the lords.

Ordered, that the order for going into a committee on the fisheries be postponed till Monday next, and then the house adjourned to that day.

Monday, March 25.] The following fourteen bills, being returned from England, were read a first time, viz.

A bill to prevent and punish tumultuous risings of persons within this kingdom, and for other purposes.

A bill for making perpetual an act, intituled an act for the further preventing delays of justice by reason of privilege of parliament.

A bill for reviving, amending, and continuing several temporary statutes, and other purposes therein mentioned.

A bill for the improvement of the fisheries of this kingdom.

A bill to explain and amend an act, intituled an act for paving the streets, lanes, quays, bridges, squares, courts, and alleys, within the city and county of the city of Dublin, and extending the same to the baronies of St. Sepulchre and Donore.

A bill for repairing the road from the city of Dublin to the town of Navan, in the county of Meath, and from the town of Navan to the town of Nobber, as also from Navan to the town of Kells.

A bill to explain and amend the act for making a new road on the South, West, and North sides of Dublin, to commence at the road leading to Donnybrook, and to terminate in Cavendish-street.

A bill to amend the act for regulating the Foundling Hospital and Workhouse in the city of Dublin.

A bill to amend the act of last session for the better regulating the baking trade in the city of Dublin.

A bill to continue and amend the act for repairing the road from Timohoe in the Queen's County, through Ballinakill, Durrow, Beggar's-Inn, and the city of Cashell, to the town of Tipperary.

A bill for the better supplying the city of Dublin with pipe-water.

A bill for licensing hawkers and pedlars, and for encouraging of English Protestant schools.

A bill for the more effectually preventing the plundering of ships and vessels which may be wrecked or stranded on the coasts of this kingdom; And

A bill for the relief of the out-pensioners of the Hospital of King Charles the Second for ancient and maimed officers and soldiers of the army of Ireland.

These bills being read, the house went into a committee on the state of the fisheries, which was obliged to be postponed by the coming of the Lord Lieutenant to the house of peers, where, the commons being ordered to attend, he gave the royal assent to

The act for the improvement of his majesty's revenue, and the more effectual preventing frauds therein; and for continuing and amending several laws heretofore made, and now in force, relative to his majesty's said revenue.

The act to regulate the elections of members to serve in parliament.

The act to explain and amend the several statutes now in force in this kingdom, relative to the exchange of glebe lands; and the endowment of churches with new glebes; and to remove some doubts relative to the said statutes, and for other purposes.

Adjourned till to-morrow.

Tuesday, March 26.] Read a second time and committed for to-morrow the fourteen bills mentioned above, which had a first reading yesterday.

The house resolved into a committee (Mr. Bourke, jun. in the chair) to take into consideration the state of the fisheries of this kingdom.

Sir Lucius O'Brien gave a detail of the discouragements laid on this nation in regard to the Newfoundland, whale and herring fisheries, which amounted wholly to a prohibition from fish, train oil, blubber, whale-bone and seal skins, paying the duty of aliens, if carried to an English market by Irish vessels, and from their being hindered from sending any Irish produce or commodity, except victuals, to Newfoundland: and he mentioned with great satisfaction, that the British parliament had last session put the Irish equally on the same footing with the English subject in every respect as to liberty of catching, curing and trading with the above fish by taking off all duties on them or their produce; by being equally allowed to send provisions, cordage, nets, lines, clothes, &c. &c. to Newfoundland and the other fisheries, and by enjoying the same bounties and encouragements on the whale fishery. This he thought would become a source of future wealth wealth for this kingdom. But one event had happened which, if improved at this juncture, would be of the greatest utility, which was this. The fish falling short in the Northern seas some merchants of Nantucket, in America, in the year 1773, fitted out three ships to discover if the fisheries could not be carried on to the Southward of the North limits of the fisheries, which had such success, that in 1774 they fitted out thirty ships, and in 1775 no less than one hundred and forty ships, all with equal success. But the troubles in America and the restraining acts had put an end to this profitable branch of trade, and the people engaged therein would carry their services to the Dutch or French, if not allowed to Ireland by proper encouragement, in order to which, as it was too late in the session to make an act for the purpose, he moved the committee to resolve,

That the whale fishery was deserving of the encouragement of parliament.

That the properest encouragement would be to grant bounties for that fishery on the South of the former limits.

That the bounties should be the same as those granted by the British parliament for the whale fishery in the Northern seas.

That forty shillings a ton be paid to the masters of all vessels employed in the above fisheries, from the 1st of August, 1776, to the 1st of August, 1779, certain. And

That an address be presented that his majesty would order the said bounty to be paid as above, and that this house would make good the same.

These several resolutions were unanimously agreed to by the committee; and are to be reported to-morrow.

Wednesday, March 27.] Committed the fourteen bills which had been twice read, and ordered them to be engrossed.

Sir Lucius O'Brien reported the resolutions entered into yesterday (as above mentioned) relative to the encouragement proper to be given to the whale fishery. The house agreed to them without any opposition, and ordered an address to his Excellency in pursuance thereof.

Thursday, March 28.] The fourteen bills ordered yesterday to be engrossed were read the third time, passed, and sent up to the lords.

Adjourned till Saturday next.

Saturday, March 30.] Read a first and second time, and ordered to be committed, two engrossed bills sent down from the lords, viz.

A bill to vest the estates of the late Richard earl of Anglesea in trustees for payment of debts, and other purposes.

A bill to amend and continue certain temporary statutes, to prevent trawling for fish in the bay of Dublin, and to amend the act for establishing county infirmaries.

Monday, April 1.] The bill to confirm the agreement between the trustees of the late George Vaughan, Esq; being returned from England, was read a first and second April, 1776.

time, and ordered to be committed; as were also the four following bills,

The lime-kiln bill.

The bill to prevent frauds by tenants.

The bill relative to the poor of Lime-rick. And,

The bill to preserve fruit-trees and shrubs.

Tuesday, April 2.] Committed and ordered to be engrossed the above five bills, and the two from the lords.

Mr. Ogle enquired the cause of the miscarriage of the militia bill, of Sir John Blaquiere, who replied he was not informed of the cause.

Mr. Bushe moved for an address to his majesty.

Mr. Yelverton seconded the motion.

Sir John Blaquiere said it was impossible to consider the whole of that very long address immediately, and moved the consideration should be proposed this day se'ennight. This was opposed by Mr. Grattan, Mr. Yelverton and Mr. Bushe; but was carried without a division.

Mr. Robert French enumerated the good acts which had passed in the Vice-Royalty of Lord Harcourt, and moved for an address of thanks to his Excellency for his prudent, just, and wise administration. He was seconded by Mr. Talbot.

Mr. Yelverton moved to postpone that address for a week also, but it was carried against him, and a committee ordered to prepare the said address.

Wednesday, April 3.] The five bills committed yesterday being engrossed, were read a third time, passed, and sent up to the Lords.

The report of the committee on St. Patrick's Hospital for lunatics, was read, on the motion of Mr. Morres, but it was thought the session was too near its end, to take it into consideration.

Sir Lucius O'Brien (instead of Mr. Robert French, who was absent on account of the death of his son on Tuesday night) presented the address of thanks to his excellency. Sir Lucius said he thought the house was bound in gratitude to acknowledge the exertion of lord Harcourt in favour of this country, to the procuring many excellent laws by which the constitution is strengthened, trade and manufactures encouraged, and commerce extended, and thrown into new channels. He very circumstantially mentioned each of these acts, enlarged on their several utility, and concluded nothing could be more just than to give praise where praise was due.

The address was then read, and Mr. Bushe opposed it as too circumstantial, although he honoured the private character of lord Harcourt, and would willingly agree to return the usual thanks in the usual general terms.

Mr. Yelverton and Mr. Barry also opposed the address; they recapitulated the acts which were particularly applauded, and contrasted them with other measures which had been the subject of opposition in this and the last session.

Mr. Grattan went on the same ground; he depreciated the value of these pretended favours, and dwelt on the injuries which had been received; all of which were particularized in a paragraph of very considerable length, which he moved as an amendment to the address in these words.

‘At the same time that we pay your excellency every personal respect, and make you the same acknowledgments which we have not refused to any of your predecessors, we do not mean that it should be understood, that the situation of this country is less deplorable now, than it was upon your excellency’s arrival; a period in which her situation was admitted to be desperate. On the contrary, we must lament that every proposal, which the wishes or abilities of your administration suggested, supported by the most perfect conformity of parliament, in the course of four years has had no other effect than to leave this country more exhausted than ever, more incumbered with taxes, more loaded with debt, and more oppressed with unnecessary establishments. That in the first sessions of your excellency’s government, we were induced to grant new taxes in time of profound peace, under a persuasion, that the promised frugality of administration would justify the unusual bounty of parliament, and put an end to the pernicious practice of running in debt. That in the same session we set the example of economy to your excellency’s administration, by abridging our own expences; and we provided for the payment of a great arrear, including a fifth half year, a liberality without precedent, but which we adopted to take away all pretence of presenting us with a future arrear. That the failure of those projects of finance, proposed under your excellency’s administration, as it was a testimony of the poverty of the kingdom, so was it an additional reason for administration to preserve inviolate their solemn engagements of economy. That we cannot but lament, notwithstanding the liberal confidence of parliament, the solemn professions of administration, and the authenticated poverty of the kingdom; our sagacity cannot discover any visible retrenchment. On the contrary, we have been in the course of this session surprized with a new arrear, not less in proportion than that incurred in the two last years of the administration of your predecessor. We behold the old burthenome establishments, which we know to be unnecessary, and feel to be insupportable, continued and increased; and we see the old spirit of profusion, which has long wasted us in time of peace, opposing every project of retrenchment, whether conceived in the shape of parliamentary resolution, or humble address to the throne, with fatal success under your excellency’s administration, which has been candid enough to acknowledge public distresses, but not fortunate enough to relieve them. When we state these facts, we do not mean to attribute them to your excellency’s intentions, nor do we attribute to those intentions the alarming and military powers given to the lowest officers in the revenue; as little do we attribute to those intentions, the flagrant violations of our constitution in the course of the last four years. We are convinced the alteration of four money bills, that breach of constitution, and insult on the dignity and bounty of this nation; the questioning validity of the augmentation compact by subtleties as dangerous as unintelligible; the involving this country in a civil and unnatural war, the leaving her exposed to any invasion by sending away her necessary and stipulated defence in prosecution of that civil war, the attack made on her law, and the interruption of her trade in the course of that civil war, the refusal of a militia bill, always eligible, now rendered necessary for our security, and so qualified, as not to alarm the arbitrary spirit of the times, were measures adopted not in pursuance of your councils, but in total disregard of them. And we are the more ready to acquit your excellency’s intentions of all those measures, because if they did insult this country, they did not less insult and violate the dignity of its chief governor. And when your excellency shall return to the royal presence, and lay before our sovereign the unhappy state of this kingdom, you will please to represent us as a nation unable to exist for ten years under such a system of management as has unfortunately been pursued during your excellency’s administration; as a people not insensible to an earnest of a favourable disposition shewn to us in some late acts respecting our trade, considering that in process of time they may become a national benefit; but you will please to inform his majesty that our condition is misunderstood, if it is thought that such acts do atone for the total want of economy hitherto, or can support us under future profusion. We entertain no doubt, your excellency will make such representation, conceiving the facts to be melancholy truths, and the representation of them incumbent upon you as an indispensable duty, because the measures which have perplexed our revenues, increased our debt, and insulted our country, though we must suppose not agreeable to your sentiments, have all taken place under your administration.’

Mr. Provost replied to the above gentlemen, saying, to this administration was owing the encrease of public and private credit; that the favours obtained from Britain in respect to trade were not so much to be esteemed for their immediate utility, as that they showed Ireland began to be beheld by Great Britain in a different light than heretofore; that they were but dawns, but they were the dawns of day, which shewed the night was past.

Mr. Yelverton, Mr. Barry and Mr. Grattan, maintained their former opinions, and went into long digressions respecting America and lord Townshend, in which they were followed by Mr. Provost and Colonel Brown, who said lord Townshend constantly supported the interests of Ireland in the British parliament. This point also was asserted by Sir Lucius O’Brien from his own knowledge.

Sir John Blaquiére defended administration, and opposed the amendment by long arithmetical sums; and Sir Edward Newenham said something about the defenceless state of this kingdom, from the few troops left in it, and the denial of a militia, but could be scarcely heard, as the house grew very impatient for the question, which passed in the negative on the amendment, and was carried in the affirmative, on every part of the address, without one division, the minority being so very inconsiderable.

Thursday, April 4.] Sir John Blaquiére moved that the thanks of the house be given to the Right Hon. Edmond Sexton Pery, the Speaker, for his upright and prudent conduct during this session, which was agreed to nem. con.

The house with the Speaker went up to the Castle with the address of thanks to his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, which is as follows:

May it please your Excellency,

"WE, his majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons of Ireland, in parliament assembled, observe with pleasure the harmony which subsists between our chief governor and the people, the natural result of mutual good wishes.

The additional strength which our happy constitution, the envy of foreign nations, has lately received, fills our heart with gratitude towards his majesty, and must ever reflect honour upon your excellency's administration. Freedom of election seems to be effectually secured by those salutary laws, at length obtained by your excellency's strenuous interposition, which place our constitutional rights upon a firmer basis than ever they stood before.

When the liberties of the people are secured, industry prevails, and commerce revives. We acknowledge with gratitude that in return for the liberality of the commons, new objects for trade, through your excellency's interposition, are presented to us, and new sources of commerce are opened, of which we persuade ourselves, that we shall in time reap the good effects.

We depend with the utmost confidence upon the continuance of the same benevolent disposition towards us, and that your excellency will take every opportunity of representing the advantages which nature has bestowed upon this island, peculiar to it in situation, climate, and soil, which by proper attention and encouragement may prove a fund of wealth and strength to Great-Britain, where the riches of this kingdom must ultimately center.

We concur with the wishes of the people, that your excellency may continue our chief governor. Their affections are the surest testimony, both of your private and publick virtues."

To which his excellency was pleased to return the following answer:

"IF I could find words to express my thanks, and the deep sense I entertain of your kind and affectionate address, I should have nothing to regret but the apprehensions I am under of an impossibility of ever making a suitable return.

Nothing can be so flattering, or so honourable to me, as the testimony you bear of the mutual good understanding happily subsisting between the people of Ireland and the chief governor.

And if during the course of my administration I have had the good fortune to see established such laws for the improvement of your constitution, and such regulations and encouragements to your commerce and trade, which your kind attention towards me has led you to ascribe to my good offices and interposition, suffer me to take this occasion to declare, they are due to the gracious favour of the best of kings; to a liberal spirit of affection prevailing at this time in Great-Britain towards this kingdom; and essentially to the wisdom and temper with which you have conducted and accomplished those arduous and meritorious objects, which have engaged your constant attention and deliberations."

After the house was returned, his Excellency came in state to the house of lords, and sent for the commons, when his Excellency gave the royal assent to the following twenty-two bills, viz.

1. An act to prevent and punish tumultuous risings of persons within this kingdom, and for other purposes therein mentioned.

2. An act for regulating the trials of peers or peeresses, in cases of capital offences; (this act originated with the lords.)

3. An act for continuing an act for the further preventing delays of justice by reason of privilege of parliament.

4. An act for the improvement of the fisheries of this kingdom.

5. An act to explain and amend an act, intitled, an act for paving the streets, lanes, quays, bridges, squares, courts, and alleys, within the city and county of the city of Dublin, and other purposes relative to the said city of Dublin, and other places therein particularly mentioned; and for extending the provisions of the said act to the baronies of St. Sepulchre's and Donore.

6. An act for continuing an act passed in the seventh year of the reign of his late majesty King George the Second, intitled, an act for making more effectual an act passed in the third year of his present majesty King George the Second, intitled, an act for repairing the road leading from the city of Dublin, to the town of Navan in the county of Meath, and for repairing the road leading from the said town of Navan to the town of Nobber in the said county; as also for repairing the road leading from the said town of Navan to the town of Kells in the said county.

7. An act to explain and amend an act made in the third and fourth years of the reign of his present majesty, intitled, an act for making more convenient the approaches to the city of Dublin, by making a new turn-pike road on the South side, the West side, and the North side of the said city; to commence at the road leading from Dublin to Donnybrook, and to terminate in Cavendish-street.

8. An act for amending an act, passed last session of parliament, intituled, an act for the better regulation of the baking trade in the city of Dublin.

9. An act for continuing, amending, and making more effectual an act passed in the thirteenth year of the reign of his late majesty King George the Second, intituled, an act for repairing the road leading from Timahoe in the Queen's County, through Ballynakill, Durrow, Beggar's Inn, and from thence through the town of Cashell, to the town of Tipperary, in the county of Tipperary.

10. An act for the better regulating the pipe water of the city of Dublin.

11. An act for the more effectually preventing the plundering of ships or vessels which may be wrecked or stranded on the coasts of this kingdom.

12. An act for licensing hawkers and pedlars, and for encouraging of English Protestant schools.

13. An act for the relief of the out-pensioners of the hospital of King Charles the Second, for antient and maimed officers and soldiers of the army of Ireland.

14. An act for amending an act, passed in the eleventh and twelfth years of his present majesty's reign, intituled, an act for better regulating the Foundling Hospital and Workhouse in the city of Dublin, and encreasing the fund for the support thereof; also, for making a provision for appointing a Locum Tenens, in case of the death or absence of the Lord Mayor, or the President of the Court of Conscience.

15. An act for encouraging the cultivation, and for the better preservation of trees, shrubs, plants and roots.

16. An act to prohibit the burning of lime, or lime stones, in any lime-kiln which had not been erected before the 25th of March, 1772.

17. An act for the more effectual securing the payment of rents, and preventing frauds by tenants.

18. An act for confirming and establishing an agreement, made between the surviving trustees named in, or elected and appointed, pursuant to the last will and codicil of George Vaughan, Esq; deceased, and the surviving devisees named in the said will, concerning the real and personal estate whereof the said George Vaughan died seized, or possessed, and for making the said agreement effectual; and for incorporating the said trustees, for the better execution of such of the charities appointed by the said will, as can be maintained; and for other purposes.

19. An act for reviving, continuing and amending several temporary statutes, and for other purposes therein mentioned.

20. An act for amending an act made in the eleventh and twelfth years of his present majesty, intituled, an act for badging such poor as shall be found unable to support themselves by labour, and otherwise providing for them, and for restraining such as shall be found able to support themselves by labour and industry from begging, so far as the said act relates to the county of Limerick, and to the county of the city of Limerick; and for extending the provisions of the said act to the town of Coleraine, in the county of Londonderry.

21. An act for amending and rendering more effectual an act passed in the last session of parliament, intituled, an act for reviving and continuing several temporary statutes, and to prevent the destructive practice of trawling for fish in the bay of Dublin; and for explaining and amending one other act made in the thirteenth and fourteenth years of the reign of his present majesty, intituled, an act for explaining and amending an act passed in the fifth year of his present majesty, intituled, an act for erecting and establishing infirmaries or hospitals in this kingdom. (This act originated with the lords.)

22. An act for vesting certain manors, lands, tenements and hereditaments, late the estate of the Right Hon. Richard Earl of Anglesey, in trustees for raising a sufficient sum of money for discharging certain incumbrances affecting the same. (This act also came from the lords.)

His Excellency then made the following speech, and put an end to the sessions of parliament, which was next day dissolved by proclamation.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

THE business of this session being at an end, you must wish to be relieved from your attendance; and having so ably and worthily discharged your public trust, you may the more cheerfully return to the duties and to enjoy the comforts of private life.

The many proofs which you have given of your unshaken loyalty to the king, of your ardent zeal for the honour and dignity of his government, in every part of the British empire, and of your unremitted attention to the welfare of your country, are highly acceptable to his majesty, and entitle you to the approbation and respect of all your fellow subjects.

The uniform good temper and wisdom of your deliberations, have ensured that signal success, with which your strenuous efforts for the public good have been rewarded, and will honourably distinguish this session in the Journals of parliament.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

I AM, in his majesty's name, to return you thanks for the supplies which you have so liberally granted, and in a manner so well considered, as to strengthen and improve the credit of the nation, and to the benefit of the creditors of the public.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

IN the present state of the British empire, your never-failing duty and loyalty to your sovereign, and your warm and affectionate attachment to the honour and interests of Great-Britain, have shone with distinguished lustre, lustre, and have been highly exemplary and laudable: And it must give sincere pleasure to every friend of this country to reflect, that, whilst a great part of his majesty's dominions in America is torn and convulsed by a most unnatural rebellion, this kingdom, wisely and affectionately persevering in its duty, enjoys blessings of tranquility and abundance, and cultivates the arts of peace and the improvements of commerce, agriculture and manufactures.

Those atrocious offenders who have committed such barbarous outrage in some few counties, have (it is to be hoped) been effectually intimidated and restrained, by the vigour with which their offences have been prosecuted, and by the examples already made; and I trust that the law this day passed, will, by the continuance of your wife, spirited and vigilant conduct, as magistrates, prevent the perpetration of those crimes for the future.

I cannot take my leave of the last session of this parliament, without acknowledging, in the warmest terms of approbation, the great objects which you have accomplished, for the improvement and benefit of your country, and for the support of his majesty's government; your wise and careful regulations for the collection of the revenue; your discharging the heavy arrear due on his majesty's establishments; your liberal support of them; the relief which you have given to public credit; your generous abridgment of your own privileges for the advantage of your fellow subjects; your perfecting the system of a limited duration of parliaments, by the several useful laws made to expedite, regulate and determine elections; your rendering the laws for the encouragement of agriculture more comprehensive and complete; your attention to the staple manufacture of this kingdom, by a prudent regulation of its bounties; and your wise co-operation with the generous policy of Great-Britain to encourage the fisheries of this kingdom, are among the many important acquisitions, which it owes to his majesty's favour, and to the wisdom and good conduct of this parliament.

I cannot conclude, without thanking you, most cordially, for the constant course of your uninterrupted kindness and attention to me, and particularly for your addresses, which are highly honourable and acceptable to me: And in justice to you I must say, that if the public credit, the advancement of the revenue, and the freedom of elections, have been promoted by my endeavours; if during my administration any new sources for the extension of your commerce, and for the encouragement of your manufactures have been opened; the success of those endeavours are principally due to your having enabled me to transmit the strongest representations in your favour: And it will, at all times, give me the greatest pleasure to represent to the best of kings, the duty and loyalty of his most faithful and affectionate subjects of Ireland, and to promote, to the utmost of my power, whatever may contribute to the honour, happiness and prosperity of this kingdom.'

A R T I C L E I.

A Letter to the Rev. Dr. Price, on his "Observations on the Nature of Civil Liberty, &c." 8vo. 6d. Evans, &c.

THE less argumentative parts of Dr. P.'s Observations are considered by this author merely as declamatory; and he declaims against the Doctor's declamation. He says 'he could easily have refuted, at large, the whole argument of Dr. Price's performance, on the Doctor's own premises, and on indisputable facts,'—had he thought it of any salutary consequence, in the too critical circumstances of this country. But he declines the task; for 'as the day of grace, so the hope of salvation is past.'—We are sorry for the author's want of hope; but we wish him not to despair, however; because it may happen that the day of grace is not passed; and, consequently, that salvation may yet come,—whether from the North or the South,—and how little soever we may deserve it.

II. Remarks on Dr. Price's "Observations, &c." 8vo. 1s. Kearsley.

This remarker cannot reason, but he can rail; and where he fails to confute, he fails not to call names.

Specimen.

'Mr. P. [for he nowhere allows the doctor his D, but in the title-page of these Remarks] is a dissenting preacher, born and nourished in the very bosom of sedition. I do not speak the language of bigotry or persecution; but I cannot help considering the Dissenters as secret enemies to government.'—If this be not the language of bigotry, we should be glad to know what language it is.

III. The Honour of Parliament and the Justice of the Nation vindicated. In a Reply to Dr. Price's "Observations on the Nature of Civil Liberty." 8vo. 1s. 6d. W. Davis.

This defender of the honour of parliament is rather lively than solid. He exclaims, without mercy, against the Americans, as rebels, traitors, parricides, &c. &c. and is not a little sarcastic on Dr. Price's profession, as a preacher among the Dissenters.—The advocates for America will reprobate the politics of this writer, while the friends of government will assert that he has given his antagonist many a smart rap on the knuckles. A moderate bystander will probably deem both sides too warm to judge impartially of his merit. Indeed, Impartiality and Candour seem, at present, to have little chance of being heard, with their still, small voice, amidst the tumult and violence of our American disputants. But when passion subsides, both parties, we doubt not, will honestly own that they have been in the wrong.

IV. The Critical Moment, on which the Salvation or Destruction of the British Empire depends. Containing the Rise, Progress, and sent State, and natural Consequences of our American Disputes. By Janus. 8vo. 2s. Setchell. 1776.

In tracing the rise and progress of the present dangerous misunderstanding between Great Britain and her American Colonies, and in deducing its supposed fatal consequences, this author shews a more comprehensive knowledge of the subject, than is common to the pamphleteers of the times. His general view is 'to point out former mistakes, to explain the present dangers, and to offer a new mode for allaying our unhappy ferment.' He appears to be particularly well informed of the present state and circumstances of America, and of the true grounds on which our fellow-subjects in that quarter of the globe have taken arms against us. Possibly [but this is a mere random conjecture] he is a native of some part of that country: at least, his zeal for the Colonies, and the acrimony with which he generally speaks of administration at home, may serve to countenance the suspicion of a partiality, like that which men of the best characters always feel, for their natale solum; and which, if a weakness, is, surely, not an unpardonable one.

We could have wished, however, that a writer so apparently honest, so sensible, and (in many respects) so well informed, had been less severe in his reflections on the ministry: his arguments would then, perhaps, have had more weight with moderate and candid readers, of either party.

With respect to the author's plan of reconciliation, we conceive it to be totally inadmissible on the part of government, as the relinquishing of our parliamentary claim of internal taxation is, with him, a sine qua non; and we are not yet so humbled as to give up the great point, for the sake of which we are hazarding every thing.—Whether the point be worth what we have staked upon it, is another question.

The language of Janus is very frequently incorrect; of which he appears to be duly sensible. He apologizes for it; alledging a regard to simplicity, and integrity of meaning, rather than to the ornaments of style.

V. Some Observations on a Pamphlet lately published, entitled, The Rights of Great-Britain asserted, &c. By the Author of The Answer to Dr. Shebbeare and Dr. Johnson. 8vo. 1s. Donaldson. 1776.

The present answer of the famous pamphlet above-mentioned, is not an elegant or a correct writer; but he appears to be a well-meaning one,—equally zealous for the honour and welfare of Great-Britain, on the one hand, and for the rights of the colonies, on the other. In politics he is a true whig, of the old revolution stamp. This, indeed, was sufficiently obvious from his two former tracts; and by turning back to our accounts of them, we find that the author of these several performances is Dr. Hugh Baillie, late Judge of the admiralty court in Ireland.

This writer, who appears to be considerably advanced in years, and who talks quite in the sober, reflecting strain of a man of observation and experience, gives us his remarks on every material position advanced by the author of the Rights, &c. in the course of which, many things are repeated which are commonly urged by those who disapprove our American measures, and some new arguments are offered. But his chief view, he says, in writing this pamphlet, was to warn us of the danger of our speedily becoming a province to France, in consequence of our country being left exposed, by the great draughts from our land and sea forces for the American service. The good man's fears on this head will probably appear chimerical to those readers who entertain a better opinion of the watchful guardians of our state. Indeed, there seems no reason to fear that any invader will find us in the very defenceless condition supposed by our apprehensive observer.

VI. A Letter from an Officer retired, to his Son in Parliament. 8vo. 1s. Cadell. 1776.

The good, old, gallant officer, full of zeal for the honour of the British arms, and the interest of his country; pathetically exhorts his son to use his utmost endeavours, as a senator, in support of vigorous measures against the Americans; but in the true generous spirit of a soldier, he intimates his hope, that when we have humbled these rebellious children of ours, and made them duly sensible of our superiority of power, as well as right of authority, we may then greatly prove our magnanimity, and heroic policy, by granting to them 'every communicable privilege, every degree of liberty, consistent with their subordination to the sovereign state.' But, that any part of the British empire, hath a right of sovereign dominion over another part, implies a claim on the one hand, and a concession on the other, not likely to be soon adjusted.—This worthy veteran may have been an excellent officer, but he is a very moderate politician.

VII. A further Examination of our American Measures, and of the Reasons and the Principles on which they are founded. By the Author of "Considerations on the Measures carrying on with respect to the British Colonies in North America." 8vo. 3s. Boards. Baldwin, &c. 1776.

This is generally received and acknowledged as the work of Mr. Matthew Robinson. His former production justly obtained the public's applause. The present is not less meritorious.

VIII. Considerations on the American War. Addressed to the People of England. 8vo. 1s. Becket. 1776.

To calumniate the British inhabitants of America, has, of late, become the fashionable employment of the mob of ministerial advocates; who, as we fear, are commonly induced to defend the measures of government, on every occasion, and under every administration, not so much from a persuasion of their rectitude, as from views of self-interest: and hence it probably is that their productions so seldom deserve the approbation of a discerning judge. Their authors being themselves unconvinced, are ill-qualified to convince others. They attempt it without facts facts suited to justify their conclusions, and therefore recur too often to falsehoods. Necessity compels them to supply the want of just arguments by a liberal use of invectives; and as they cannot hope to satisfy the judgments, they endeavour to inflame the passions, of their readers. We do not indeed suspect the present writer to have been hired on the side of government, because from his ignorance, as well of the subject as of every rule of grammar, and of literary composition, he is unworthy of any hire. We rather consider him as a volunteer, who vainly expects, by the present exertion, to recommend himself to the favourable notice of men in power. He begins with expressing an affected conviction of the great use of 'philosophical speculations' for enabling us deeply to 'investigate the actions of society.' 'If we trace, says he, the cause of the discontents in America on a political scale, we may attribute them to some erroneous conduct; but if we mark them with a philosophic eye, we shall perceive them to proceed from innate principles, which will ever struggle with the power that opposes them. It is an observation which experience often verifies, that the vices or virtues of a race will break out in the disposition of succeeding generations, and sometimes with increasing vigour, from the torpitude they may have endured. This remark, though not universally just, may apostrophically be applied to the Colonists.'—

The ancestors of these colonists are, by our author, described, 'as men whose flagitious crimes had rendered them objects of public punishment, or whose turbulent and refractory dispositions made them enemies to every established government'—as men 'whom the law would not suffer to remain in their native land; whose turbulent and restless temper could not brook a government, where every political liberty, consistent with the general welfare of society, is admitted in the fullest extent.' This account of those industrious, enterprising, and useful men, who first planted and settled in our American colonies, is delivered to us as a reason (discovered by the Writer's deep philosophical researches) why 'the same spirit of disobedience and factious temper should glow so strong in their descendants'—so that the Colonists, by nature, are rendered absolutely incorrigible, and we shall never gain a proper share of benefits from America, unless we exterminate the present race of men there, and stock it with a better breed.—What an excellent reason this for the carnage and devastation which some people hope may take place in America the ensuing summer! But unfortunately it is not quite consistent with facts. The Colonists who migrated from hence on account of their dislike to the government of this country, were the Dissenters, who planted New-England, and the time of their migration was just before the commencement of the civil war which brought Charles the First to the scaffold. The numerous infringements, both of civil and religious liberty, which then prevailed, were ill suited to the character which the Writer gives of our government, nor do we think that a dislike of such infringements will be considered as a proof that these emigrants were 'enemies to every established government.'—And with regard to convicts, the Author should be told that in several of the Colonies, and particularly those of New-England, none have ever been admitted, nor were they received into any of the other provinces, until after they had been peopled by honest industrious settlers, who by the good order and morality preserved among them, were able to correct and reform even the criminals of our own country. This expedient for "better peopling the Colonies," has been long complained of by them as an insult and a grievance, and therefore if the number of convicts thus sent to America had been much more considerable than it really is, and were it true (though contrary to all experience) that the vices of individuals descend to their posterity, it would be cruel to reproach the Colonists with the contamination which we have thus forced upon them.

IX. A Plan of Reconciliation between Great Britain and her Colonies; founded in Justice and Constitutional Security: By which the Rights of Englishmen, in Matters of Taxation, are preserved to the Inhabitants of America and the Islands beyond the Atlantic. By the Author of "The Historical Essay on the English Constitution." 8vo. 1s. Johnson. 1776.

X. Seasonable Advice to the Members of the British Parliament concerning conciliatory Measures with America, and an Act of perpetual Insolvency, &c. 8vo. 1s. Bew.

This Writer warmly and fluently declaims in favour of the Colonies and of confined Debtors.

XI. Reflections on the present State of the American War. 8vo. 1s. Payne. 1776.

A Prologue, written by General Burgoyne, spoken at Boston in New England, before the Tragedy of Zara, performed by Officers of the Army for a public Charity.

IN Britain once—it stains th' historic page,
Freedom was vital-struck by party rage;
Cromwell, the fever watch'd, the knife supplied,
She madden'd, and by suicide she dy'd.

Amidst her groans, sunk every lib'ral art,
That polish'd life, or humaniz'd the heart,
Then sunk the Stage, quell'd by the bigots'
roar, [no more.
Truth fled with sense, and Shakespeare pleas'd
To sooth the times too much resembling those,
And lull the care-tr'd thought, this Stage arose.

Proud if you hear, rewarded if you're pleas'd,
We come to minister to minds diseas'd:

To

To you, who, guardians of the nation's cause,
Unsheath the sword, to vindicate the laws.
The Trojan Scene sets glory up to view,
And bids heroic virtue live a-new:
With ravish'd ears, and emulative fire,
We'll rise to that example we admire;
Unite the warrior's, with the patriot's care,
And while we burn to conquer, wish to spare.

The Comic Muse presides o'er social life,
And forms the parent, husband, friend and wife.

'Tis her's the mind from prejudice to save,
And call your old good-humour from the grave;

To paint from nature; and with colours nice,
Shew us ourselves, and laugh us out of vice.
Now say, ye Boston prudes, if prudes there are,
Is this a task unworthy of the fair?
Will form, decorum, piety refuse
A call on nature to conduct the Muse,
And by the influence of the young and chaste,
Diffuse instruction, charity and taste?

Perish the narrow thought, the stand'rous tongue, [wrong:]
When the heart's right, the action can't be Behold the test, mark, as the curtains rise,
How malice shrinks abash'd from Zara's eyes.

Teach little hearts to flutter at a beau.

Is a Sylph near? where do such creatures

And yet, tho' I do all I can, I vow,

This little heart is strangely fluttering now.

What is a beau? Is that young Cornet one,

With feather'd cap, and curling locks be-

And make these observations, three years
Mean time, indulge me in a graver plight,

To say one word, of what I've learn'd tonight,

I've learn'd that passions are most dangerous things,

Inveigling maidens, and subduing kings.

When tender, they distress the fair and good;
When fierce, they stain the hero's heart with blood.

Yet more I have learn'd, and from that * old Man's part,

I think I have one lesson got by heart:

Duty in female breasts should give the law,
And make e'en love obedient to papa.

Ode to Spring.

BALMY breezy welcome wind!
Full on thy genial wings reclin'd,
Once again, to these lov'd isles
Returns sweet Spring; returns and smiles.

Instant, as the goddess moves,
Resound the woods, exult the groves,
Laugh the vales, and down the hills
Bright flow the many—warbling rills.

Charming season! lovely Spring!
While all around some tribute bring!

Let me lay before thy shrine
These verses on a nymph divine.

Bloomy virgin! blush no more,
That sighing swains your charms adore:
Seldom flourishes conceal'd

The garden rose, when once reveal'd.

As the tender Crocus blows
Amid stern winter's dreary snows;
So your fragrant favours bless
Your fellow creatures in distress.

Like the Polyanthus too,
That blooms the circling seasons thro';

Free from vanity and guile,
We always meet you with a smile.

Tho' such sweets around you deal;
Like the meek Lilly of the Vale,

For you shun what merit draws,
And seek to bless without applause.

Yet be sure, for fear of ill,
To wed some worthy man that will,

Florist-like, those virtues past
Uphold and cherish to the last.

To Miss Mary Pomeroy: Written the Morning of her Marriage.

LET joy, mirth, and song, usher in the sweet morn,

It rises engagingly gay,
Come fancy's sweet magic my numbers adorn,
Let all be in bridal array.

The graces and loves with fair Hymen advance,
They lead in the rose of delight;

What beauty ineffable smiles in her glance!
Let ecstacy taking her flight.

A virgin more fair ne'er illumin'd your shrine,
O Hymen! her wishes approve!

In her all the virtues of Heaven combine
To harmonize conjugal love.

Secrets are pleasant to each child of Eve;
 I've one in store, which for your smiles I'll give,
 O, list; a tale it is, not very common,
 Our poet of to-night in faith's a woman:
 A woman, too, untutor'd in the school,
 Nor Aristotle knows, nor scarce a rule
 By which fine writers fabricate their plays,
 From sage Menander's to these modern days.
 How she could venture here I am astonish'd,
 But 'twas in vain the mad-cap I admonish'd;
 Told her of squeaking cat-calls, hisses, groans,
 Off, offs, and ruthless critics damning moans.
 I'm undismay'd, she cry'd, critics are men,

 Then 'tis the ladies' cause: there I'm secure;

 And caro sposo prove—Sir Dingle Dangle;
 No sooner join'd than separate we go,
 Abroad--we never shall each other know,
 At home--I mope above—he'll pick his teeth below.

In sweet domestic chat we ne'er shall mingle,
 And, wedded tho' I am, shall still live single.
 However modish, I detest this plan:
 For me no maukish creature, weak and wan:
 He must be English, and an English--Man.
 To nature and his country false and blind,
 Should Belville dare to twist his form and mind,
 I will discard him—and, to Britain true,
 A Briton chuse—and, may be, one of you!
 Nay, don't be frighten'd—I am but in jest;

A Tale. From the Erse of Dermot O'Mo-naghan, a Religious of the Order founded by St. Ignatius.

SOME spirits happily set free
From shackles of mortality,
Met on the road that leads on high,
(They all had passports to the sky;)
After the usual comps.—to show
They'd learn'd politeness here below,
They dropt into an easy chat,
Traveller-like, of this and that,
What they had seen and known on earth,
From cradle to their second birth;
Pleas'd and quite happy with each other,
'Twas ev'ry word—dear friend, or brother,—
Till by a revolution scurvy
Religion turn'd all topsy-turvy;
Happening to touch that awkward string,
Peace, love, and harmony, took wing,
They argued, squabbled, and to blows
(Zeal's ratio ultima) arose;
But ghosts, however good their will,
Can neither bruise, break limbs, or kill;
Thus they went on, all fire and flame,
Till to St. Peter's lodge they came,
Where at heav'n's gate, full well 'tis known,
With golden key and triple crown,
He constant sits,—close to the portal,
To let in souls when made immortal:
Rap, rap, a tap—Straits with an air,
The porter faintcries, "Who comes there?"—
The wicket opens:—"What are you?"
"Why, good your worship, I'm a Jew;
"A Jew! Then you must take that road,
"I will lead to Abraham's abode,
"For diff'rent sect'ries and religions,
"Have here their different divisions,
"Or we shou'd ne'er be free from riot,
"Nor, tho' in Heav'n, know peace or quiet:"
—That shade dispatch'd—thus to another—
"Of what religion are you, brother?"
"Why, good St. Peter," cries the ghost,
"Rome's Faith Infallible I boast,
"That church which on a rock"—hold, friend,
"Nor thus thy breath in trifles spend,
"This path is yours;—twill to the spot
"Conduct, that's destin'd for your lot!
"Some Popes and Bishops here you'll view,
"And stranger! some few Jesuits too;—

A Puritan then show'd his pass;
"That road leads onward to your class,
"You'll there find Calvin, who had ne'er
"Set foot within this happy sphere,
"Had not Servetus' intercession
"Wip'd off his murderer's transgression,
"For which your founder, when he meets him,
"Wish conscious blushes always greets him:
—"Well, friend, what's your religion pray?"
"I'm a Mahometan;"—"That way—
"A pretty little Houris strait
"Shall lead you to your prophet's gate:—
"Whose turn is next?—Your look and dres
"The Quaker's buckram tribe confess;
"Here—show this favourite of the Spirit,
"Where Christians unbaptiz'd inherit:—
"Now, good Sir, with that solemn face,
"Whence your pretensions to this place?"—
"I'm a new-born, or, if you list,
"I'm what some call a Methodist;"
"Conduct this sprite with expedition
"To Billy Whisfield's new division:
"A single hedge of formal yew,
"Parts Calvin's from your chosen crew,
"But, prythee, for the love of grace,
"Assume an open cheerful face;
"These dismal looks, and downcast air
"Best suit the regions of despair."—
All these dispatch'd with several more,
St. Peter thought his hurry o'er,
(Christians, Turks, Iroquois, and Tartars,
All settled in their different quarters)
When, with a modest air, a shade
Petition for admittance made:
"You've got a passport, friend, I see,
"Pray, what may your religion be?"—
"To One alone," the ghost replies,
"All good, just, merciful, and wise,
"Our Sire, Creator, and our Friend,
"From whom all benefits descend,
"I, while on earth, with reverence bow'd,
"And wisht'd—far as my frailty cou'd,
"To show obedience to his will,
"By doing good, and shunning ill;
"But to no church a livery'd slave,
"All were my brethren to the grave:
"This my religion;—as to sect,
"Or form,—I held 'em in neglect."—
St. Peter, with a visage bland,
Strait took the spirit by the hand,
And with a hearty shake—"My friend,
"Your honest freedom I commend;
"And since on earth you always thought,
"And liv'd,—as reason's vot'ry ought,
"From narrow prejudices free,
"Disdaining mental slavery,
"To no one spot of bliss confin'd,
"Range whereforever you're inclin'd;
"To you heaven's countless wonders known,
"Its pleasures all shall be your own.
"And shou'd you e'er, amid your joy,
"A random thought on me employ,
"And to my humble lodgment come,
"You'll find me constantly at home,
"Where you'll be always sure to meet,
"A friend, and apostolic treat.
"Had I but judg'd like you, my fate
"Had ne'er confin'd me to this gate."—

Boston in Distress.

WHILE pleasure reigns unrival'd on this shore,
The streets of Boston stream with British gore;
While like fall'n Romans for new joys we sigh,
Our friends drop breathless, or for mercy cry,
Perhaps the soldier, lost to pity's charms,
Now stabs the infant in the mother's arms;
Perhaps the husband sees his better part
Well'ring in gore, and bleeding from the heart;
Perhaps the lover, plung'd in bitter woe,
Is torn from her whom most he loves below;
And sees the life he values as his own
Yielded in pangs, or hears the dying groan:
Perhaps the son, O! agony of pain!

Sees, fatal sight! his aged parent slain;
Perhaps whole families, together hurl'd,
Seek the dread confines of an unknown world.
O! scene of slaughter fiends alone enjoy,
Fiends who love death, and wait but to destroy.
Are widows' tears, that never cease to roll,
Are mothers' pangs, that penetrate the soul,
Are shrieks of infants sacrific'd to rage,
The horrid trophies of the present age?
Eternal Father! in thy mercy quell
The flames of faction that arise from hell;
Pour into British hearts the balm of peace,
And bid, O bid this cruel carnage cease;
Like Isaac's sons let Britons meet again,
Nor be one brother by the other slain.

Paris, Feb. 10.

SINCE the Count D'Artois and the Duke of Chartres have introduced horse-racing, this amusement is become very frequent here, and occasions many wagers. The queen is frequently at them. A very singular wager is depending between the strong Count de Menon and the Prince of Nassau: the former is to run 100 paces with the Prince of Sapieha (who is a very large man) on his back, while the other runs 150 paces. But as the comical figure Prince Sapieha will make, would gather too great a number of people together in a public place, the Duke de la Vailliere is to lend his garden for the determination of the wager.

Hanover, March 2.] The troops of Hesse, which are going to England, began their march yesterday, and are expected on Tuesday next in our neighbourhood. Those of Brunswick have already reached the frontiers of Lunenbourg and Bremen. They march with great alacrity.

Hague, March 3.] The States General will permit the three Scottish regiments which are in their pay to go to England, and serve there as long as there may be occasion for them, on condition that they shall not be transported out of the three kingdoms.

Hamburg, March 3.] The lords of the regency of the electorate of Hanover have applied to the magistracy of this city for leave to recruit within its jurisdiction, which the magistrates, after having deliberated upon the request have granted. The Hanoverians make the seventeenth different kingdom or state who have recruiting parties here. The men to be raised by the Hanoverian officers are said to be sent to America. They enlist any country or nation; no objection is made, provided they are sizable, and not too old. They give a large bounty, and therefore get the most recruits of any of the parties. Two gentlemen are commissioned to take up several ships here as transports in the service of his Britannic majesty.

February 13.

MORE than 200 waggons of a new construction, and several large chests of muskets, for the use of the soldiers going to America, were shipped off from the Tower, and sent on board the transports in the river.

Wednesday, March 20. Thomas Aikney and Elizabeth Boardingham, condemned at the late York assizes for the murder of John Boardingham, were executed.—On their trials it appeared that Aikney had cohabited with her during her husband's confinement in York Castle for smuggling; and that soon after his release, she went off with Aikney, and continued with him three months: That she frequently persuaded Aikney to murder her husband, but that he, to avoid yielding to her intreaties, prevailed with her to elope: That she afterwards returned and was kindly received, but still renewed her solicitations for Aikney to do the murder, which he at length agreed to accomplish: That about eight days after her return (Feb. 13,) about eleven at night, she awakened her husband, by acquainting him that she heard a noise at the door, on which the unfortunate man put on his coat and waistcoat, and went down stairs, where Aikney lying in wait for his coming, stabbed him first in the thigh, and afterwards on the left side, leaving the knife in the wound. Boardingham made to the street, and cried out murder; in the mean time Aikney escaped. A neighbour came to his assistance, and found in one hand the bloody knife just drawn out of the wound, and with the other he was supporting his bowels that were falling from his body. He languished till next day, when he expired in great agonies. The knife was produced in court, and proved to be Aikney's, who, on being asked if he had any thing to advance in his defence, acknowledged the truth of the testimony of the witnesses, and received his sentence with resignation.—Elizabeth Boardingham's body was burnt to ashes, and Thomas Aikney's sent to the infirmary at Leeds for dissection.

March 21.

Saturday sen'ight Samuel Norfolk, jun. late of Toppesfield, was executed at Chelmsford for the murder of his wife. He appeared sincerely affected with the thoughts of his situation; and his remorse for, and abhorrence of, the crime he had committed, was very apparent from the alteration of his countenance during the few hours he lived. He confessed, that the Sunday on which he committed the horrid deed for which he suffered, his father, mother, and maid servant were gone to meeting, and none of them returned to dinner: About one o'clock he sent a boy, the only person left at home besides his wife and himself, to see after some cattle. Though the design had been some time premeditated, he was hardly resolute enough for the perpetration of it, till this favourable opportunity offered; that, having taken his resolution, he pretended he would not go to meeting, asked his wife for an handkerchief, and, on her coming to the door, as usual, to bid him farewell, he pretended to observe something extraordinary on the water in the pond, desired her to come and look, and giving her an opportunity of passing him upon a board laid for the purpose of dipping water; on her observing that she could not see it, desired her to stoop: on her repeating the same, he desired her to stoop lower, and, pushing her into the pond, he caught hold of her leg, and kept her head under water till he thought she was dead; then went into the house for a pitcher; and on his return found she had recovered so far as to have laid hold of a stake; and, fixing her eyes upon him, she had strength enough left just to utter 'for the Lord's sake don't,' in such a manner as almost disarmed him of his resolution; but, thinking it now too late to retreat, he forced her from the stake, broke it in two, and, with the other part of it, kept her under water till quite dead, when he put the pitcher down upon her and left her. He declared, that having a connection with the maid servant was the occasion of his committing the murder, but acquitted her of any knowledge of his design upon his wife. He acknowledged the good disposition of his wife, which was apparent from her having caught him in bed with the maid, and, upon his declaring he would never be guilty of the like again, she promised never to repeat what was past, which she faithfully adhered to; and although she did not live very comfortably with his father and mother, she was never known to complain against them amongst her friends.

After the sheriffs had declared the new elected chamberlain of this city, Mr. Wilkes, in a warm speech to the livery, said, that on the most careful examination of the lists of pollers, he had not the least doubt but that the majority of the legal votes was in his favour, and therefore a scrutiny might well be warranted; but as such a business would take up nearly half the time between this and Midsummer-day, he should decline all thoughts of it; but on that day he would again solicit the suffrages of his fellow citizens. He was sorry to observe, that the same corruption which had pervaded both houses of parliament, had found its way among the livery of London. He said that the directors of all the public offices and all their clerks had been commanded to oppose him; and that the Bank directors had as readily assisted his antagonist, as they had lent government eight millions of money without the consent of the proprietary; and concluded by intimating, that every engine was at work to make us slaves.

Mr. Hopkins expressed his warmest gratitude for the honour that had been conferred on him; said that it should be the study of his life, by every instance of diligence, integrity, and impartiality, to deserve the continued approbation of his fellow citizens; that as the worthy Alderman had promised to solicit the suffrages of the livery on Midsummer-day, he should most certainly attend to solicit the like honour.

It is to be remarked, that Messrs. Wilkes and Hopkins spoke twice each on the above occasion; but the above is a fair compendium of what was said.

The following is a list of those gentlemen who have been Chamberlains from the revolution to the present year. Upon an average they enjoyed the office nine years.

- 1688 Sir Peter Rich.
- 1689 Sir Leonard Robinson.
- 1696 Sir Thomas Cuddon.
- 1702 Sir William Fazakerley.
- 1718 Sir George Ludlam.
- 1727 Samuel Robinson, Esq;
- 1734 Sir John Bosworth.
- 1751 Sir Thomas Harrison.
- 1763 Sir Steph. Theo. Janssen, Bart.
- 1776 Benjamin Hopkins, Esq;

It is somewhat remarkable, that at the general election in 1761, the number of the livery who then voted, amounted to 5,797. At the general election in 1768, the numbers amounted to 5,697, and on the present election for Chamberlain, the amount is 5,597, so that in the three elections here alluded to, there has been a regular and gradual decrease of one hundred pollers.

20. Yesterday morning the detachments from the three regiments of foot guards were mustered on Wimbledon Common, and formed into regular companies, and his majesty's appointment of the officers thereof made known, who all took their respective stations previous to their being reviewed. About half past nine his majesty, attended by Gen. Carpenter, Col. Matthews, several of the nobility, and other officers of the army, came on the Common, when he was received with a royal salute. The soldiers went through their evolutions with great dexterity, first forming themselves into various squares, and then platoon and circular firing, after which they made a general running fire, in imitation of a pursuit, till they had each expended 32 rounds of powder, with which they were provided before they took the field. His majesty expressed great approbation of their performance. The officers and soldiers were dressed in the same uniforms.

The duke of Wintemberg, the duke and duchess of Northumberland, and many other persons of distinction, were present; as was also one of the Indian chiefs, who was habited in the dress of his country, over an English suit of clothes. He wore an ensign's breast plate; his face was painted as with streaks of blood, and he carried a war hatchet in his hand. Upon the whole, the scene was a melancholy one. The parties who are to act the principal characters acters in the American tragedy, seemed not satisfied with their cast of parts; and there were streaming eyes among the Roxanas and Stairas who attended the ceremony. Gin and gingerbread, however, banished their womanly fears, and they were literally fired with public spirit.

An American Indian, (a very shrewd one) who has been only three months from New-York, seemed much affected with the scene, and exclaimed in a pathetic manner, "This may do here, but it won't do in America!"

The following is a list of the ships on the North American station.

Suppose the total 70, and that the American coast, including bays, large creeks, and the great rivers, forms a line to be commanded of 6000 miles, which is about the truth; in that case, every one of these ships, supposing them cruising at equal distances, will have very near 90 miles of coast to guard.

The cause between Alderman Newnham and the churchwardens of the parish in which he lives, is decided in favour of the latter. The object of litigation was, whether Mr. Newnham, as an Alderman of the city, was compellible to serve the office of churchwarden? He had been elected to this office, and refused to accept it, upon a supposition that he was legally exempted from the duties of it by his magisterial character. The court of Aldermen advised him to try the point, and it now appears that no gentleman, because he chuses to fill an employment of honour, is to be discharged from his parochial obligations, wherever he may be an inhabitant.

St. James's, April 2. The king was pleased on Friday last to confer the honour of knighthood on Trevor Corry, Esq; his majesty's minister to the republic of Dantzick, when he had the honour to kiss his majesty's hand.

Extract of a Letter from Grenada, dated St. George's, Nov. 5, 1775.

'This letter is only to inform you of a most dreadful disaster which befall this town the first inst. About three o'clock in the morning a fire was discovered in the shop of a Negro Carpenter in the windward part of the town; every possible means were used to extinguish it, though without effect. In short, in the space of three hours from its being perceived, the whole town was in one continued blaze. The houses being in general built of wood, the flames raged with such an amazing rapidity, that it was with difficulty any elapsed with their lives. It is now impossible to ascertain the loss, but it is supposed it cannot be much less than five hundred thousand pounds. It is particularly unfortunate that those who were the principal sufferers in the fire of December 1771, are now mostly involved in the present great calamity, which will occasion, it is thought, many failures, as there are few or no goods saved, and most of the sufferers had not the precaution to cove themselves by insurance.

Kilkenny,

Kilkenny, March 27.

THE society of gentlemen called Rangers, who have distinguished themselves for some months past in apprehending rioters, and preserving the peace of this city and neighbourhood, have given a fresh instance of public-spiritedness; on finding that a military guard could not be spared from Clonmell, to conduct a notorious White Boy hither, charged with some capital offences in this county, this body of gentlemen offered their assistance on the occasion: Accordingly, on Sunday last a party of the Kilkenny Rangers, dressed in a handsome uniform, and completely accoutred, headed by Sir Haydocke Evans Morris, Bart. set off for Clonmell, and returned next morning with Edmond Power, a noted White Boy, whom they conducted through a most riotous part of the country, and lodged him safely in our county gaol, in order to take his trial for the burning of John Grant's house at Kilmogue in this county. These gentlemen have most deservedly received the thanks of the county and city grand juries, and of the public in general, for their spirited conduct on this and every other occasion.

Since the commencement of our assizes, the following persons have been tried and found guilty, viz. Michael Boulger and Edmond Butler, two White Boys; the former for burning and destroying the house, offices, &c. of John Grant, of Kilmogue; and the latter for cutting off one of the ears of Patrick Pigott, and flitting the other, for which they were both sentenced to be executed on Saturday next the 30th inst.

Richard Lawless was likewise found guilty of stealing ten ewes and eight lambs, the property of Richard Ryan, Esq; and two ewes, the property of James Murphy, for which he was sentenced to be executed on Saturday the 25th of May next.

Last Monday morning James Kennedy, alias Captain Madcap Setfire, a principal leader and captain of the White Boys, was apprehended in the Queen's county, by the Rev. Chamberlain Walker, and some other gentlemen, with a party of the light Horse, who conducted him to Maryborough Gaol.

On Sunday night last, William Paul Butler, Esq; of Ballintemple, in the county Carlow, made another considerable seizure of fire arms, belonging to the White Boys, which some of their party had brought from Newfoundland, and hid in the mountains near Borris, of which Mr. Butler no sooner received information, than he went in search of them, and found a number of guns, swords and pistols, which he lodged in a place of safety; the guns are of an uncommon size, being seven feet eight inches long.

Last Week a man was found buried in a garden at Ros; his cloaths were on, but his head was severed from his body. It is supposed he was a pedlar, and that the villains who murdered him also robbed him.

We hear from Clara, in the King's county, that last Wednesday, March 27, a number of White Boys broke into the House of the Rev.

Mr. Cahagan, titular Bishop of —, as it is thought with intention to rob and murder him; but this gentleman being prepared, fired from above stairs on them, killed one of the desperate villains, and the rest fled with precipitation. The dead man proves to be a notorious leader of the White Boys. The cause generally assigned for the attack on this gentleman is, his having from the Altar admonished those deluded wretches to desist from their depredations.

At the assizes for the county of Down, at Downpatrick, James Heslip, otherwise Hezley, was tried and convicted for burglariously entering the Earl of Hillsborough's dwelling-house at Hillsborough, on the night of the 23d of January last, and taking thereout money, wearing apparel, and other articles, to a considerable amount, and received sentence to be executed the 27th of April next; and Thomas Willson, for stealing linen yarn out of the bleach-yard of John Shaw, in Hillsborough, and Charles Morrow, for another felony, were both found guilty; the former ordered to be burnt in the hand, and imprisoned for one year, and the latter to be burnt in the hand.

Carlow, April 3. Last Saturday our assizes ended, when the following persons were capitally convicted, and ordered for execution, viz. Arthur Murphy, for going by night to the dwelling-house of Thomas Donahoe, of Acclare, in this county, and burying him in a grave with thorns under and over him, and cutting off a piece of his right ear, for which he is to be executed at Acclare, on Thursday the 4th day of April.—Patrick Breen, Michael Ryan, Owen Morrissy, and James Murphy, for assembling and going by night to the dwelling house of Margaret Cavanagh, and maliciously and feloniously injuring her property, by breaking a door and window; and likewise going to St. Mullan's, and assaulting James Cavanagh, and compelling him to take an oath never to swear against a White Boy, are to be executed at the commons of Borris in this Co. on Saturday the 13th of April.—Jas. Donahoe, for assaulting James Murphy on the King's highway, and robbing him of 2s. 8d. h. to be executed on Monday the 6th of May next.

Cork, April 4. The following persons have received sentence in the city court, viz. Daniel Scuddane, Timothy Murphy, and John Murphy, alias Killy, for highway robbery; and Timothy Fahy, for feloniously and burglariously robbing Mr. Travers of Belvedere, to be hanged on the 13th inst.—Patrick Coleman, Michael Bourke, and John Casey, for cow-stealing, to be burned in the hand; Coleman and Bourke to be confined one month.—Elizabeth Gwin, for felony out of the house of Mr. Hugh O'Neil, to be transported.—James Roche and John Brien for perjury, and Dennis Denahy, for an assault on William Lawton, Esq; one of the Sheriffs, to be whipped three market days.—In the county court, Daniel Mahony, alias Keaghlce, convicted of a riot and assault, to be whipped through the town of Dunmanway on the 9th and 23d inst.—William Henratty to be whipped through the

the town of Youghal on the 27th inst. and 4th of May next : and William Fox to be whipped through the town of Mitchelstown on the 11th and 18th of May next, for the like offences of riot and assault.—David Connel John, a travelling chymist, for petty larceny, to be whipped from North-gate to South-gate on the 13th inst. and Dennis Denahy and William Fox, presented as vagabonds, ordered to be transported.

Kilkenny, April 6. The Right Hon. the Lord Chancellor hath been pleased to appoint Charles Henry Coote, of Sheen, Esq; Joseph Galtut, of Mountrath, Esq; Euseby Stratford, of Corbally, Esq; and Thomas Palmer, of Rushall, Esq; all in the Queen's county, to be Justices of the peace for said county.

Last Thursday night the affizes of Maryborough ended, when twelve White Boys were capitally convicted, viz.—James Kennedy, alias Captain Madcap Setfire, and James Duffly, found guilty of feloniously assembling by night in white uniforms, and cropping the ears of Paul Daly of Iron Mills, William Brennan of Tinnelintin, John Mulhall and William Cruits of Raheen, tythe proctors; likewise of burying said proctors in graves, for which they are to be executed at Branra, on Saturday the 20th of April.—Michael Tobin, found guilty on the same indictments, to be hanged at Maryborough, on Thursday the 18th inst.—Martin Bennet and Terence Phelan, for being concerned in part of said crimes, to be executed at the four roads of Cuffsborough, on Monday the 22d inst.

James Phelan, Patrick Phelan, John Fean, Jeffery Purcell, James Daly, and Keran Kelly, found guilty of assembling in like manner at the house of John Chamberlain of Coolfin, and robbing him of a gun; likewise of robbing Mary Egan of Aughmacart of a cloak—Thomas Mulholland, alias Cheshire Tom, found guilty of violently assaulting William Phelan, and desperately wounding him with a sword.—The trials of the seven criminals last mentioned, were not ended till past eleven o'clock on Thursday night, when sentence of death was pronounced against them.

D U B L I N.

About one o'clock at noon, on Thursday the 4th April, Mr. Francis Graham, apothecary, of Bolton-street, was attacked by four fellows armed with pistols, who demanded his money, but he making resistance, they fired and slightly wounded him in the shoulder; after which they ran away, but being immediately pursued, two of them, Hugh Doyle, a sailor, and Richard Perry, a carpenter, were, with the assistance of a dog, taken and lodged in Newgate.

April 9. About twelve at night, Mr. Litton, of Mary's abbey, with two ladies and two children, in a coach, passing near the end of Crane-lane, Thomas-street, were stopped by three footpads, armed with bayonets, who threatened the servant behind and the persons in the carriage with immediate destruction should they resist; they demanded their money at one door of the coach; but Mr. Litton having had the presence of mind to let himself out at the opposite door, and call for assistance, the villains ran off up Crane-lane. After Mr. Litton had conducted the ladies home, he took his sword, and having got a party of the watch (who, it is to be observed, did not appear when he called out before), went in search of the villains, and near the place where the coach was stopped found a shoe and buckle; which last being a regimental one, Mr. Litton went the next morning, accompanied by the servant who stood behind the coach, to the barrack, where being told that some recruits of the new-raised regiment were apprehended that morning, and in actual custody there, they went to see them, and the servant declared a prisoner there to be one of the fellows that stopped the coach. A recruit in the same regiment also claimed the shoe and buckle, which he deposed said prisoner had stolen from him. A gentleman also, who had been robbed the preceding night, charged him with being one of them who attacked him, on which he was committed to Newgate.

April 12. In the evening, a young gentleman and lady returning to town from Donnybrook, were stopped near the end of Northumberland-street, by four ruffians armed with pistols, who took from the gentleman his watch, money and coat; and from the lady, a silk cloak and a new sattin petticoat, with which they got clear off. We hear one of the fellows was since met by the gentleman in Fleet-street, with the coat he had robbed him of on his back, going with other volunteers on board the tender now lying here, and carried to Newgate.

Extract of a letter from Dover, April 11.

“Three young gentlemen, passengers in the Linen-hall, Captain Randal, came ashore this morning to see the place, and in going on board the boat was overlet, and unfortunately they were all drowned. Their names are as follow:—Ensign Law, of the 17th Regiment, Mr. Nevill, and Mr. Burrows.”

As the White Boy act is of the utmost importance to be generally known, that people may not inadvertently incur any of the pains and penalties to be inflicted thereby, we take the earliest opportunity of giving an abstract of the enacting clauses.

This act takes place from the last day of last March.

It awards fine, imprisonment, pillory, whipping, or any other corporal punishment the court shall think fit, with security for good behaviour, to any person who shall assemble or appear by day or night, with any fire arms or other offensive weapon, with face or body disguised in any manner, or wearing any badges or dress not usually worn on lawful occasions, or assuming any particular name or denomination not usually assumed by his Majesty's subjects, even if such person shall commit no other offence.—Quere, whether Christmas mummers, masqueraders, and travelling Gypsies do not come under this clause?

It awards death to any person who by day or night shall shoot at, maim, or disfigure any person; or send any letter, with or without any fictitious name, demanding any money, arms, ammunition, or other thing or things; or threatening the person or property of any person; or shall by gifts, promises or threats compel any person to join in these offences; or shall compel or attempt to compel, by any means, any person to quit habitation, farm, possession, or lawful employment.

It awards death to any person who shall assault, or injure the habitation, property, goods and chattels of any person, forcibly break into his house, barn, or out-house; or shall cause any door to be opened by threats, or forcibly take away any horse, or arms, money, goods or chattels; or shall cause them to be delivered by threats; if any of these acts be done after sun-set and before sun-rise; or before six o'clock in the forenoon, though the sun should be risen: But if done out of these hours, these the punishments in the first clause are awarded.

It enacts, that if any of these offenders shall be killed or maimed by any peace-officer, in endeavouring to take, oppose or disperse them, the officer is hereby indemnified.

It awards death to any person who shall assist, abet, succour, or conceal any of the afore-named offenders.

It enacts that all damages done to any person's property by such offenders, shall be made good by assessment on the parish, town, barony, &c. wherein it was sustained.

It pronounces pardon to any white boy (except for murder, maiming, and burning houses, &c.) for all crimes committed before the first of last December, who shall surrender before the first of next August, and give security for good behaviour for seven years.

It empowers all Magistrates to search for and seize arms and ammunition in the possession of all Papists or reputed Papists.

It provides that no person shall be convicted upon any confession or discovery he or she shall make, nor have such examination given as evidence against such persons so examined.

It awards the punishments in the first clause against all persons who shall refuse to deliver up, or declare what arms are in their possession.

O R,

Compendium of Entertaining Knowledge,

For M A Y, 1776.

Some Memoirs of the late Mr. Isaac Sparks; with an elegant Engraving of that celebrated Comedian in the Character of Feigard, in the Comedy of the Beaux Stratagem.

THE estimation in which the late Mr. Sparks was justly held, both as a comedian and as a man, may well excite the curiosity of the public in respect to sundry particulars of his life; and it is a debt due to posterity to hand down such facts as may give our successors some idea of his excellencies, both in public and private life.

Mr. Isaac Sparks was the youngest son of Mr. John Sparks, and was born in College-street, Dublin, on the sixteenth of September, in the year 1719. He was educated under Mr. Fottrel, who was then esteemed an excellent school-master, and was, at a proper age, put apprentice to an eminent stay-maker. With this master Mr. Sparks did not continue above three years, for having very early contracted a passion for the stage, he quitted his business, and joined an itinerant company of players; his first appearance being in the character of Count Basset in the comedy of the Provok'd Husband. However he did not long remain in the country, but was recalled to Dublin, and by the interest of his brother, Mr. Luke Sparks, who then belonged to the Theatre in Aungier-street, was received in the company which performed on that stage, where he appeared with great success. In the beginning of the year 1748, he went to the Theatre Royal in Drury-lane, and continued till the next year, when he returned again to Ireland, and to his death remained in full possession of the esteem of his countrymen.

Mr. Sparks was married to Miss Ann Holland, daughter to Mr. Samuel Holland, an eminent Butcher in Castle-market, by whom he had several children, one only of whom (Mr. Richard Sparks) is now living. He lost his wife on the 8th of May, 1756, and remained ever after a widower.

On the 23d of April, 1776, he was taken ill at the coffee-house, and died the Sunday following, a few days before his benefit, on which occasion Mr. Waddy spoke the following address, written by Mr. Francis Gentleman.

An Elegiac Address, occasioned by the Death of Mr. Isaac Sparks, and spoken at the Theatre Royal, Smock-alley, Tuesday April 30, 1776.

THE star poetic of Eliza's age!
 Immortal Shakespeare—calls the world a stage;
 Says, thro' each scene of life, of joys or cares,
 That men and women all are merely Play'rs;

O o

Shall

Shall all their entrances and exits have,
From life's first morning to its evening's grave.

To-morrow! and to-morrow! thought sublime!—

Creep to last syllable of recorded time;
And all our yesterdays—f, il mortal breath

Havelighted men the way to dusky death.

To night, 'twas meant, that one who long had been

A leading pillar of the comic scene!

A son of jocund whim, and stingle's jest,
Who oft brought laughter to a pleasing test,

In person should have come—respect to pay

But,—native emblem of the fleeting day,

With life his gratitude is pass'd away;
That gratitude which nothing could abate

But the last stroke of all-demanding fate:
From transitory being now set free

"He's gone to join the great majority*."

Let me, with many, here the man bewail

Who, weigh'd in public, or in social scale,
Show'd sterling worth,—but now, alas!
no more

Can set the stage, or table in a roar!

May each survivor use his prudent plan,
And with stage merit, blend the honest man;

Oh! may we all, like him the pleasure
know

'Midst friends to live, and die without a foe:

quil home.

As a comedian, Mr. Sparks possessed great humour, for which he seemed more indebted to nature than to art. Indeed he had only to transplant to the stage that pleasantry which he displayed in private life, to be truly excellent; and it was observable that, in all he performed, he appeared more the person he represented, than the actor. His mode of playing was truly chaste; he was as little indebted to grimace or buffoonery, for the abundant applause he always gained, as any one comedian, either now living, or remaining in remembrance. He never sacrificed propriety to extort a laugh from the galleries; and as he was remarkably perfect in every part which he undertook, he had no occasion to employ ludicrous gesture to supply a deficiency of memory.

N O T E.

* Dr. Young.

In the comic line of acting he has been equalled by few, exceeded, I believe, by none. His peculiar parts were old men, low comedy, Irishmen, and clowns, in each of which he had singular merit. Don Cholerick, in the Fops Fortune; Don Manuel, in She would and She would not; Justice Woodcock, in Love in a village; Sir Sampson Legend, in Love for Love; Sir Harry Gubbins, in the Tender Husband; Sterling, in the Clandestine Marriage; Sir William Wisewoud, in Love's last Shift; Sir Jealous Traffic, in the Busy Body; Alderman Smuggler, in the Constant Couple; and Dominic, in the Spanish Friar, were parts which Mr. Sparks performed with the greatest justice, and a strict adherence to nature. In sundry low comedy characters he was excellent; particularly Serjeant Kite, in the Recruiting Officer; Caliban, in the Tempest; Peachum in the Beggar's Opera; the Miller, in the King and the Miller; Crispin Heeltap, in the Mayor of Garret; Blister, in the Virgin Unmask'd; and even the short parts of the Mob, in Julius Cæsar; Diggory, in She Stoops to Conquer; and Justice Guttle, in the Lying Valet; attained a degree of consequence from his performance.

In the several parts of Irishmen, where an imitation of the brogue was characteristic, Mr. Sparks was peculiarly happy. His performance of Teague, in the Committee, was well adapted to paint the honest well-meaning blunders of an Irishman in low life; whilst in Captain O'Blunder, he displayed them in a more elevated station. In the poor Irishman in the Register Office, his dress was that of a poor ragged spalpeen, the manners of which he imitated in a masterly manner. The characters of Sir Patrick O'Neal, in the Irish Widow; Macahone, in the Stage Coach; and the Irishman, in the Lottery, were equally well performed, with that apparent mixture of simplicity and cunning as will scarcely be seen again; and in the character of Foigard, in the Stratagem he was totally unrivalled.

As he was perfect master of his countenance, he could assume at pleasure that vacancy of face so necessary for the Clowns in pantomime, to which cast his figure and manner were adapted, in an uncommon degree: And till another performer shall appear equal to him in that way, pantomimes will lose one of their chief ornaments.

Thus it appears, that as a comedian, nature was the grand guide which he had had ever in view. He shewed a sincere respect to the audience by being ever perfect in his part; and he very frequently added some strokes of wit which added a vivacity and spirit to the character he represented, and by being introduced with propriety, were always well received.

But Mr. Sparks was no less amiable in private life. His humour and pleasantry made his company be eagerly sought by persons of distinguished rank; and his behaviour was ever, not only agreeable but endearing; for whilst he gave a free current to his wit, he so well managed its points that they did not wound those at whom they were aimed, so that they never lost him a friend, or made him an enemy. The Court of Nassau was a society set up in Dublin about the year 1750, of which he was president, under the title of Lord Chief Joker; but as he was the soul that animated that body of pleasantry, its life departed, when he left it.

In his relative duties as brother, husband, and father, he was equally exemplary. His constant fund of good-nature, and that philanthropy for which he was ever distinguished, made him beloved by all who were connected with him by the tie of affinity as well as of blood; whilst to crown his character it only remains to be said, he was a strictly honest man in all his dealings.

The following Piece has lately made its Way from Rome to London, and though it will not incline any of our Readers to be Jesuits, it may perhaps soften in some Degree their severe Opinion of that Body, or at least of the Head of it.

An Account of the Circumstances relating to the Death of the Abbe Lawrence Ricci.

IT is not my design to make any reflections on the event which is the subject of this letter: The circumstantial account which I send you, is taken out of some letters from Rome, written by persons worthy of credit, and witness of the facts.

Lawrence Ricci was born at Florence, the 2d of August, 1703, of an illustrious family; He entered into the Society of Jesus in the year 1720, and was made General of it on the 21st of May, 1758. After the destruction of the society, he was sent prisoner to the castle of St. Angelo, on the 22d of September, 1773, where death put an end to his suffering life.

His last illness was but of a few days: The eighth was the last of pain and life. Loaded with a weight of years, rendered more weighty by many heavy crosses, and by a variety and long series of afflictions; with accumulated woe on the latter period of them, by the suppression of his order; by the calumnies cast on it and himself; by the imprisonment of his own person, and a long, painful, and close confinement, especially for the first eighteen months of it;—under this complication of years and sorrows, he was little able to support a violent attack of an inflammatory fever. The relief and succours which his Holiness vouchsafed to afford him in his sick state, by giving in charge to his own Physician, Doctor Sallicetti, to leave no endeavours untried for his recovery, were without effect. Bleeding was repeated to the fourth time, and blisters were applied, but it soon appeared that all means to save his life were unavailing.

The first symptoms of his disease discovered themselves on Thursday evening, November 16. After having taken his walk, according to his custom, on the terras of the castle, on his return to his apartment he was seized with a chilliness and a cold, which immediately became very violent. The fever soon increased upon him, and by Saturday evening his life was judged to be in danger.

The sick man, sensible of his own dangerous situation, demanded the holy viaticum: Accordingly he obtained this consolation on Sunday morning, in presence of the Sub-governor and the two Chaplains of the castle, of the lay-brother who waited on him, of a serjeant, a corporal, and other soldiers with lighted flambeaux.

When the blessed sacrament was brought, he entered into profound recollection, and remained silent for some time; then judging he ought not to be wanting to himself, by a solemn declaration of his own innocence, and that of his order, which he had governed for the space of 15 years, he began to speak as follows:—"That he sincerely pardoned all those who had been instrumental in the destruction of the society:—He did not omit to pray particularly for those who had reduced him to this state of inability and suffering, and to implore the blessing of heaven on them:" After which, raising his voice, and with a remarkable firm tone, he said, "that in the presence of God, whom he adored ed in his august sacrament, and by whom shortly he was going to be judged, he declared to the whole world, that he was entirely innocent of all that had been laid to his charge, and of whatever might have contributed to the destruction of the Society entrusted to his care, or to his own personal imprisonment. He thanked God for withdrawing him from this world, and hoped that his death would procure some alleviation to those who suffered with him in the same cause."

All those who were present, not excepting even the guards, could not refrain from weeping; and the priest, who was performing the service, was so moved, that he dropped the sacred host on the patten, without being sensible of what had happened.

After the sick man had received the holy viaticum, the fever grew more violent, and denounced his approaching end. On Monday evening the sacrament of extreme unction was administered to him, and he received it with redoubled fervour, and with the greatest edification. He then caused a request to be presented to the Pope, craving his Apostolical Benediction, if his Holiness did not think him unworthy of it: The Pope was graciously pleased to grant his petition, and accompanied the grant with the most tender and paternal expressions.

Many Cardinals sent frequent messages of enquiry after his health, and an unknown person caused two flambeaux of a very large size to burn before the shrine of St. Ignatius.

Yet the sick party grew worse and worse, and nothing remained but his constancy in sufferings: His patience did not forsake him in his last illness, which had supported him during the long period of his imprisonment. Not a breath of complaint was heard on his death-bed, as not a word of murmur had escaped his lips in his prison, even against the authors of his hard and sad lot; nor the least shadow was seen of resentment against those under-officers of the castle, who had misbehaved towards him. Submissively resigned to the will of his creator in all events, he waited with confidence the hour of his release. He caused certain fervent prayers to be read by his bed-side, of which he had made a select collection during his abode in the castle, with the intention of making use of them at his death, which he foresaw was not far distant.

It was remarked, that during this interval, even to the moment he gave up the ghost, he was always present to himself, and in full enjoyment of his senses. An hour before his death, he spoke familiarly and with his usual serenity to the person who attended him in his sickness, to whom he gave the last farewell, saying to him, that he should hear his voice no more.

From that instant he spoke no more. He composed himself in calm recollection, and, in short, on the 24th of November, a little after noon, at a time when all opposition to his enlargement seemed to be removed, he sweetly gave up his soul to his redeemer at the age of seventy-two years, three months, and twenty-two days, having lived fifty-five years, three months, and six days in religion. It had been his request, that the crucifix, which he always carried about him, should be delivered to his nephew; that his little wardrobe should be distributed, by way of some small recompence to those who had served him; and that he should be buried at the late professed house of the Jesuits.

All those who were present at the death of this late and last General of the society of Jesus (indeed, we may say all Rome, as they were not ignorant of the circumstances) and even to the galley-slaves of the castle, all conceived the greatest veneration for his memory, and all look on his death as precious in the sight of God. Dr. Salticetti declared openly, that he had been present at the deaths of many persons in repute for piety and virtue, but that he had never been witness to such sentiments as those he had just been present at.

The pope gave orders to Cardinal Corfini for the funeral of Abbe Ricci; and the will of his holiness was, that all should be done according to the quality of the subject, and that his body should be deposited in the vault of the church of the Jesu, near the other generals of the society his predecessors.

Accordingly the national church of Florence was hung with black, and on Saturday November the 25th, two hours after sun-set, the corpse was conveyed in a coach attended by four flambeaux, and followed by another coach, to the said church, where on the morrow morning, vested in his sacerdotal habits, he was exposed on a lofty bed of state, round which were burning thirty grand tapers.

During this whole morning, which was Sunday, November 26th, there was an extraordinary concourse of people to this church, of all sorts and conditions.

Mass was continued to be said at all the altars till noon. The funeral service was celebrated with great decency and solemnity, by the clergy who serve that parish. The throng of people did not discontinue, and many gave tokens of great veneration and tender affection, though curiosity perhaps was the chief motive that first led them thither.

I must not pass over in silence one remarkable token of respect given by the bishop of Commachio. This worthy prelate, who is in equal repute for piety and learning, the same who had lately entered Rome barefoot at the head of many of his clergy, came also to the Florentine church, and placing himself on his knees near the Catafalque, he said, with a voice loud enough to be heard by many, that "he did not come to pray for the soul of the deceased, but to solicit the credit of that singularly just man, whom he regarded as a predestinated soul, and as a martyr." Many others seemed to think the same, without daring to declare their sentiments so openly. In citing this passage, I have nothing in view but to shew the high esteem his virtue was held in, and the homage paid to it.

At mid-day the church was shut, and the corpse withdrawn from the sight of the people. It was removed into the sacristy, where no one was allowed to enter. Towards midnight it was put into the same coach that had brought it thither, followed also by the second, and conveyed with lighted torches to the church of the Jesu, where all was ready for the burial, according to the Pope's order, and the requests of the venerable old man. The president of the house said the prayers of the church over the corpse, before it was let down into the vault. The body was then put into a coffin, which was placed on the side of his predecessors Centurioni and Visconti, in quality of General of the Society of Jesus. To serve by way of epitaph, a scroll of parchment was fixed to the coffin, on which were written his name, his age, the time and place of his death, and the number of years he had been General of his order.

Such was the end of the eighteenth and last General of the Society of Jesus. His last act and deed left in writing, which he thought incumbent on him to consign to posterity in attestation of his innocence, will perhaps be the only monument that will remain of his memory. He had prepared beforehand, and at his leisure, this protestation, to the end that if his last sickness should not allow him to speak it, he might at least, to the best of his power, make known to all the world his personal innocence, as well as that of the religious order he had governed for 15 years. Attentive to fulfil this obligation, which he judged important, he had the precaution to write himself this declaration, and to sign it with his own hand; and in pursuance of this design, he entrusted it to one of the soldiers of the castle, on whose fidelity he thought he could best rely, and who in effect discharged his trust faithfully.

This authentic piece is preserved with great care, and from this original is drawn the Italian copy, from whence are taken the French and English translations.

It seems impossible to call in question the authenticity of this piece; for the characters and signature of his hand cannot but be known, and they may be confronted with many of his letters, some of which no doubt are still in being.

An Authentic Copy of the Protestation which the Abbe Lawrence Ricci left at his Death.

"THE uncertainty of the time when it will please almighty God to call me to himself, and the certainty that this time is not far distant, considering my advanced age, the multitude, the long duration, and weight of my sufferings, warn me to be beforehand in the discharge of every duty I think incumbent on me;—and this precaution is the more necessary, as it may easily happen that my last sickness may disfigure me from doing it at the time of my death.

Therefore considering myself as at this instant going to appear before the tribunal of infallible truth and justice, such as is the sole tribunal of God;—after long and mature reflection; and after having prayed to my most merciful redeemer and awful judge, not to permit me, especially in this my last act and deed of my life, to be led away or influenced by passion, or by any bitterness of heart or mind, or by any other vicious end or motive; but purely because I judge it my duty to render justice to truth and innocence;—I make the two following declarations and protestations:

First, I declare and protest, That the Society of Jesus, now extinct, has not given any cause for its own suppression. This I declare and protest with that moral certainty which a superior can have who is well informed of what passes in his order.

Secondly, I declare and protest, That I have not given the least occasion towards my own imprisonment. This I declare and protest with that great certainty and evidence which each one has in the consciousness of his own actions. My only motive for making this second protestation is, because I judge it necessary for the credit of the Society of Jesus, now extinct, of which I was general.

But my intention is not, that, in consequence of these two protestations, any of those should be judged guilty in the sight of God, who have brought these disasters on the Society and myself: I shall religiously abstain from passing any such like judgments. The views of the mind of man, and the affections of his heart, are known by God. He alone sees the errors of the human understanding, and discerns how far they are excusable. He alone penetrates the views which set man on action, and the spirit with which he acts;—the affections and inclinations of the heart which accompany the action,—and from whence depends the rectitude or culpability of the exterior action; consequently, I leave all judgment to him, who will examine the works of men, and search out their thoughts. (Book of Wisdom, ch. vi. ver. 4.)

And, not to be wanting to my duty as a Christian, I protest, that, with the divine assistance, I have always pardoned, and that I do now sincerely pardon, all those who have persecuted me, first by their persecution of the Society of Jesus, and the many hardships they caused individuals, my late subjects, to undergo—then by the suppression and extinction of it—and by what soon followed, my imprisonment, with all the sufferings that have attended it, and by the injuries done to my reputation;—these are known facts, and notorious to the whole world. I pray the Lord, out of his pure bounty and goodness, and out of the infinite merits of Jesus Christ his Son, first to pardon my own innumerable sins; and next to pardon the authors and instruments of those losses which I have sustained, and those sufferings I have undergone, in conjunction with the whole body of which I was head—and I desire to die with this prayer and these sentiments in my heart.

Lastly, I pray and intreat all those into whose hands this my declaration and protestation may fall, that they will make it public to the world, as much as may be. I crave the performance of this my last request by all the claims of human benevolence, of justice, and of Christian charity; and a claim grounded on such titles cannot but be persuasive to every one to comply with this my earnest will and desire.

(Signed) Lawrence Ricci.
(in his own hand.)

This is the same declaration and protestation which Abbe Lawrence Ricci, late general of the Society of Jesus, repeated and confirmed on the 19th of November, at the time he was going to receive the holy viaticum, before Jesus Christ himself in the blessed sacrament, and in the presence of the vice-governor of the castle of St. Angelo, his Secretary Don Giovanni, Abbe Orlandi, of a serjeant, a corporal, the apothecary, the domestics of the Governor Camillo and Pietruccio, nine soldiers and galley-slaves, all whose names we could mention: these accompanied the blessed sacrament into the chamber where Abbe Ricci lay dangerously ill, but in his perfect senses, and persisting in the same sentiments.

Whoever reads the above declaration without prejudice or passion, cannot but discover, with convincing evidence, the characters of innocence, the language of sincerity, the confidence and security of an upright conscience, with all the moderation enjoined by the Christian religion.

Remarkable Story of Mr. Dryden.

MR. Dryden, with all his understanding, was weak enough to be fond of judicial astrology, and used to calculate the nativity of his children.—When his wife was in labour with his son Charles, he, being told it was decent to withdraw, laid his watch on the table, begging one of the company then present, in a most solemn manner, to take exact notice of the very minute the child was born; which she did, and acquainted him with it. About a week after, when his wife was pretty well recovered, Mr. Dryden took occasion to tell her that he had been calculating the child's nativity; and observed, with grief, that he was born in an evil hour; for Jupiter, Venus, and the sun, were all under the earth, and the lord of his ascendant afflicted with a hateful square of Mars and Saturn. "If he lives to arrive at the eighth year," says he, "he will go near to die a violent death on his very birth day; but, if he should escape, as I see but small hopes, he will, in the twenty-twenty-third year, be under the very same evil direction; and, if he should escape that also, the thirty-third or thirty-fourth year is, I fear"—here he was interrupted by the immoderate grief of his wife, who could no longer hear calamity prophesied to befall her son.—The time at last came, and August was the inauspicious month in which young Dryden was to enter into the eighth year of his age. The court being in progress, and Mr. Dryden at leisure, he was invited to the country-seat of the earl of Berkshire, his brother-in-law, to keep the long vacation with him at Charlton in Wilts; his wife was invited to her uncle Mordaunt's, to pass the remainder of the summer. When they came, to divide the children, lady Elizabeth would have him take John, and suffer her to take Charles; but Mr. Dryden was too absolute, and they parted in anger; he took Charles with him, and she was obliged to be content with John. When the fatal day came, the anxiety of the mother's spirits occasioned such an effervescence of blood, as threw her into so violent a fever, that her life was despaired of, till a letter came from Mr. Dryden, reproving her for her womanish credulity, and assuring her that her child was well, which recovered her spirits, and in six weeks after the received an eclairecissement of the whole affair.—Mr. Dryden, either through fear of being reckoned superstitious, or thinking it a science beneath his study, was extremely cautious of letting any one know that he was a dealer in astrology; therefore could not excuse his absence, on his son's anniversary, from a general hunting-match lord Berkshire had made, to which all the adjacent gentlemen were invited. When he went out he took care to set the boy a double exercise in the Latin tongue, which he taught his children himself, with a strict charge not to stir out of the room till his return; well knowing the tale he had left him would take up longer time. Charles was performing his duty, in obedience to his father; but, as ill fate would have it, the flag made towards the house; and, the noise alarming the servants, they hastened out to see the sport. One of them took young Dryden by the hand, and led him out to see it also; when, just as they came to the gate, the flag, being at bay with the dogs, made a bold push, and leaped over the court wall, which was very low and very old; the dogs, following, threw down a part of the wall, ten yards in length, under which Charles Dryden lay buried. He was immediately dug out, and, after six weeks languishing in a dangerous way, he recovered; so far Dryden's prediction was fulfilled.

In the twenty-third year of his age, Charles fell from the top of an old tower, belonging to the Vatican at Rome, occasioned by a swimming in his head, with which he was seized, the heat of the day being excessive: he again recovered, but was ever after in a languishing sickly state. In the thirty-third year of his age, being returned to England, he was unhappily drowned at Windsor. He had, with another gentleman, swam twice over the Thames; but, returning a third time, it was supposed he was taken with the cramp, because he called out for help, though too late.—Thus the father's calculation proved but too prophetic.

Dr. Rowley's Medical Advice to the Army and Navy going to America.

IN the conveyance of the troops in the transports, the sea diseases are to be considered; and the observations delivered in this part, are intended for the use of the navy in general.

For the first fourteen days of the voyage there is most commonly little or no sickness, except the vomiting which the motions of the ship occasion to those who are unaccustomed to sailing; this is however of little consequence*. Soon after, and sometimes before this period, a considerable change in the diet of the seamen commences; wine or spirits are served to the ships company instead of small beer; of wine each man is allowed a pint in the day, of rum or brandy half a pint, which last is diluted with a considerable quantity of water, and the liquor thus united is called grog. Thro' necessity salt provisions are the diet. Neither this diet, nor the liquor, produce diseases, unless the water should be very putrid; but this is too common, not only in transports, but likewise in our men of war. It may be sweetened in the following manner:

After the butts are hoisted out of the hold, let the water contained in them be pumped out with a hand pump, from one vessel into another, and let this be frequently repeated for two or three days before it is put into the scuttle butts for

N O T E.

* For sea sickness, abstinence from fluids is proper; a little magnetia may be taken; but keeping on the deck is the most effectual manner.

the use of the ships company. It is common to quench hot iron in the water, which may likewise be useful; but above all things, agitating the water in the open air, is the most effectual means of sweetening it; simple however as this operation is, it is generally neglected.

The putrid water will sometimes, in hot climates, occasion fevers of the malignant kind, and fluxes; and by the sea air, through the imprudence of the men sleeping on the deck, are pleuritis and peripneumonies produced. The first sometimes degenerate into intermittents, and the latter seldom prove fatal, if judiciously treated.

It is a common practice to keep the sick on board a man of war in that part which is called the bay. In cold climates this situation may be proper, but in the hot countries, nothing can be more prejudicial; more men have been lost thro' this injudicious management, than by the violence of the most malignant diseases. It is necessary therefore, in order to cure the sick in ships, to consider the heat or cold; and to beg leave of the commander to admit the sick to lie in the most commodious airy place, if necessary; for a free circulation of air, above all other things, is a remedy in putrid and malignant diseases; it prevents in a great measure the infection spreading, and greatly assists in the operation of medicines."

The doctor then proceeds to enumerate the diseases which are most predominant at sea and in America, with the method of cure. He afterwards gives some general remarks on the cleanliness of ships, the proper places for the sick, &c.

"The place called the bay, says he, can only be compared to a cellar where there is little or no circulation of pure air; a number of sick lie close together, amidst the stench arising from the diseases, and the putrid exhalations of the patients' evacuations. It is generally dark, and its cleanliness in many ships seldom inspected into; though this and a fresh air, above all other things, is necessary for the recovery of patients in the generality of fevers, and many other disorders.

In cold countries, or in the European climates, this inconvenience is not so immediately felt as in hot countries. In the first, the disorders that happen are slow in their effects; in the summer months, in the West-Indies and America, the fevers, fluxes, and other complaints, destroy patients in a few days, and most commonly terminate by a putrid state of the whole habit. Whatever is done by medicine, must be effected immediately, or the patient dies. It therefore becomes a principal object with those who have the care of the sick, to unite all the means that art can suggest to save the patient's life; amongst these, no one is so necessary as a good air. But this cannot be procured as things are now ordered; and thus many brave soldiers and sailors become the devoted victims to bad management, inattention, or an obstinate perseverance in old customs. To remedy this evil, a concurrence of the captain and superior officers of a ship is necessary. Under the half deck the working of a ship is an objection; under the fore-castle is the galley fire, therefore these places are improper. In frigates, the main hatchway births, where the ballast ports are fixed, would be the most eligible situation for the sick in infectious complaints; or under the booms, between the fore and main hatchway, in the place vulgarly called no man's land. In large ships, any part where the ports are open on both sides, would be much better than the bay. There can be little or no objection to this alteration, so essentially necessary for saving the lives of the sickly seamen; except that it deprives the armourer, and some few petty officers of the births they are accustomed to on board of frigates: in larger ships, I can see no reason whatever for not complying with this useful plan, unless there should be a greater number of men sick, than the places could contain.

It sometimes happens, that a putrid fever of the most malignant kind, shall arise from the smell of the bilge water, that lies at the bottom of the ship; it is rendered very fetid from the soft loom and muddy parts of the ballast; and the filthy things thrown down by the ships company. Going into the hold, will commonly change bright silver to a black colour. In the pumping up this putrid water, in order to discharge it from the ship, in hot countries, the men who work at the pump will be taken sometimes with a giddiness, fall down on the deck, be seized with a vomiting, pain in the head, and violent fever; which proves fatal in a few days. I have known this disorder to become infectious in the West India and American harbours; and those who attended such patients, have been seized with the disorder, and most frequently lost their lives. With proper medical assistance many may be saved; but medical skill in these cases, unless assisted by a free circulation of air, will avail nothing. Some

Some Account of Sharpers.

THE greatest security of our safety and property, and principal safeguard against villainy, is a thorough knowledge of the various tricks practised by sharpers of all denominations, to ensnare and defraud the unwary. In the course of our design, every trick, fraud and piece of chicanery, made use of by the most subtle and celebrated cheats, shall be amply displayed. Old tricks are stale, and universally known. It therefore only remains to warn the innocent and incautious against some fraudulent practices of a more modern date.

As there is something extremely curious in an affair which happened a few years since, when I was at Paris, I shall relate it, since an example of a vicious transaction in one metropolis may be beneficial to another; and one kingdom may be productive of facts, which another may profit by.

A gentleman, one evening pretty late, passing over the Pont Neuf, or New Bridge, with a lanthorn in his hand, was accosted by a strange man, in a manner rather polite and seemingly suppliant, who requested him to read a paper which, he said, he had that moment picked up, and did not know but what it might be of consequence; the gentleman, in holding up his lanthorn, in order to read the paper, had likewise an opportunity of surveying the person, and features of the person who had accosted him, which he did with some attention.

In the paper, he found a few lines, which I have translated as literally as the idiom of the two languages would admit.

Speak not a word when this you've read,
Or in an instant you'll be dead;
Give up your money, watch, and rings,
Or other valuable things:
Depart then quickly as you will,
Only remember silence still.

The gentleman, considering his situation, and the purport of the threat contained in the paper, thought it most prudent to continue silent, and to act as it directed—he accordingly delivered his watch, rings, money, &c. but, at the same time, renewed his survey of the person to whom he gave them—and was so minute in his scrutiny, that he fancied he could at any time swear to him.

The man was soon after apprehended for a riot, and, on his way to the justice was perceived by the gentleman, to whom he had presented the paper, who accompanied him to the magistrate, and exhibited an account of the before-mentioned occurrence against him; he was for want of proper proof, respecting the riot, acquitted of that affair, but was sent to prison, on account of the gentleman's accusation.

When he was brought to the bar to take his trial, he appeared quite unconcerned, and pleaded not guilty with the greatest confidence; the gentleman, who was the only evidence that could be produced, swore positively to the fact, and to the identity of his person.

When he came to make his defence, he thus addressed the bench.

“My lords, I confess on the evening specified, I did meet this gentleman on Pont Neuf, and the transaction, as he has related it very exactly, passed between us; but in the affair, I am far from having been guilty of any ill intention—It is my misfortune not to be able to read: I picked up the paper just before I met the gentleman; I thought perhaps it might be of consequence. Seeing the gentleman, and judging from his appearance that he might be able to read: observing likewise the convenience of his having a lanthorn in his hand, I requested that he would do me the favour to read the paper—he complied—and after reading it to himself, to my great surprize, he put his rings, watch and money into my hands: I was so astonished, that I had not the power to enquire into the contents of the paper, or to follow him for an explanation of his actions—afterwards, on reflection, I imagined the paper must have been of great value, and that he had given me his rings, watch and money, in order to get rid of me, and to keep to himself what was far more considerable in worth.—Thus, if any one hath been wronged, I think it is myself, and I hope justice will be done me.”

By this bold and artful defence, and the notoriety of his not having made any formal demand on the gentleman, he got off scot-free—for he was acquitted; though the whole court was pretty conscious of his being the guilty person.

There are in town a set of sharpers called the amorous bilks—these blades, who are in general, handsome, and particularly study a polite and insinuating behaviour, have met with great success. They make it their business, about the season, when the quality and gentry quit the bustle of the town for the more calm and serene enjoyment of rural felicity, to get acquainted with the maid servants who happen to be left in the house ; this is easily effected, for those silly girls in general are intoxicated with pride, and the thoughts of dress and pleasure : therefore the name of a gentleman, joined to an agreeable person, is secure of success.

When the sharper finds the thoughtless girl is prepossessed in his favour, he tells her in confidence, which is another sure method of conciliating her affections, that he is heir to a large fortune—but is at present unluckily under the displeasure of his father, who is a very obstinate opinionated old gentleman ; but an aunt, who is passionately fond of him, and has great sway with the old gentleman, is daily working for a reconciliation, which he has no manner of doubt will be speedily and happily brought about.

The simple girl swallows this as matter of fact—and familiarities encreasing, under the sanction of a promise of marriage, the sharper either gains possession of her person, or insinuates himself so far into her affections, as to borrow all the ready money she happens to have by her, and even makes her strain her credit in the neighbourhood, to supply him—at the same time, promising a return of the whole as soon as he is reconciled to his father, which he is certain will happen before the return of the family to town.

Being acquainted with every part of the house, he informs his companions where the plate or other valuables lie—at the time appointed, when they are to commit their depredations, if he has already enjoyed the person of the girl, he takes care to lie with her that night—but if her virtue hath hitherto been impregnable to his assaults, in the evening, when it is time for him to retire, he is taken suddenly so extremely ill, that the deluded girl, in the height of compassion, will not suffer him to hazard himself in the street, while he is so much indisposed : he stays accordingly all night, and in the mean time his confederates break into the house, and rob it without interruption—for it is the business of the inmate sharper to prevent the girl from alarming the neighbourhood, by pretending to be extremely frightened himself, and telling her, that if they make the least noise, they shall surely be murdered by the thieves.

The simple girl seeing a man so much terrified, remains as still as a mouse, to avoid danger, and the rogues carry off their booty unmolested.

Having stripped both the house and the person left to take care of it, the sharper shifts his quarters, and insinuates himself into the good graces of the next longing maiden, who is credulous enough to believe his tales.

One of these rogues left the following lines behind him when he decamped, to amuse his deluded innamorata at her leisure hours.

The learned in every age have thought,
That wisdom is the best when bought :
Experience teaches more to fools,
Than all the lessons of the schools :
With caution use your ears and eyes,
And give me thanks who made you wise.

I hope this will caution many girls from too precipitately encouraging strangers, and I flatter myself, that the repeated misfortunes that maid-servants have met with, will deter many from listening to the addresses of those above their own rank, or from fancying that a gentleman will descend so low as to marry a cook-maid or chamber-maid, unless he has some peculiar ends of his own to serve.

To go upon the mace is another modern practice, but we hope it has pretty well had its day, for the late considerable failures hath rendered paper credit extremely precarious.

Upon the mace system many sharpeners have lolled at ease in their chariots—It is performed by confederacy—sometimes there are twelve, or even twenty in a gang—two or three of them, of a polite address, live in elegant houses, and appear as men of fortune ; by which means they deceive the unwary traders ; they give notes of hand to each other, which are indorsed by so many names, as to make them appear extremely respectable ; the seeming eligibility of their situation, and the confident manner in which they pay away the note, frequently procure them both goods and ready cash by way of change, from the unwary tradesman.

The Impatient Lover : A Dramatic Tale.

LYSANDER was a young gentleman of considerable fortune, and had, in consequence of his interest at court obtained a very considerable post in the war-office. He had long loved an amiable girl, called Orphisa, whose guardian Sir Gregory Grove, intended to marry to his nephew, who had acquired a large estate by his rapacious proceedings, while in the East-India company's service, at Bengal. Orphisa soon perceived how much more likely she was to be happy with with Lyfander than young Grove, and, consequently, could not avoid shewing a partiality in his favour. Sir Gregory, however, insisted on her receiving the addressees of his kinsman, and absolutely forbid Lyfander his house.

After the lovers had carried on a secret intercourse for some months, Mr. Grove disoblged his uncle so much, from an ill-timed opposition to his political principles, that the old gentlemen declared he would leave Orphisa to her own inclinations, and no longer support the interest of a man who had treated him with rudeness and ingratitude.

Lyfander was soon made acquainted with this agreeable circumstance, and was exceedingly happy at receiving a billet from his mistress, appointing to meet him in the gardens of the palace at Hampton-court, the next afternoon, where she hoped to point out to him such measures as would immediately produce the union they so much wished for.

Full of the most pleasing expectations, the anxious lover flew to the garden, attended only by his trusty servant Trim. They traversed the walks for some time, when, approaching an elegant jet d'eau, Lyfander was suddenly struck with the sight of Orphisa, who, to his utmost astonishment, appeared in earnest conversation with his rival. The extraordinary situation surprised him so much, that he stood for some moments in a torpid state. He was awaked from his insensibility by Trim's observing that Mr. Grove and the lady were got out of sight, having retired into a shady walk that led to the palace. Lyfander, impatient to have this phenomenon explained to him, immediately pursued Orphisa.

He had not proceeded many steps before he was met by Sir Gregory, whom he could not resist addressing upon the occasion. He found in the course of conversation, that his mistress had been greatly mistaken in supposing the old knight was inclined to leave the choice of a husband to herself, or that his resentment at his nephew's conduct had not intirely subsided. He abruptly left Sir Gregory, determining at least to let the young lady see he had obeyed her summons.

As the afternoon was extremely fine, the gardens were crowded with company, and Lyfander was too well known in the gay world not to meet a number of acquaintance, whose unseasonable attentions in the most provoking manner prevented the accomplishment of his design. Lord Revel suddenly embraced him with great warmth: "My dear friend," said he, "I am happy to see you; I had the most damnable luck last night that ever was known. Harry Shuffle won two hundred pieces of me by a coup de main, it plagues me ever since yesterday. I'll tell you the case. I wanted but two, Harry wanted a pique: I deal, he takes fix, and demands to deal over again: I, seeing myself almost up, would not consent to it. I go out ace of clubs (do but admire my misfortune) the ace, king, knave, ten, and eight of hearts; and throw out, as my policy was to go for point, queen and king of diamonds, ten and queen of spades. To my five hearts that I went out I took in also the queen, which made me exactly a quint major: But my gentleman with the ace, not without my extreme surprise, spreads upon the table a fixieme of low diamonds. I had thrown out the king, with the queen of the same; but, he missing of his pique, I recovered my fright, and thought certainly I should make at least bare two tricks. With the seven diamonds he had four spades."

Distracted with this jargon, Lyfander broke from the dissipated peer, and pursued his walk, execrating the impertinence of his titled friend. But he had not measured many steps before he was attacked by lady Louisa Languish and Miss Simper: "Dear Lyfander," cried the former, seizing his arm, "I rejoice to see you. You are a man of sentiment, and can settle a dispute this perverse girl has maintained with me. She will have it a jealous lover pleases more than a respectful one. Now, for my part, Lyfander, I detest those jealous-pated fellows, whose love resembles hatred, and who, by way of all respect and gentle addressees, never apply themselves to any thing but being troublesome; whose minds, being ever prompted by a gloomy passion, busy themselves in converting the least of our actions into a crime; subject our innocence to their blindness, and want to have us explain upon the least glance of an eye; who, perceiving in us any appearance of sadness, presently complain it arises from their presence; and, when the least joy brightens up in our eyes, will have their rivals to be at the bottom of it: In short, fellows, who, taking privilege from the fury of their love, never speak to us but with a design to pick a quarrel; they presume to forbid every-body approaching us, and set themselves up for tyrants over their very conquerors. The lovers for me are such as respect inspires, and their submission is a surer mark of our power.'

Lyfander was going to reply to lady Languish, when Miss Simper, with astonishing volubility, took the other side of the argument, in words to this effect: 'Dear lady Languish, talk not to me of those persons, as true lovers, who feel no manner of transport for us: those luke-warm gallants, whose peaceable hearts reckon already upon all things as sure in their favour; have no fear of losing us, and, through too great confidence, suffer their love, at every turn, to fall asleep; have a good intelligence with their rivals, and leave them a clear stage to push their point. A lover so sedate raises my choler; not to be jealous is loving with indifference; and I would have a lover to convince me of his passion, float on eternal suspicions; one who, by his hasty transports, gives a glaring token of the esteem he has for her to whom he makes his pretensions. One then applauds one's-self for his disquiet; and, if he sometimes treats us in too rude a manner, the pleasure of seeing him on his knees before us, to excuse himself for the violence of his passion, his tears, his vexation for having displeased us, are a charm sufficient to appease all our anger.'

Unable to bear this impertinence any longer, Lyfander hastily broke from the ladies, declaring he would take time to consider of their different opinions, and transmit his thoughts to them upon the subject. He hurried along the walk in great agitation, and at length came within sight of the object of his wishes, when he was familiarly accosted by colonel Kilworth, an Irish gentleman, with whom he had been a short time acquainted: 'Whither so fast, Lyfander,' said the officer.—'I have business of the utmost importance to communicate to you.'—'Any other time, my good friend,' replied the impatient lover, walking briskly on. 'No time like the present,' returned the colonel; 't'is an affair of honour, and you must listen to it. Do you know, Sir, that young Grove seeks your life? That he has commissioned a friend of mine to carry a message to you? And you will, no doubt, have occasion for a second: I hope you mean to make use of me for that purpose.'—'Pray, Sir,' cried Lyfander, 'let me see you here half an hour hence; at present I have business of the greatest moment.'—'Ay, ay, I know it, I know it,' said the military man, 'but you shall go no-where without me:

I'll follow you, my jewel, to the end of the world.'

Lyfander was almost distracted at the troublesome kindness of the honest soldier, and finding all attempts in vain to shake him off, suffered him to accompany him to the end of the walk, where they saw Sir Gregory, Mr. Grove, and Orphisa, leave the gardens, and go off in the knight's carriage.

Lyfander threw himself into his post-chaise (after giving his honour to the colonel he would call upon him, as his second, if he received a challenge) and drove to town, exceedingly out of humour at the ridiculous disappointments he had met with.

On his arrival in London he received a letter from Orphisa, in which her appearance with his rival in the gardens was accounted for, by her informing him a reconciliation had taken place between Sir Gregory and Mr. Grove; and that, hearing she was gone towards Hampton-court, they had followed and overtook her, just as she had reached the gardens. Orphisa lamented the not being able to converse with him, as Sir Gregory was more positive than ever in insisting upon her immediately marrying his nephew, and concluded with requesting to see her lover at ten o'clock that evening.

Lyfander waited with the utmost impatience for the hour of assignation, when he proceeded to Sir Gregory's house, and continued walking some time before the door, in expectation her woman would give him admittance. While he was in this state of suspense, he was suddenly attacked by three men, from one of whom he received a slight wound in the back; he turned round with the utmost agility, and, being an excellent swordsman, pressed upon his assailants with so much vigour, that they gave ground: At this instant a stranger drew in defence of the injured gentleman, and ran one of the ruffians through the thigh, when his companions took to their heels, and were presently out of sight.

Sir Gregory's servants being alarmed, the wounded man was brought into the hall, where he confessed himself a soldier in the foot-guards. 'Ay, by St. Patrick he is,' cried the stranger, who was now discovered to be colonel Kilworth, 'and one of my own company too. My dear Lyfander, I heartily congratulate you upon your escape: I suspected no good, and, if I had not stuck close to you all this evening, I am afraid this fellow and his comrades would have made short work with you.'

diate satisfaction. Our hero was unprovided for the conflict, and desired time for an eclaircissement; the Don prevailed upon to allow him till daylight, when finding the imposition his dear dulcinea had put upon him, he judged a draft upon his banker would be more acceptable to the count than a challenge, and in this respect he was not deceived.

Returning to his native country, cloyed with foreign beauties and foreign artifice, he found that the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, might afford him sufficient variety, without again crossing the Alps, or passing the Pyrenees. Indeed, here were toasts of almost every nation upon earth. The French filles de joye, the Italian courtesan, the Spanish demi-rep, were all to be met with at the marts of beauty in this metropolis.

The captain for some time revelled in the charms of a certain Hibernian toast, whose character has, even till now, been equivocal, and who was married to a north country baronet, more eminent for his fortune than his intellects and discernment. This lady had flattered herself, that her charms and rhetoric would have been sufficient to induce Ned to give her his hand in an honourable way; but when she found her mistake, she took a laconic leave in a laconic billet.

"You have, dear Sir, been pleased to tell me repeatedly that I have made you too happy; be then at least so generous as to let that happiness remain concealed, or I shall be the most miserable wretch upon earth. In a word, I have the offer of the hand of Sir John —; he is unacquainted with any of my faux pas, and nothing can prevent the match but the discovery of them."

It cannot be supposed that a man so very happy and fortunate with the ladies, should entirely escape the attention of those who wanted to fix him for life. The Irish beauty was no object to him either in point of rank or fortune; but a ducal coronet had its charms, and a dowager duchess, with an ample fortune, prevailed with a lieutenant of the guards to yield to her honourable embraces. Tunbridge Wells was the place where he was first introduced to this amorous amiable dowager, and a very short courtship terminated the treaty*.

Through her grace's interest, he not only rose in the army, but obtained a peerage, after being invested with a ribbon. From this period, till very lately, his lordship's intrigues have made no great eclat. But his natural disposition for variety has again displayed itself. We have already mentioned his affaires with some grizettes of various complexions, we now come to the heroine of these pages.

Soon after Signiora G—b—li made her appearance at the opera, his lordship was a spectator and auditor of her performance. Her personal charms, added to her extraordinary vocal abilities, made such an impression on him, that in vain he sought relief at every feraglio in town. These mercenary Thais's did but add fuel to the fire by comparison—the lovely, the enchanting, the bewitching G—b—li was constantly before his eyes: the object even in his arms was invisible and insipid.

As length, resolved to try every stratagem, he employed an eminent Italian pimp, well known at the Orange coffee-house, to make proposals to her. The answer he brought to his lordship was, that lord S—, lord M—, and lord G—, had made her offers so advantageous, that she did not know which to accept of; but that the highest bidder was the buyer. His lordship, distracted with fondness, bid for the enchantress beyond all his rivals, and had her. Fame nevertheless whispers, that his lordship's rivals were, in fact, his predecessors; and that, strongly convinced as his lordship is of her fidelity, she can, at least, warble to an humble admirer at her toilette, or her ruelle. A late duel on her account, strongly corroborates this opinion, which, however, we leave to our readers judgment to determine.

We shall only add a few anecdotes that we have obtained, concerning the former part of her life. Her parents were of mean extraction in Italy, and having a numerous family, readily con-

so much talked of as a certain Duchess, who has lately brought together one of the greatest and most brilliant crowds in Europe, has been celebrated for her political intrigues; and it is said, that far back as the administration of Sir Robert Walpole, she was the means of obtaining some secrets that made a great noise in the political world at that period.

sented to her being under a music-master of eminence, who approved of her voice and figure. After she had attained a competent knowledge of music, she sung in public, and met with approbation. Finding the recompence she received not equal to what she might expect in foreign countries, she emigrated in pursuit of riches. In France she was well received, and met with encouragement; but a proposal being made her to come over to England, she accepted of it, and received a very considerable salary. In Italy she had made some captives, as well by her singing as her personal attractions; in Germany she had made more; in Russia she was caressed even by the Czarina; but in England she has been an universal toast among the beau monde, ever since she has appeared, and no man is more envied for his good fortune than lord B—.

If, however, we may judge from his lordship's natural versatile disposition, this connexion will not last many months; in the mean while Signiora G—b—lli makes the most of him, and is the first woman who ever had him entirely at her devotion.

A Letter of Expostulation to a Lady on her Marriage.

YOUR passion, my dear Mrs. , was to be rich, you married a man you despised, and whose intrinsic worth is centered in his wealth: which gave charms even to deformity, transformed Hymen into Mammon, and the god of love into a satyr. Content yourself then with wealth, enjoy it, cultivate your taste for those advantages it can produce; and let these console you for the loss of every thing you have sacrificed for it. Have recourse to the principles of your determination: you had other offers; you have therefore examined, compared, chosen, and regretted. Be firm to this decision of your own judgment, and do not act inconsistently, by repining that you do not possess what you did not purchase. If the vices, if the follies of your husband, should become every day more and more intolerable to you, it will be in vain to regret the tranquility, the peace, the tender affection, endearing attention, or confidential intercourse, which might have distinguished your days, had you been united to a man of merit. In the height of your despair, you exclaim! "Was it for this, my amiable mother nurtured me with such care, and cultivated in me, every idea replete with honour, enlivened by sentiment, and corrected with tenderness? Alas! these embellishments do now but add to my misery, in rendering me more sensible of the wretchedness of my state. The man I am chained to, is so far from possessing sensibility or taste, that he is dead to every impression of merit; and modesty, which might have endeared me to a man of delicacy, renders me hateful to this libertine; who by the indecency of his discourse, is continually offending against the sensations of a virtuous mind. While I regret the loss of intellectual enjoyment, my regret is strengthened by the direful effects of its privation on him. Mutual esteem is as necessary in a married state, as mutual affection; neither of which I enjoy. What is pomp, equipage, or splendor, compared with such seraphic sensations dwelling in the human heart? Will the blaze of diamonds atone for the deficiency of this passion? Will the gold of Ophir, melted into one mass, weigh against the raptures of uniting hearts, warmed with sentiment and truth?"

As this man's character was known before you married him, can you have now any just reason of complaint, especially as you have not even the excuse of partiality to plead for his person? Recollect your own sordid selfish views; prevailing passion has been gratified, and you will pardon me, for questioning whether you would relinquish the advantages of your wealth, to be restored again to your liberty. Miss Aikin favours us with the following passage from one of Lucian's dialogues. "Jupiter complains to Cupid, that though he had so many intrigues, he was never sincerely beloved: in order to be beloved, says Cupid, you must lay aside your ægis and your thunderbolts; you must curl and perfume your hair, place a garland on your head, and walk with a soft step, and assume a winning obsequious deportment." "But replied Jupiter, I am not willing to resign so much of my dignity." "Then, returns Cupid, leave off desiring to be loved." He wanted to be Jupiter and Adonis at the same time: as you to be rich and happy. What right had you to expect that a miracle was to be performed in your favour? You knew well that the wretch to whom you have allied yourself, forsook humanity, and every genial feeling of an upright and honest heart, in the acquisition of that fortune, which you wished to possess, and have obtained, and which has since pampered the vices which which disgust you. If he enumerates the spoils of his victories in —, are they not covered with the blood of the vanquished? Did he give peace and happiness to the conquered? Did he accept the gifts of their princes, to use them for the comfort of those whose fathers, sons, or husbands, were massacred? Did he use his power to gain security and freedom to the regions of oppression and slavery? Did he endear the British name by examples of generosity? Did he return with the consciousness of his duty discharged to his country, and humanity to his fellow-creatures? If he was deficient in all this, what manner of right had you to expect tenderness and affection from him? You might with the same propriety look for the sensitive plant in a bed of nettles, and then complain you are stung by them. But you need not be upbraided for the folly of your election, since your own experience is but too severe a monitor. Debasement is the child of pride. All that remains for you now, is to render yourself as easy as possible; it is your duty to soothe the melancholy disposition your husband will be in (when alone) from a recollection of his crimes. Perhaps, by using your influence judiciously, you may yet have it in your power to humanize his passions, and refine his pleasures: but your good sense will tell you that there is so much pride interwoven in the heart of man, that his obstinacy will never condescend to receive any more than a hint from a wife. A husband is more likely to be praised into virtue, than rallied out of vice; and the most essential point in the art of leading others, is to conceal from them that they are led at all. If he reforms, and thinks the world gives him the credit of it, in a short time he will believe it proceeded from his own will and inclinations, which will insure his constancy in it. Every method is laudable on your part, to reclaim your husband, except an affectation of fondness for him: this would be a profanation of love: and a woman capable of such abject deceit, I should look upon as capable of the most determined baseness. If his crimes have hardened him, it will be in vain for you to attempt his reformation: but while you lament his depravity, you are left at liberty to spend your own time as you think proper. The gratifications of society, and the secrecy of solitude, are now equally in your power; please yourself and be content. If gaiety and dissipation are your pursuits; it cannot be denied that they are slight counterpoises for domestic felicity: but as the latter is entirely out of your reach, you should endeavour to make yourself easy. It is your own judgment alone that must lead you to obtaining that tranquillity, which you may possibly find in the exulting joy of succouring virtue in distress, merit in indigence and obscurity; in wiping tears from the eyes of affliction, and in making the widow's heart leap for joy. The serene complacency which springs in a good mind, on the exertion of benevolent principles, cannot be described; like the peace of God, it passeth knowledge. The poet says,

It is a joy possess'd by few indeed!
 Dame Fortune has so many fools to feed,
 She cannot oft afford, with all her store,
 To yield her smiles, where nature smiled before.

To sinking worth a cordial hand to lend;
 With better fortune to surpise a friend:
 To cheer the modest stranger's lonely
 state;

Or snatch an orphan family from fate;
 To do, possess'd with virtue's noblest fire,

Such gen'rous deeds, as we with tears admire.

Armstrong.

Thus you may evince the reality of your feelings, whilst it is in vain for others in less affluent circumstances to manifest their benevolence as they wish. Thus also, may you turn your husband's (ill-acquired) perishable goods of fortune, into real blessings.

Wealth not only gilds the present moments as they pass; but like the sun, constantly supplies those rays which cheerish all on whom they fall, and constitute an uninterrupted series of felicity in the bosom of that person from whom they proceed: whilst, on the contrary, the weight of poverty not only distresses a person for the present, but may perhaps prevent him from emerging into happiness, and others from participating of that benevolence, which warrants the means of exemplifying its sincerity. What must the poor man suffer, when the eye of friendship becomes inverted by his misfortunes in the world, and where he looks in vain around him for the benevolence of sympathy and the consolations of human attachment!

WITH respect to the colonists ; it would be folly to pretend they are faultless. They were running fast into our vices. But this quarrel gives them a salutary check : And it may be permitted on purpose to favour them, and in them the rest of mankind ; by making way for the establishment, in an extensive country possessed of every advantage, of a plan of government, and a growing power that shall astonish the world, and under which every subject of human enquiry shall be open to free discussion, and the friends of liberty, in every quarter of the globe, find a safe retreat from civil and spiritual tyranny.—I hope, therefore, our brethren in America will forgive their enemies. It is certain that they know not what they are doing.

Conclusion.

HAVING said so much of the war with America, and particularly of the danger with which it threatens us, it may be expected that I should propose some method of escaping from this danger, and of restoring this once happy empire to a state of peace and security.—Various plans of pacification have been proposed ; and some of them, by persons so distinguished by their rank and merit, as to be above my applause. But till there is more of a disposition to attend to such plans ; they cannot, I am afraid, be of any great service. And there is too much reason to apprehend, that nothing but calamity will bring us to repentance and wisdom.—In order, however, to complete my design in these observations, I will take the liberty to lay before the public the following sketch of one of the plans just referred to, as it was opened before the holidays to the May, 1776.

house of Lords by the Earl of Shelburne ; who while he held the seals of the Southern department, with the business of the colonies annexed, possessed their confidence, without ever compromising the authority of this country ; a confidence which discovered itself by peace among themselves, and duty and submission to the mother country. I hope I shall not take an unwarrantable liberty, if, on this occasion, I use his lordship's own words, as nearly as I have been able to collect them.

“ Meet the colonies on their own ground, in the last petition from the congress to the king. The surest, as well as the most dignified mode of proceeding for this country.—Suspend all hostilities.—Repeal the acts which immediately distress America, namely, the last restraining act,—the charter act,—the act for the more impartial administration of justice ;—and the Quebec act.—All the other acts (the custom house act, the post office act, &c.) leave to a temperate revival.—There will be found much matter which both countries may wish repealed. Some which can never be given up, the principle being that regulation of trade for the common good of the empire, which forms our Palladium. Other matter which is fair subject of mutual accommodation.—Prescribe the most explicit acknowledgment of our right of regulating commerce in its most extensive sense ; if the petition and other public acts of the colonies have not already, by their declarations and acknowledgments, left it upon a sufficiently secure foundation.—Besides the power of regulating the general commerce of the empire, something further might be expected ; provided a due and tender regard were had to the means and abilities of the several provinces, as well as to those fundamental, unalienable rights of Englishmen, which no father can surrender on the part of his son, no representative on the part of his elector, no generation on the part of the succeeding one ; the right of judging not only of the mode of raising, but the quantum, and the appropriation of such aids as they shall grant.—To be more explicit ; the debt of England, without entering into invidious distinctions how it came to be contracted, might be acknowledged the debt of every individual part of the whole empire, Asia, as well as America, included.—Provided, that full security were held forth to them, that such free aids, together with the sinking fund (Great Britain contributing her superior share) should not be left as the privy purse purse to the minister, but be unalienably appropriated to the original intention of that fund, the discharge of the debt ;—and that by an honest application of the whole fund, the taxes might in time be lessened, and the price of our manufactures consequently reduced, so that every contributory part might feel the returning benefit—always supposing the laws of trade duly observed and enforced.

“ The time was, I am confident—and perhaps is, when these points might be obtained upon the easy, the constitutional, and, therefore, the indispensable terms of an exemption from parliamentary taxation, and an admission of the sacredness of their charters ; instead of sacrificing their good humour, their affection, their effectual aids, and the act of navigation itself, (which you are now in the direct road to do) for a commercial quit-rent, * or a barren metaphysical chimæra.—How long these ends may continue attainable, no man can tell.—But if no words are to be relied on except such as make against the colonies ; if nothing is acceptable, except what is attainable by force ; it only remains to apply, what has been so often remarked of unhappy periods,—Quos Deus vult, &c.”

These are sentiments and proposals of the last importance ; and I am very happy in being able to give them to the public from so respectable an authority, as that of the distinguished peer I have mentioned ; to whom, I know, this kingdom, as well as America, is much indebted for his zeal to promote those grand public points on which the preservation of liberty among us depends ; and for the firm opposition which, jointly with many others (noblemen and commoners of the first character and abilities,) he has made to the present measures.

N O T E.

* See the resolutions on the Nova-Scotia petition, reported to the house of commons, November 29, 1775, by lord North, lord George Germaine, &c. and a bill ordered to be brought in upon the said resolutions.—There is indeed, as lord Shelburne has hinted, something very astonishing in these resolutions. They offer a relaxation of the authority of this country, in points to which the colonies have always consented, and by which we are great gainers ; at the same time, that, with a rigour which hazards the empire, we are maintaining its authority in points to which they will never consent ; and by which nothing can be gained.

Had such a plan as that now proposed been adopted a few months ago, I have little doubt but that a pacification would have taken place, on terms highly advantageous to this kingdom.—In particular. It is probable, that the colonies would have consented to grant an annual supply, which, increased by a saving of the money now spent in maintaining troops among them, and by contributions which might have been gained from other parts of the empire, would have formed a fund considerable enough, if unalienably applied, † to redeem the greatest part of the public debt ; in consequence of which, agreeably to lord Shelburne's ideas, some of our worst taxes might have been taken off, and the colonies would receive our manufactures cheaper ; our paper currency might be restrained ; our whole force would be free to meet at any time foreign danger ; the influence of the crown would be reduced ; our parliament would become more independent ; and the kingdom might, perhaps, be restored to a situation of permanent safety and prosperity.

To conclude.—An important revolution in the affairs of this kingdom seems to be approaching. If ruin is not to be our lot, all that has been lately done must be undone, and new measures adopted. At that period, an opportunity (never perhaps to be recovered, if lost) will offer itself for serving essentially this country, as well as America ; by putting the national debt into a fixed course of payment ; by subjecting to new regulations the administration of the finances ; and establishing measures for exterminating corruption and restoring the constitution—For my own part ; if this is not to be the consequence of any future changes in the ministry, and the system of corruption, lately so much improved, is to go on ; I think it totally indifferent to the kingdom who are in, or who are out of power.

I have given the navy debt as it was about a year ago. It must be now greatly increased.—The civil list debt has been given by guess. It is generally reckoned not to be less than the sum I have specified; and it is also expected, that the civil list income will be raised to

* Not in the London Edition of this work.

900,000*l.* per annum.—In 1769 the sum of 513,511*l.* was granted by parliament towards discharging the arrears and debts then due on the civil list.

By an act of the first of George II. the civil list was to be made up 800,000*l.* whenever, in any year, the duties and revenues appropriated to it fell short of that sum. The clear produce of these duties for 33 years, or from Midsummer 1727, to Midsummer 1760, was, according to a particular account in my possession, 26,182,981*l.* 17*8.* 6*d.* or 795,242*l.* per ann. They fell short, therefore, taking one year with another, more than they exceeded.—In 1747, they had been deficient for seven years together; and the whole deficiency amounted to 456,733*l.* 16*s.*—which, in conformity to the act I have mentioned, was made good to his majesty out of the supplies for that year.—In 1729 also, 115,000*l.* were granted out of the supplies for the like reason.—This is all the money, received by his late majesty from parliament, towards supporting his household and the dignity of his civil government; or 810,749 per ann.—I have thought proper to state this matter so particularly here; because accounts grossly wrong have been given of it.

The amount of the national debt it has appeared, was last year a hundred and thirty seven millions.—The great deficiencies of last year, added to the extraordinary expences of the present year, will increase this debt considerably.—Drawing out, embodying, and maintaining the militia in the last war, cost the nation near half a million per ann.—We cannot reckon upon a less expence in doing this now. Add to it, pay for foreign troops, and all the extraordinary expences of our increased navy and army, transport service, recruiting service, ordnance, &c. and it will be evident that the whole expence of this unhappy year must be enormous.—But I expect that care will be taken to hide it, by funding as little as possible, and that for this reason it will not be known in its full magnitude, till it comes to appear another year under the articles of navy debt, extraordinaries of the army, transport bills, ordnance debentures, &c. making up a vast unfunded debt which may bear down all public credit.

222,339l.

Total

10,000,000l.

The annual medium of the payments into the Exchequer from the customs in England, for the last five years, has been 2,521,769l. In 1774 this payment was 2,547,717l.—In 1775, it was 2,476,302l.—The produce of the customs, therefore, has been given rather too high.

The produce of the excises in England has been higher in 1772 and 1775 than in any other two years; but the average of any three successive years, or of all the five years since 1770, will not differ much from the sum I have given.—In 1754, or the year before the last war, the customs produced only 1,558,254l.—The excises produced 2,819,702l.—And the whole revenue, exclusive of the land tax at 2s. was

The estimate for the peace establishment, including miscellaneous expences, amounted in 1775 to 3,703,476l.—In 1774 it amounted to 3,804,452l. exclusive of 250,000l. raised by exchequer bills, towards defraying the expence of calling in the gold coin.—And the medium for eleven years, from 1765, has been nearly 3,700,000l.—According to the accounts which I have collected, the expences of the peace establishment (including miscellaneous expences) was in 1765, 1766, and 1767, 3,540,000l. per ann.—In 1768, 1769 and 1770, it was 3,354,000l. per ann.—In 1771, 1772, 1773, 1774, and 1775, the average has been nearly four millions per ann.—exclusive of the expence of calling in the coin.

The parliament votes for the sea service 4l. per month per man, including wages, wear and tear, victuals and ordnance. This allowance is insufficient, and falls short every year more or less, in proportion to the number of men voted. From hence, in a great measure, arises that annual increase of the navy debt, mentioned in the third article of the national expenditure. This increase in 1772 and 1773 was 669,996l. or 335,000l. per ann. The number of men voted in those two years, was 20,000. I have supposed them reduced to 16,000, and the annual increase of the navy debt to be only 250,000l.—Add 100,000l. for the annual increase of the civil list debt, and the total will be 350,000l.

A Second Method of deducing the Surplus of the Revenue.

Unappropriated Revenue.

Nett produce of the sinking fund, for the last five years, including casual surplusses, reckoned from Lady-day to Lady-day; being the annual medium, after deducing from it about 45,000l. always carried to it from the supplies, in order to replace so much taken from it every year to make good a deficiency in a fund established in 1758

2,610,759

1,800,000

N. B. These two taxes in 1773, brought in only 1,665,475l.

There are some casual receipts not included in the sinking fund, such as duties on Gum Senega, American revenue, &c. But they are so uncertain and inconsiderable, that it is scarcely proper to give them as a part of the permanent revenue. Add however on this account

50,000l.

Total of unappropriated * revenue

£. 4,460,759

Produce of the Sinking Fund, reckoned from Lady-day to Lady-day.

1770 — 2,486,836l.

1771 — 2,553,505l.

1772 — 2,683,831l.

1773 — 2,823,150l.

1774 — 2,731,476l.

In 1775 the sinking fund was taken for 2,000,000l. including an extraordinary charge of 100,000l. on the aggregate Fund. If there has been a deficiency, it is a debt contracted last year, which must be added to other debts arising from deficiencies in the provision made for the expences of last year. This provision amounted to 3,703,476l. but it is said to have fallen short above a million.

Annual income £. 4,460,759

N O T E.

* The greatest part of this revenue is borrowed of the bank, and spent before it comes into the exchequer. It is, therefore, in reality so much debt constantly due to the bank, for which interest is paid.

These two methods of deducing the surplus of the revenue confirm one another, as nearly as could have been expected. They cannot agree exactly, unless the mean produce of the sinking fund, and of all the taxes, are taken for the same years, and from the same quarter in every year.

There is a third method of proving that the permanent surplus of the revenue cannot exceed the sum now stated.

I have learnt from the highest authority, that the national debt, about a year ago, had been diminished near 9 millions, and a half, since the peace in 1763; including a million of the 3 per cents discharged last year.—The money employed in making this reduction, must have been derived from the surplus of the ordinary and stated revenue, added to the extraordinary receipts. These extraordinary receipts have consisted of the following articles.—1. The land tax at 4s. in the pound in 1764, 1765, and 1771; or 1s. in the pound extraordinary for three years, making 1,300,000l.—2. The profits of nine lotteries, making (at 150,000l. each lottery) 1,350,000l.—3. A contribution of 400,000l. per ann. from the India company for five years, making 2,000,000l.—4. 110,000l. paid by the bank in 1764 for the privilege of exclusive banking. Also the money paid by France for maintaining their prisoners; and the money arising from the sale of French prizes taken before the declaration of war; from saving on particular grants at the end of the war, &c. &c.—which, all together*, I will suppose a million. Add 3,300,000l. arising from a surplus of 300,000l. for eleven years; and the total will be 8,950,000l. which is a sum more than sufficient for discharging 9 millions and a half of the public debt.

* The author of the Present State of the Nation, published in 1768, makes all these extraordinary receipts to amount to above two millions and a half. But the greatest part of them were applied to satisfy German claims, and some other debts, not properly included in the current national expenditure.

Total £. 11,166,344

It must be seen, that this account is imperfect. It is, however, sufficient to prove, that the whole money raised directly by the taxes, exceeds considerably eleven millions. But as the increased price of one commodity has a tendency to raise the price of other commodities; and as also dealers generally add more than the value of a tax to the price of a commodity, besides charging interest for the money they advance on the taxes; for these reasons, it seems certain, that the taxes have an indirect effect of great consequence; and that a larger sum is drawn by them from the public, than their gross produce.—It is farther to be considered, that many of the persons who are now supported by collecting the taxes, would have supported themselves by commerce or agriculture; and, therefore, instead of taking away from the public stock, would have been employed in increasing it.—Some have reckoned, that on all these accounts the expence of the taxes is doubled; but this must be extravagant. Let us suppose a quarter only added; and it will follow, that the money drawn from the public by the taxes (exclusive of those which maintain the poor) is near 14 millions per ann. a sum almost equal to the whole specie of the kingdom; which, therefore, had we no paper currency, would be totally inadequate to the wants of the kingdom.

Without all doubt such a state of things, in a great commercial nation, is most dangerous, and frightful; but it admits of no remedy, while the public debt continues what it is.—With a view, therefore, to the quick reduction of this debt, I will throw away, after all I have said on this subject on former occasions, the following proposals.—It has appeared, that, supposing the taxes not to become less productive, and the current national expence to continue the same that it had been for ten years before 1775, a surplus may be expected in the revenue of about 300,000*l.* per ann.—With a surplus so trifling, nothing can be done; but it might be increased; first of all, by keeping the Land Tax for the future at 4*s.* in the pound.—As rents have been almost doubled, this will not be much more to the present proprietors of land, than 2*s.* in the pound was formerly. 'Tis, therefore, equitable; and it will add to the national income near 450,000*l.*

Secondly, All the money now spent in maintaining troops in America might be saved.—The colonies are able to defend themselves. They wish to be allowed to do it. Should they ever want the aid of our troops, they will certainly be very willing to pay us for them. Indeed I am of opinion, they will never be willing to make peace with us, without stipulating that we shall withdraw our troops from them. Were there any external power that claimed and exercised a right of stationing troops in this country, without our consent, we should certainly think ourselves entirely undone.—I will estimate this saving at no more than 200,000*l.* per ann.

Thirdly, I do not see why the peace-establishment might not be reduced to what it was, at an average, in 1768, 1769 and 1770. This would produce a saving of 350,000*l.* per ann.—I might here here propose reducing the peace-establishment for the navy to what it always was before the last war, or from 16,000 to 10,000 men. But it would be infinitely better to reduce the army; and this might produce a farther saving of great consequence.—But waving this, I shall only mention, Fourthly, That contributions might be obtained from North America and other parts of the British Empire, on the principles stated, from the Earl of Shelburne's authority.—I will estimate this at no more than 300,000*l.* per ann.—Add the surplus now in our possession; and the total will be 1,600,000.—In the Introduction to the third edition of the Treatise on Reversionary Payments, I have explained a method of paying off, with a sinking fund of a million *per ann. & hundred millions of the national debt in forty years. What then might not be done with such a fund as this?

In five years 18,986,300*l.* will fall from an interest of 4 per cent. to 3 per cent.—Also, 4,500,000*l.* 3 and a half per cent. 1758, will fall, in six years, to an interest of 3 per cent.—The long Annuities granted in King William's time, amounting to 136,453*l.* will, in eighteen years, become mostly extinct; as will also the greatest part of the life annuities.—All these savings amount to more than 400,000*l.* per ann. And, were they to be added to the fund as they fall in, its operations would be so much accelerated, that in a few years we should see this country above all its difficulties.—Still more might be done by striking off unnecessary places and pensions; by giving up all the means of corruption; by reducing the pay of the great officers of state; and simplifying the taxes.—A minister who appeared determined to carry into execution such a system, would soon gain the confidence of the public; endear himself to all honest men; and in time come, to be blessed as the Saviour of his country.—But what am I doing?—We have no such happy period before us.—Our ministers are active in pursuing measures which must increase our burdens. A horrid civil war is begun; and it may soon leave us nothing to be anxious about.

acquaintance with the said defendant, Benjamin Bowen Read, in the year 1768, and during that time, this deponent and his wife lived in a very harmonious and affectionate manner, this deponent having no ground to suspect her being any way unfaithful to him. And this deponent saith, that in the summer of the year 1766, he and his said wife went to lodge at the house of one Marfeilles, a taylor, in Princes-street, Cavendish-square, in the first floor; and soon after they went to lodge there, the said defendant, Benjamin Bowen Read, came to lodge there likewise on the second floor, and by that means the said defendant became acquainted with this deponent and his said wife, and he, the said defendant then passed for a young gentleman intitled to a considerable estate, and this deponent and the said Read grew very intimate together, and in the month of October or November 1766, the said Read left his said lodgings in Princes-street, asforesaid, but this deponent had not then suspected that there was any intrigue between the said Read and his, this deponent's said wife: and this deponent saith, that a very short time after the said Read went away, a letter from him was brought to this deponent's said wife, at which this deponent expressed some surprise and anger, and by means thereof a slight quarrel ensued between this deponent and his said wife, and she thereupon refused to lye with this deponent that night, and the next morning she got up before the other people in the house, and went away and left this deponent, and cohabited, as this deponent afterwards found, with the said defendant Read, and lived with him at one Bradshaw's, a surgeon and apothecary, in Ratcliff Highway, where this deponent went to inquire after her, but this deponent was not permitted to see her, though she was then in the house with the said Read; and this deponent saith, that his said wife continued to cohabit with the said Read, as this defendant verily believeth, and to secrete herself from this deponent till the month of March last, when the said Read went abroad, as was given out by this deponent's said wife, and this deponent was soon afterwards arrested for the board and lodging of his said wife during part of the time she so lived away from this deponent: and this deponent saith, that he hath not till lately, been able to obtain proper evidences of facts to maintain an action against the said Read for criminal conversation with this deponent's said wife: and this deponent saith, that he had been informed and believes that the said Read is now in England; but this deponent saith, that if he, this deponent, was to bring an action against him the said Read, and serve him with a copy of process, only holding him to bail, he this deponent would lose the benefit and effect of such action, as this deponent verily believes; for this deponent saith, that he believes that the said Read would, upon his being served with a process, go abroad out of this kingdom; for he the said Read is an Irishman by birth, as this deponent hath heard and believes; and his property, which is considerable, as this deponent hath heard, lies in that kingdom, he having no property here, as this deponent believes: and this deponent saith, he hath heard and been informed, that the said Read attained the age of 25 years in October last, and that therefrom he became intitled to the possession of a considerable estate in Ireland of the yearly value of 2000l. or some such large sum of money.

Mrs. Rudd still continued her former plan of life; still contracted debts, and still left her husband to pay for them. No wonder these perpetual drains on so small an estate as Mr. Rudd was possessed of, soon exhausted it: indeed, so it happened, for he soon found himself again arrested for a debt she had contracted, and thrown into the fleet. Mrs. Rudd had by this time got particularly known to numbers, and though she had very handsome presents daily made to her, yet her extravagance would never keep within bounds; but her chief aim, and what she made a particular boast of, was the peculiar method of making her elderly lovers exceedingly enamoured of her. Among the rest of her doating admirers, while Mr. Rudd was in the fleet, was a very respectable gentleman at the other end of the town, who indulged her in every vanity, and permitted her to make use of his name for jewels, furniture, &c. The artful lady failed not to make a proper use of such an enamoured dotard, caressed, fondled, and exerted all the craft of woman, till she found she had gained an entire predominancy over him.

Thus established in a high sphere, and as she had so far reduced Mr. Rudd's circumstances, that he could no longer be of service to her, she resolved, through the means of her infirm lover, to do for once an act of kindness, by relieving her husband from a prison, and obtaining a final separation from him. To effect which, she prevailed on her enamoured swain to pay the debt, on condition of Mr. Rudd's resigning all farther pretensions to his faithful Peggy. This scheme took place, the debt was discharged, and her husband once more set at liberty. In this lustre she lived for some time, but the detection of an amorous interview between Mrs. Rudd and Mr. —, broke off the connection. This was an alarming stroke to so gay a lady; she now found all her interest dropt in so good a quarter, and as her young lover had a great flow of spirits and a less run of cash than the old one, she was soon reduced to a very scanty pittance; but as her nature did not consist in an inactive state of life, she was soon after introduced to a set of swindlers, among whom she bore a principal character, being held out to the credulous tradesmen as a lady of great fortune, the natural daughter of the pretender, and grandchild of lord Dundee. This mode of life brought in for a while, large returns, till unfortunately for her the clan was broke, and numbers fell into the hands of justice.

As the pretender's pretended daughter had been so extremely serviceable in carrying on this business, it is no wonder that strict search was made after her ladyship, but it was all in vain: she, for some time concealed herself till the affair was partly blown over, then changed her name, and once more escaped punishment. In the number of her particular friends was one Mr. W—, commonly known by the name of p—. This trusty fellow never deserted her, and having planned a fresh scheme, he took a lodging for her in Mark's court, but finding she was likely to be discovered there, ready furnished apartments were taken for her at Mr. Hunt's, under the name of lady —, aunt to lord Piggot. Aids of address and gentility Mrs. Rudd was perfectly acquainted with, and knew how to behave in the company of the peer or the porter. It is not therefore surprizing that Mrs. Hunt was imposed upon, and suffered her to remain in her apartments till the sum of one hundred pounds was owing for board and lodging.

As Mrs. Hunt now thought it time that she should see the purse strings of her ladyship open, and not observing either her ladyship's nephew, nor my lord's banker, who was to come day after day to bring her a few bank notes, (for thousands of pounds were easily talked of) she began to be importunate, and ventured to ask her ladyship for the whole or part of the rent. Mrs. Rudd was too well versed in the ways of the world to be disconcerted at this stroke, and calmly replied with great composure and affectation of consequence, 'that she was surprized at the liberty Mrs. Hunt took in making a demand from her of such a trifle.' This spoken she rang the bell for her footman, sat herself down calmly in her chair, and ordered him "to hasten to my lord, and bring her the amount of Mrs. Hunt's rent; at the same time, desiring his lordship might send his chariot for her, for she was determined not to sleep another night under the roof of a woman of her landlady's narrow principles."

The footman who knew how to conduct himself in the errand, bowed obedience and retired, while Mrs. Hunt, who scarcely knew what to make of this talk, and now, rather fearful lest she should affront her if she was a real lady, and if she paid would be a desirable lodger, she therefore begged ten thousand pardons, pleaded her necessity, hoped her ladyship would not take it ill, as she was pressed for rent in return.

The footman as well versed in the chicanery of message carrying, as a certain counsellor is in the chicanery of the Old Bailey, returned and delivered the following card to Mrs. Rudd, which she carelessly delivered to Mrs. Hunt, to verify the goodness of her nephew.

"My dear lady aunt, I must beg ten thousand pardons for not waiting on your ladyship before, but as I have been detained longer in the country than expected, hope you will excuse it. Am this moment going to court, and if I can get away in any time will call at D—, the banker's, and bring with me treble your small request. If I do not come this evening I must beg leave to pay my respects to you in the morning."

This design taking place, Mrs. Hunt left the room, and was fully satisfied of being a hundred pounds richer the next morning: but, alas! it is certain there are waking dreams as well as sleeping ones, which are never realized. Thus it happened at present, for my lord not coming to appointment, a little awakened suspicion in the landlady's breast again; but what alarmed her still more, was finding the lady and the footman great part of the day packing up their own things, and she was fearful more than they could without her consent, call their own. Accordingly having acquainted a neighbour with her suspicions, he advised her by all means, to have an officer ready at night in the house for fear fear of a deception. This advice she took, and having obtained one, she planted him ready for execution, if matters were as suspected. Night came, and (if we may be allowed an anglicism) threw a light on Mrs. Rudd's character, for when she thought all the family was asleep, John was dispatched for a chair, and her ladyship having descended heavily loaded, had scarcely placed herself in it, when the men who had taken up their fare, were peremptorily ordered by the officer in waiting, to set it down, and seized upon her ladyship for further security.

After a little confinement, she made a sufficient interest to get this matter settled, but she was so greatly distressed with it, as to be obliged to retire in private to Lambeth, where her faithful p—— was daily busy in introducing her to gentlemen: among the rest that got introduced was Mr. R——, who finding the articles of agreement not strictly kept up, thought to use the authority of a husband with her. This had very little effect on her, and she soon quieted the soldier, by sending for a constable, and putting him in prison again, by swearing her life against him. A short time after she took lodgings in Holland-street, and then went to live with — H—. While she was in Holland street, she lived very extravagantly, but her most intimate friend there was one Mr. —, a gentleman who is now dead. The amorous gallant Dr. —, who frequently used to come: Mrs. R—— at this time kept a number of servants, among whom the doctor's name was laughingly handed about, for they made no scruple to say, that if his love for Mrs. Rudd, was as great as his appetite for good food, she had the most amorous gallant in England; indeed this gentleman was allowed to pay more attention to the kitchen than to the parlour, and would be constantly to and fro in the culinary room on his visits, questioning and directing the cook in what manner to proceed with her business.—"Without wine and bread, love won't feed," is an old proverb, which in fact, in one respect he endeavoured to verify, and if a good stomach, rich and plenty of food, stimulatives and provocatives could assist the doctor's case: there was not the least omission in the prescription. But however great his inabilities were for amorous feats, and however dissatisfied Mrs. Rudd might be with him in that respect, certain it is his abilities in another way fully answered all her satisfactions, and his money was afterwards ever ready to discount aerial bonds.

We are now to come to that part of this notified lady's life, where she got acquainted with the unhappy, misled, Mr. Daniel Perreau. Here we would wish to draw a veil, did not a biographical work require veracity. Before we enter into this point, we must return a little back to Mr. B——, as he was a particular acquaintance and friend to Daniel, and introduced him to our heroine. It is asserted, and there is great reason to believe, that of all the lovers Mrs. Rudd ever had, Daniel was the only one who ever held full possession of her heart: she saw, and at the first sight felt an esteem for him, and having found where his peculiar foibles lay, she resolved to attack him on his weak side. Daniel was particularly fond of dress, and greatly admired the elegance and accomplishments of a female, more than beauty, though Mrs. Rudd's person was far from disagreeable. She therefore dressed according to his taste, flattered his judgment, treated him in the most elegant and costly manner, and furnished out her tables with a luxury equal to a peeress. This particular assiduity to him soon gained his affections, and one day, after his friend's death, and when the imbecile doctor was absent, it happened that Daniel, who had been for some time blinded by this continual gaiety, but private reflection arising in his mind at intervals, at the heavy expence this method of living was attended with; threw himself on the sofa in a desponding attitude, looking wishfully at Mrs. Rudd, and shaking his head at the same time, said, "My dear Carry, this will never do;" but the artful lady, who perfectly knew his disposition, soon quieted his suspicions and lull'd them away; but though her extravagant method of life was not so greatly taken notice of by Daniel, yet a friend of his was at dinner, and he could not help expressing his mind. The entertainment was costly, and every thing in the greatest taste. Mrs. Rudd, pleased at the sight of such splendor before her, asked the gentleman present, what he thought of her regale. The gentleman who was much pock-fretten answered, "that every thing was exceeding gay, delicate and costly; but that he thought she was too generous, too bountiful a lady, and that there were too great a number of dishes for three persons to sit down to: as for his part, he liked nothing to excess, but was a great admirer of natural simplicity."

city, even if it was as much deformed as his face."

Mrs. Rudd was a little nettled at this answer; but for the present took no notice of it, being resolved to exert her abilities to remove this friend of Daniel's from his house, as she plainly saw he would be of no use, but rather of disservice to her schemes. To effect this, she used numberless insinuations, and by invidious and couched expressions, raised up a jealousy in the breast of Daniel.

"Trifles light as air
Are to the jealous confirmation strong
As proofs of holy writ."

As this political lady never planned a scheme but what she succeeded in, her crafty design took effect; Daniel shewed a coolness and reserve to his friend, who often pressed to know the cause, but was never satisfied. Happy had it been for Daniel if he had retained him, as he would frequently endeavour to draw his friend aside from this attachment, which he plainly foresaw would end in his ruin, in some shape or another.

Mrs. Rudd now perfectly secured of Daniel, by her removing his friend, indulged in every extravagance and luxury possible to the greatest height, the richest dresses that were worn—new and costly jewels were bought—a handsome sideboard of plate purchased, and every thing that was new and fashionable in furniture sent for, so that now her mansion was decorated with a costliness, and every object around her bespoke an Asiatic pride and luxuriousness.

An impartial and circumstantial Detail of the Trial of the Duchesses of Kingston—(for a most beautiful Engraving of her Grace, from an original Drawing, see our Magazine for March last.)

THE importance, the novelty of a cause of this kind having excited the curiosity of every female of these kingdoms, many thousands of which could not have had access to the most august tribunal that these nations can exhibit, we thought it our duty to meet our fair correspondents and patronesses on this ground, and give them all the information they could have reaped from a ticket delivered by the lord chamberlain.

Monday, April 15.

By nine o'clock the peeresses, foreign ambassadors, &c. &c. had all taken their seats, and at half after ten her majesty entered, from the duke of Newcastle's house in New-palace-yard, the centre box of his grace's gallery, which he had prepared for her and their royal highnesses the prince of Wales, the bishop of Osnabrugh, the princess-royal, and the two other young princes who accompanied her, attended by lord and lady Holderness, lord Hinchinbroke, &c. &c.

At a quarter after eleven, the procession made its appearance in the following order: Peers eldest sons preceded by the lord high steward's domestics; the masters in chancery; king's serjeants and judges; barons, bishops, viscounts, earls, marquises and dukes; the serjeant at arms, the lord high steward, with black rod on his right, and garter on his left; the lord president and lord privy seal: the barons went to their seats next the bar, the junior baron taking the left hand seat next the bar, and so in the same manner till the benches in the front of the court were filled; the archbishops and bishops to the side benches on the right, and the dukes to the side benches from the throne, down as far as the table.

Having taken their seats with the usual formalities, the clerk of the crown, by direction of the lord high steward, read the Certiorari, and the return thereof, together with the caption of the indictment, and the indictment certified thereupon.

The serjeant at arms then made proclamation for black rod to bring his prisoner to the bar, on which her grace was brought to the bar, attended by three ladies of her bed-chamber, Mrs. Egerton, Mrs. Barrington, and Miss Chudleigh, her Chaplain, physician, and apothecary.

Her grace as soon as she came in saluted the lord high steward, their lordships, and the counsel, and kneeled while the lord high steward was speaking, but was three or four times desired to rise by a general call from the lords. When she was desired to proceed on her defence, she held a paper in her hand, which she informed the court was a sentence of the ecclesiastical court, declaring her marriage null and void. She was asked if she had any other thing to offer in her defence? She paused a minute, and the clerk of the crown asking her how she would be tried, she answered by God and her country.

Her grace then rose, and holding a written paper in her hand, read it: It was to the following purport:

"My lords,

"After having at the hazard of my life, returned from Rome in a dangerous sickness, to submit myself to the laws of of my country, I build fome little merit on my willing obedience; and I entreat your lordships indulgence if I should be deficient in any ceremonial part of my conduct towards you, my moft honoured and respectable judges, for the infirmities of my body, and oppreffion of fpirits under which I laboured, leave your unhappy prifoner fometimes without recollection; but it muft be only with the lofs of life that I can be deprived of the juft knowledge of the duty and refpect that is due to this high tribunal."

After which it was permitted that her grace might fit down, which ſhe did before the bar.

The dutcheſs was dreſſed in a black poloneſe, with a black gauze cap. She ſeemed chearful and compoſed after the firſt ſhock. While ſhe was reading the paper delivered in to the lords, ſhe appeared to be ſtrongly agitated, and very ſenſibly affected.

Lord high Steward. Madam, you will do well to give attention, while you are arraigned on your indictment.

Then proclamation was made for ſilence.

Here her Grace aroſe, and read another paper, informing their lordships that ſhe was ordered by her counſel to plead the ſentence of the eccleſiaſtical court, given by Dr. Betteſworth, in 1769, in her favour, as a bar to her being put upon her trial in this inſtance:—however, the lord high Steward informed her, ſhe muſt plead to the indictment; in confequence of which, as ſoon as ſhe was arraigned and aſked by the clerk of the crown, whether ſhe was guilty of the felony whereof ſhe was indicted, or not guilty—ſhe answered with great firmneſs, not guilty, my lords.

Clerk of the crown. Culprit,

How will your ladyſhip be tried?

Elizabeth Duchefs of Kingſton. By God and my peers.

Clerk of the crown. God ſend your grace a good deliverance!

Clerk of the crown. Serjeant at arms, make proclamation.

Serjeant at arms. Oyez, oyez, oyez! all manner of perſons that will give evidence, on behalf of our ſovereign lord the King, againſt Elizabeth dutcheſs dowager of Kingſton, the prifoner at the bar, let them come forth, and they ſhall be heard; for now ſhe ſtands at the bar upon her deliverance.

Lord high Steward. My lords, the diſtance of this place from the bar is ſo great, that I muſt deſire your lordships leave to go down to the table for the convenience of hearing.

Lords. Ay, ay.

Mr. Dunning, as ſoon as the dutcheſs replied ſhe would be tried by God and her country, opened the proſecution, ſhortly, on behalf of the crown. He ſaid he ſhould not take up their lordships time in ſtating the charge, or commenting on it, as that would come more properly from the officer of the crown, whoſe peculiar province it was to ſee that the laws of the realm were maintained, and faithfully carried into execution.

Before the attorney general had time to proceed, the lady having tendered her plea, as matter of record, being an authenticated copy of a ſentence of the eccleſiaſtical court, in the year 1768, previous to her marriage with the late Evelyn duke of Kingſton, deceased, Mr. Wallace, who was one of the counſel for her grace, contended that it was a good plea in bar of the indictment; that it was matter of record, of a court which had competent juriſdiction to decide upon ſuits of matrimonial eſpouſals; that conſequently no parole testimony could now be legally received to impeach it; and that being the caſe, the prifoner ſtood at their lordship's bar, to all intents and purpoſes whatſoever, in the light of a ſingle woman, the day ſhe intermarried with her deceased husband Evelyn Pierpoint, duke of Kingſton. For thoſe reaſons, he humbly ſubmitted to their lordships that the ſentence of the eccleſiaſtical court be now read, as concluſive evidence of the premiſſes; and that the plea be recorded, as a bar to all indictments for the felony, with which the prifoner ſtood now charged.

The attorney general obſerved, that the plea was a moſt extraordinary one, yet, as their lordships ſeemed inclined to hear the matter of law urged, he could not poſſibly have any objection to it, otherwiſe he would have objected to it in the firſt inſtance; but before it was received, he begged leave to remind their lordships, unleſs they were reſolved to accept it to the extent now contended by the lady's counſel, that he reſerved to himſelf the right of being heard to its inadmiſſibility as a plea in bar; and that ſuppoſing their lordships ſhould conſent to hear counſel in ſupport of it, that he inſiſted the whole proceedings on which the ſentence was founded ſhould be read.

Mr. Wallace replied, that the prifoner was legally juſtified in inſiſting on the plea as a matter of record; that as ſuch the court could not regularly take cognizance of the proceedings of the eccleſiaſtical court previous to the ſentence, becauſe the ſentence sentence itself was binding and conclusive against that part of the indictment, which had erroneously found that the prisoner and Mr. Hervey were married on such a day and place therein mentioned.

Mr. attorney general rejoined and observed, that the plea and the argument raised on it by his learned adversary, might be explained in two ways. It was a legal plea of matter of record, and was pleaded in bar of the indictment; or it was a plea of justification, containing the merits of the matter in issue, that is, whether the prisoner was or was not married. If their lordships were resolved to allow the plea, as a mere plea in bar, then there would be at once an end to the business, and he would cheerfully acquiesce; but if it was a plea on the general issue, he could not conceive how it was possible that it could be received without knowing the special matter on which the sentence was founded.

Here lord Mansfield rose, and moved for the sentence of the ecclesiastical court to be read at the bar, by a proper officer from the commons attending for that purpose.—The attorney general observed, that in such case it would be necessary to read all the previous allegations, replications, &c. on which such sentence was founded. The clerk of the crown accordingly read over the allegations and part of the replications, when lord Mansfield getting up a second time, informed the house, that the counsel would give the substance of the latter in their arguments, and therefore it was needless to take up their lordships' time with a formal reading of them.

The ground Mr. Wallace took was, that the ecclesiastical court had a competent jurisdiction to decide on all matters relative to matrimony. The laws had given it a competent and conclusive jurisdiction in matters cognizant by the court. There was but one law in being which broke in upon its jurisdiction, and brought offences against the rights of marriage before the temporal courts; and that, so far as a power of judging of the act, as a matter of moral turpitude, was concerned, the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical court was entire and decisive as if the act of the 1st of James the First had never passed. The crime of polygamy was not rendered more immoral or more odious in any light than before the passing of that act.

Mr. Mansfield opened his argument with commenting on the statute of the 1st of James the first. He contended, that both the legal and equitable construction of it supported the plea now tendered. He insisted that the words of the sentence of the ecclesiastical court corresponded exactly with the conception in the statute. The sentence pronounced the duchess of Kingston both substantially, and in direct terms a single woman previous to her marriage with the duke. The words were, that she never was married, and is now free to marry on account of any pretended espousals with the said Augustus John Hervey; that she was never married to her said pretended husband, but is a spinster. The words of the statute are, that it shall not extend to any person or persons where the former marriage shall be by sentence of the ecclesiastical court declared void and of no effect.

He then proceeded to maintain the particular ground on which his argument was built, and cited a variety of cases to prove the conclusive jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical court, some of them so early as the 22d of Edward the Fourth; and so down to the present time, from the year books, Coke, More, and several other ancient reporters.

After him Dr. Calvert, a civilian, arose, and spoke near two hours in favour of her grace. He quoted several cases in point, to prove that the sentence of the consistory court was to all intents conclusive. The most striking was—"If a will was even forged, if it had received the probat of the commons, the will was valid, notwithstanding the discovery of the forgery, and not cognizable by any temporal court whatever." And again, Hatfield against Hatfield, "In the house of lords 1725, on an appeal from Ireland, a woman brought a bill against her supposed husband's son, by a former wife. The son insisted that she was never married to his father, but that she was the wife of one Porter; and the marriage with Porter was clearly proved: upon such proof she sued Porter in the spiritual court in a jactitation cause, and on his failing to prove her his wife, she obtained a sentence against him, and afterwards made that sentence her case in chancery, where it was held conclusive evidence; and the lord chancellor's opinion was affirmed before your lordships on appeal."

Dr. Wynne spoke very ably on the same side. He contended, that the general idea, that the ecclesiastical courts were controulable by the temporal courts, or courts of criminal jurisdiction, was a great error; and if there had been as many caſes cited on the other ſide, to ſhew in inſtances ſentences in the eccleſiaſtical courts had been ſet aſide, it would not, in his opinion, alter nor abridge the rights of the eccleſiaſtical courts; it might exhibit ſo many proofs of uſurpation, but would never take away the rights thus invaded, except in the inſtances where ſuch uſurpations had prevailed.

Lord Gower getting up, moved to adjourn: whereupon the lord high Steward returning to the chair, under the canopy, adjourned the houſe to the chamber of parliament, to which place they now returned in the ſame ſtate as they entered:—immediately after which her grace the ducheſs of Kingſton retired with her ſuite, attended by the ſerjeant at arms, &c. &c.—

Tueſday, April 16.

The lord high Steward called upon the counſel on behalf of the proſecution to begin their replies to the plea made the day before by her grace's counſel, againſt any evidence being called in ſupport of the indiſtment.

Mr. Attorney obſerved, that the ſentence of the eccleſiaſtical court was pleaded as a matter of record, amounting in effect to a formal acquittal; if, therefore, it could not be received in that form, it could be received in no other. This he contended could not be the caſe, unleſs the cauſe of jactitation was in the nature of a criminal proſecution, and the ſentence on that cauſe an acquittal by the country. For his part, therefore, be the event of the trial what it might, as to the ſentence of the eccleſiaſtical court, to ſhew that the priſoner was really a ſingle woman on her eſponſals with the late duke of Kingſton, he could not poſſibly conceive how the plea now tendered, which was a virtual confeſſion of her guilt, could legally operate as a proof of her innocence. The circumſtances attending the nature of the plea, ſtill encreaſed the abſurdity of inſiſting on it, and greatly aggravated the offence; for it not only owned the crime charged in the indiſtment, but claimed the protection of the court, on the ground, that the plea had been obtained by collusion, fraud, and deceit.

But ſo far from the ſentence of the eccleſiaſtical court amounting to a trial or acquittal, he contended it was no ſentence at all; for, in every ſentence there muſt be res adjudicata, the matter muſt be ſolemnly determined and finally adjudged.

The Solicitor General next aroſe, and took a very extenſive view of the ſubject; he held the idea of ſentences in the Spiritual Court not being cognizable by temporal ones, in a very cheap light, and was remarkably ſatirical on the deciſions of the Eccleſiaſtical Court; obſerving, that if ſuch were final and concluſive, a man but little ſkilled in the art of collusion, who had a taſte for variety, and was induſtrious, might indulge himſelf with 75 wives by the time he was 35 years old. He turned Dr. Calvert's caſe of the forgery of a will into ridicule, by making it an argument to prove the neceſſity of ſome cognizance being taken of ſuch deciſions by the ſuperior Courts: to ſtrengthen this he quoted another caſe, where the will of a woman had been forged during her life, and a Probat had been colluſively obtained in the Commons; the woman hearing of it applied to the Commons perſonally, to prove herſelf alive; however, the Probat had paſſed, and ſhe was informed there, that in conſequence of the Probat ſhe was dead to all intents and purpoſes in the eye of the Eccleſiaſtical Law. The Solicitor added, the forger was apprehended, notwithstanding the Probat, indiſted, arraigned, and executed.—With regard to ſentences being definitive, he begged leave to aſk, as a caſe in point, whether in an aſſault, the perſon who brings an action, if he fails in that action, is barred from proſecuting the offender by the mode of indiſtment? He frequently raiſed a general laugh through the Houſe at the expence of Doctors Commons, and concluded, by laying it down, that he was of opinion the ſentence of any Eccleſiaſtical Court was open to the reviſion of the Supreme Court of Judicature.

Mr. Dunning followed the Solicitor-General, went over nearly the ſame grounds, in exception to the plea, and quoted ſeveral authorities from the Law books, in ſupport of his opinion, that ſuch plea could not be admitted in that Court as a bar againſt evidence being called in ſupport of the indiſtment: Near the end of his ſpeech, there was ſuch a noiſe in the outward part of the hall, that Lord Lyttleton roſe up, and moved the Lord High Steward, that Black Rod ſhould be ſent round, to take ſome of the rioters into cuſtody; the proper officers going out, and proclamation for ſilence being again made, the tumult ceaſed, and Mr. Dunning concluded his ſpeech, which laſted about an hour and a half.

Dr. Harris, the Civilian, retained on the part of the proſecutor, got up next, and replied to the arguments delivered by the Docters Calvert and Wynne, taking great pains to refute them. This Gentleman, who was upon his legs above an hour, being the laſt Counſel on behalf of the proſecution, the Lord High Steward called upon Mr. Wallace to reply, which he roſe up to do; when Lord Groſvenor getting up, obſerved, that perhaps her Grace's Counſel might wiſh for time to conſider of thoſe caſes and arguments, which might have been unexpectedly ſtated on the other ſide.

The Lord High Steward. Mr. Wallace, would you rather wiſh for time, or go on?

Mr. Wallace. My Lord, it is a matter of ſuch infinite moment to my noble client, that it is certainly my duty to act with the utmoſt circumſpection, and to avail myſelf of every argument in my power for her ſupport; yet I own I do not feel ſo great weight in any thing my learned friends on the other ſide have advanced, that in my opinion requires any great ſtudy for me to answer; therefore, if it is agreeable to your Grace and this Right Hon. Houſe, I will go on.

Lord Talbot. My Lords, this is a queſtion of ſuch vaſt importance, not only to the noble priſoner, but to this Right Hon. Houſe in general, that too much attention cannot be paid to the arguments on both ſides; I think we have already heard more than we can retain; at leaſt I honeſtly confeſs for my own part I have; I therefore move your Lordſhips that this Houſe do now adjourn to the Chamber of Parliament.

Lord Coventry. The matter ſtrikes me directly in the ſame light as it has done the Lord Steward of the Houſehold, and therefore I ſecond his motion.

The Lord High Steward then returning from the table to the throne, asked if it was their Lordſhips pleaſure to adjourn; which paſſing in the affirmative, by a diviſion of 80 to 59, he removed with the Peers to the Parliament Chamber, where the court was adjourned till Friday morning.

Friday, April 19.

The Lord High Steward called upon Mr. Wallace to reply in defence of the Priſoner, when Lord Ravenſworth got up.

Lord Ravenſworth. My Lords, I beg leave to propoſe a queſtion to the Counſel at the bar previous to going further into this cauſe.—Is the ſentence of the Eccle-ſiaſtical Court final and concluſive in this inſtance, or not?

Lord Mansfield. If the noble Lord means—Is there any precedent for ſetting aſide ſuch deciſion? There certainly is not:—As to his Lordſhip's queſtion, it has been theſe three days, and now is the ſubject of debate amongſt the Counſel at the bar.

Mr. Wallace was then called upon again for his reply, which he immediately entering upon, took a more enlarged view of the queſtion than he had hitherto done; in the courſe of which he firmly eſtabliſhed all his former caſes, refuted thoſe of his learned brethren on the other ſide, and ſtarted ſome others, which he laid down as the law of the land, and therefore weighty and incontrovertible.

He retorted pretty ſeverely on the Attorney, Solicitor-General, and Mr. Dunning, either for their miſconception or miſrepresentation of the caſes he had quoted. The Solicitor-General, he ſaid, had ſpoke of Sir John Strange's Reports as juvenile eſſays, on which we were not therefore to rely; that they were given to the world moſt probably by his executors, who had more intereſt in increaſing their bulk, than they were anxious for the authenticity of the caſes. The latter, he ſaid, would not have been advanced, if his learned brother had had time to read the preface to the work, wherein Sir John Strange himſelf assigns as a reaſon for his thus publiſhing them in his life-time, "left a ſurreptitious edition ſhould get into the world to his diſcredit, and the loſs of his labour."—As to the youth of the collector, he was yet to learn, that that was againſt the work; wiſhing to be informed which was the moſt likely time for a lawyer to give faithful and correct reports; if at the age of twenty-five, when a man has all his proper ſpirits and activity, or when immerſed in a multiplicity of buſineſs, which muſt evidently counteract ſuch an undertaking?

Having thus reſcued the memory of Sir John Strange from this wanton imputation, he gave Mr. Dunning a handſome wiper for his reflection on Viner; aſſerting, that he believed his learned brother owed more to that ſame Mr. Viner than all the world beſides.

After giving a clear explanation, and conſequent refutation of the caſes of Murphy and Sterling, who forged the wills of Wilkinſon, and Mrs. Shuter, and obtained Probats from the Commons, as quoted on the other side—he began to cite some further cases (in support of the prisoner's plea) of the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court being admitted as evidence in a Temporal Court. The most striking was that of Mr. Thomas Hervey, who being sued for a debt contracted by his wife for necessities, joined issue and had a verdict given against him: He now sued for, and obtained a justification of marriage in the Spiritual Court; soon after which another of his wife's creditors brought an action against him for the recovery of his debt contracted since he had avowedly declined cohabiting with her;—upon this in a trial at bar, the judge, without hesitation, admitted the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court as evidence, and the plaintiff was non-suited.

Earl Carlisle. Was this whilst any suit was depending in the Ecclesiastical Court?

Mr. Wallace. No, my Lords; I am pretty confident there was none at that time.

Among others he quoted the case of Muilman and Con. Phillips, in support of his arguments, which were in general masterly and clear.—As to the matter of collusion and fraud, which the gentlemen on the other side hung so much upon, he averred the Spiritual Court was always open to redress any such, whenever it was made appear;—and as for that Court setting itself up as paramount to all other authority, it was not without its appeals from it; as was evident from various commissions that had passed for that purpose; all he contended was, that its decisions were so far final and conclusive, as not to be wantonly dissolved by the will of any temporal Court whatever.—He spoke for two hours and a half.

Dr. Calvert being now called upon, spoke last in reply, going over the old grounds in support of the power of the Spiritual Court; set their Lordships right, respecting an improper, though the Counsel might deem it a humorous state of the effect of Probats; he assured their Lordships, that so far from persisting in the validity of a Probat when a will was found to be forged, it was instantly deprived of all virtue on the discovery, and was instantly erased out of the records.

Earl Effingham. Is it erased by any judicial authority?

Dr. Calvert. I do not know, my Lords, that it is; I believe it is done, May, 1776.

however, by proper officers, who have sufficient authority for so doing.

The Doctor concluded his arguments as before, insisting upon the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court being a legal plea in bar to their Lordships hearing evidence against the prisoner at the bar.

The Counsel for the prisoner having thus finished in reply, Lord Gower moved for the Lords to adjourn to the Chamber of Parliament, and for her Grace to have permission to withdraw into her room till the House returned into court.

The Lord High Steward adjourned the House accordingly, at about half after three.

As soon as the Peers had taken their seats in the Chamber of Parliament, Lord Camden arose, and put two questions to the Judges:—"Whether, in their opinion, the court could enter into the evidence, or whether the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court was final and conclusive?—And—Whether the Crown or Prosecutor could or could not proceed against the Prisoner in this court for fraud and collusion, in obtaining such sentence?"

The Judges returned for answer, That it was their opinion, "that in both cases, the crown or Prosecutor were authorised by law to go into evidence in support of the indictment." In consequence of which determination, the House, having withdrawn about an hour, returned into court, when the Lord High Steward addressing himself to the Attorney General, informed him, that their Lordships had commanded him to bid him go on with the prosecution.

Mr. Attorney General opened the prosecution in behalf of the crown rather shortly, and with great severity, charging the prisoner with the highest aggravation of the offence with which she was charged, and imputing the whole of her conduct to ambition and a lust of lucre, and doubting whether to the last she determined in favour of one husband in preference to another, but as the option was likely most to administer to her love of dominion, and love of money.

He then stated the leading facts, and the aggravating circumstances which he was instructed would be proved against her. Those were chiefly as follow: that the prisoner came to London in the year 1740, and in the year 1743 got into the family of the then princess of Wales, being appointed a maid of honour to her royal highness; that in the course of the next year, (1744) she went down to Hampſhire with a lady, on a viſit to a place called Lanefſtone; that during that viſit, there being races at Wincheſter, ſhe caſually met Mr. Hervey, then a lieutenant in the navy, who took a liking to her, and declared his ſentiments at her aunt Hanmer's, at whoſe houſe ſhe was; that both their ſituations in life rendered a public marriage very impracticable, as he, on one ſide, depended on his friends for his future proſpects of advancement, and ſhe, on her remaining a ſingle woman, derived her chief rank and ſupport; that ſuch being the ſituation of the parties, they agreed to marry privately, without the knowledge or conſent of their friends.

That they were accordingly married at Lanefſtone church, in the county of Southampton, on the 4th of Auguſt, 1744, and ſoon after returned to London, and living privately as man and wife, at a houſe taken for the purpoſe, in Conduit-ſtreet, Hanover-square: that at the end of about ſix months, he was called to duty in the Eaſt Indies, where he remained a year and a half, and on his return renewed his former connection with the priſoner, and again lived with her as her huſband privately, at the ſame houſe in Conduit-ſtreet: that Mr. Hervey was, in a few months again called upon ſervice, and went to the Mediterranean, where he did duty for ſome months: that on his return he a ſecond time renewed his matrimonial connection with the priſoner; but it was a circumſtance which happened ſoon after his laſt return, which it would be neceſſary to explain more fully in the courſe of the proſecution, that gave riſe to that miſunderſtanding that after ſeparated the parties, and laid the foundation of the ſubſequent tranſactions, which formed the ſubject matter of the preſent proſecution.

He ſtated, that henceforward a coolneſs grew between Mr. Hervey and the priſoner, which afterwards cauſed a ſtate of indifference, and ſuggeſted ideas and ſchemes to both very different to what cauſed their firſt union. Hence they both wiſhed to get rid of each other, in order to adopt purſuits of a very different nature.

About the time of this falling off, he was inſtructed to tell their lordſhips, that the priſoner had a child; that ſhe frequently told thoſe with whom ſhe lived, in confidence, that ſhe had one; that he was extremely like Mr. Hervey; and that he died an infant.

From this till the year 1752 very little material happened, when ſome overtures were made towards effecting a formal ſeparation, but no ſtep of conſequence was taken, till the year 1759, when the ſcene, which was afterwards acted, and which has ſince opened itſelf to all concerned, and the public at large, firſt came into contemplation, and was afterwards for ſeveral years, eagerly purſued, till finally completed in the year 1768, by a ſentence of the eccleſiaſtical court.

In the year 1759, the priſoner went down to Lanefſtone, and managed matters ſo dexterouſly, as to eraze every memorial of her marriage with Mr. Hervey, and at the ſame time obtained a certificate of a pretended marriage, in order to diſprove it. Two methods were propoſed in the further proſecution of the buſineſs; one by Mr. Hervey, as a ground of divorce for criminal converſation; and the other, which was the plan afterwards carried into execution. The former the priſoner revolted againſt, becauſe it was intended to be grounded on proofs of infidelity to the matrimonial bed; the latter was therefore agreed on, as more agreeable to the ſentiments of the lady.

Mr. Attorney then entered into a detail of the proceedings in the eccleſiaſtical court, in which, if the facts be true, the narrative did not reflect much honour on the manner of proceeding in that court; nor can the public ever again, ſhould the facts ſtated come out in proof, entertain any great opinion of the equity of their deciſion, or even the decency of them.

Mr. Solicitor now got up to examine the evidence.

The firſt witneſs in ſupport of the indiſtment being called to the bar, a conſuſion enſued about placing her; the Duke of Richmond obſerving her ſtand near the priſoner, moved, that ſhe might be placed elſewhere: after much time miſpent on the occaſion, Mr. Quarme, the Deputy Uſher of the Black Rod, was placed between them, and the examination began; one of the clerks of the Houſe putting each queſtion from the Counſel, and making the witneſs reply to the Houſe with an audible voice. The following is the ſubſtance of the evidence:

Anne Craddock. I have known the lady at the bar ever ſince the year 1742, when ſhe came down upon a viſit to Mr. Merrill's at Lanefſtone in Hants, at Wincheſ-

Winchester races; I lived with Mrs. Hanmer, Miss Chudleigh's aunt, who was then at Mr. Merrill's: Mr. Hervey there saw Miss C—— for the first time, when they fell in love with each other; they were privately married one evening, about eleven o'clock, in Lancaster church, in the presence of me, Mr. Mountney, Mrs. Hanmer, and the Rev. Mr. Ames, the rector, who performed the ceremony. I was sent out of the church to get Mr. Merrill's servants out of the way. I saw them put to bed together that night; Mrs. Hanmer made them get up again; they went to bed together the next night. A few days after Mr. Hervey was obliged to set off for Portsmouth to go to sea, a lieutenant in Sir John Danvers' fleet; I was to call him up at five o'clock in the morning: when I went into their bed room, I found them fast asleep; so I thought it a pity to disturb them for an hour or so. My husband, whom I married after, went with Mr. Hervey as his servant. When Mr. H—— returned from the Mediterranean they lived together: I thought she began to look big. Some months after he went to sea again; I then heard that she was brought to bed. She told me herself she had a little boy at nurse, and he was very like Mr. H—— &c. &c.

Upon her cross-examination, respecting her receiving any promise of reward, if the prosecutor succeeded in this trial, and whether she had not some expectations, she could not be brought to a direct answer by the Counsel.

Duke of Grafton. Did you ever see the child that the lady at the bar spoke to you about?—Never.—What was the reason that you did not go at the time she spoke to you about it?—She said she would take me in a few days, and in the mean time I saw her much grieved, when she told me the child was dead.—You say the marriage was performed at night; were there any lights in the church?—Yes, Mr. Mountney had a wax light in the crown of his hat.

Earl of Buckinghamshire. My Lords, the evidence has repeatedly avoided giving a direct answer to a particular question of the Counsel's; I must therefore beg leave to put it: Good woman, I ask you in the face of this assembly, and before that God by whose holy Name you have solemnly sworn to tell the truth, did you, or did you not, ever say, that you expected an advantage from the issue of this trial? After much hesitation—I did not.

Lord Hillsborough. Did you never receive a letter from any person giving you any assurance of reward in consequence of your appearance against the lady at the bar?—I did.—From whom did you receive it?—From a Mr. Fossard of Piccadilly.—What promise was made to you in that letter?—A sinecure place.—Was there nothing else in the letter?—Yes, he said I might shew it to Mr. Hervey if I would.—[Here some other questions were asked her touching this matter, which the witness seemed unwilling to answer; in consequence of which several lords arose at the same time to speak, which caused no small disorder.]

Earl Derby. My Lords, we are now in that interesting part of the trial, which requires the utmost deliberation and circumspection; the many hours we have sat, and the total darkness which must presently prevail, I fear will be a bar to our proceeding with that attention which the importance of the cause demands; I therefore humbly move, that as many lords seem desirous of asking this witness many questions, her further examination may stand over till to-morrow, and that we now adjourn. Adjourned accordingly till

Saturday, April 20.

This day the Duchess of Kingston being brought to the bar,

The lords having gone through the usual solemnities, and Craddock, the witness, being called to the bar, the business of the trial was resumed by lord Hillsborough, who spoke in the following terms:

"I was exceedingly glad the house was adjourned, but I would much rather that it had adjourned sooner, because I now lie under a good deal of difficulty to resume the thread of those questions, that, for my own information, and for that of the house, I thought highly proper and necessary to be explicitly and exactly answered.—My lords, I think the last question that I put to the witness at the bar was, whether she had put that letter, which was signed by Fossard, into the hand of any other person? If I do not mistake, my lords, she said she had put it into the hands of a friend of her's to read. Upon asking her, whether she had any other intention than that of putting the letter into his hand, I think she said she told the person he might shew the letter to Mr. Hervey, as she apprehended it related to him. Now I desire to ask the evidence at the bar, Whether she knows that her friend did ſhew that letter to Mr. Hervey, or not?"

A. My friend did ſhew it to Mr. Hervey.

Q. Whether her friend told her what Mr. Hervey ſaid concerning that letter?

A. My friend told me, that he deſired I ſhould keep the letter.

Q. I deſire to aſk the witneſs whether ſhe, at any time, did receive any preſent, whatſoever, from the priſoner at the bar?

A. Several, in point of friendſhip.

Mrs. Sophia Fettiplace (ſiſter to Lord Howe) was next examined in ſupport of the indictment; ſhe only proved that ſhe lived with her Grace at the time her marriage with Mr. Hervey was ſaid to take place, but was not preſent at the ceremony; only believed ſhe might have heard the Ducheſs mention it herſelf.

[No croſs examination, nor queſtion aſked by the Houſe.]

Ceſar Hawkins, Eſq. Serjeant Surgeon, being next called upon, begged to be informed whether he was bound to diſcloſe converſation imparted to him confidentially, and in the way of his profeſſion.

Lord Mansfield. My Lords, it is the duty of the witneſs to give every information in his power to this Court, touching this matter in queſtion.

Ceſar Hawkins, Eſq. Had known her Grace for many years, he believed ſo—Had heard of a marriage between her and Mr. Hervey, which was mentioned to him by both of them before Mr. Hervey went laſt to ſea—that there was a child, as he believes, of that marriage—was in the room at her Grace's deſire when the boy was born, and ſaw it once afterwards before it died—was ſent for by Mr. Hervey after his return from ſea, and deſired by him to wait upon the priſoner with propoſals reſpecting a divorce; but that her Grace reſuſed to liſten to any terms—that ſeveral meſſages paſſed on this point.—That ſome time after her Grace frequently honoured his wife with a viſit, and told him one day at his own houſe, that ſhe had inſtituted a Jaſtitation Suit in the Commons againſt Mr. Hervey: that another time when ſhe came, ſhe was very grave, and deſired him to withdraw with her into the next room; where ſhe told him ſhe was very unhappy, for that at Docters Commons they had tendered her an oath, which ſhe had long dreaded they would, to ſwear ſhe was not married, which ſhe would not do for ten thouſand worlds: —But not long after, upon another viſit told him, that ſhe had obtained a ſentence which was irrevocable, unleſs in ſo many days Mr. Hervey took ſome certain mode, which ſhe did not expect he would. On hearing this, the Witneſs aſked her how ſhe got over the oath? —She replied, that the matter of the marriage was ſo blended with ſuch a number of falſities, that ſhe could eaſily reconcile it to her conſcience, particularly as the ceremony was ſo ſcrambling and ſhabby a buſineſs, that ſhe might as ſafely ſwear ſhe was not married as that ſhe was.

Counſel. Was there no bond for a ſum or ſums of money paſſed between them to your knowledge on this occaſion? —Not any:—Were not you a trustee to ſuch a bond?—Never.

The Duke of Grafton and ſeveral other Peers put many queſtions to him relative to the child—whether he believed it to be the lady's at the bar? to which he answered in the affirmative.—Whether he knew the child was really dead?—Could not ſay; was only informed ſo by the noble priſoner.

Ordered to withdraw.

Lord BARRINGTON (ſworn.)

Examined by the SOLICITOR GENERAL.

Q. How long has my Lord Barrington been acquainted with the lady at the bar?

A. Above thirty years.

Q. Did his Lordſhip ever hear from the lady at the bar any thing relative to her marriage with Mr. Hervey?

A. My Lords, I am come here in obedience to your Lordſhips ſummons, ready to give teſtimony as to any matter that I know of my own knowledge, or that has come to me in the uſual way. But if any thing has been confiſted to me, or, if any thing has been confidentially told me, I do hold, with humble ſubmiſſion to your Lordſhips, that, as a man of honour, as a man regardful of the laws of ſociety, I cannot answer that queſtion.

Lord High Steward. When the laſt witneſs but one (Mr. Hawkins) was at the bar, he made ſomething like the ſame excuſe for his not answering the queſtions put to him. He was then informed by a noble and learned Lord, and the whole court agreed with that Lord, that ſuch queſtions were to be answered in a court of juſtice.

Lord Barrington. I have no doubt but that the queſtion is a proper queſtion to be aſked by a court of juſtice, otherwiſe

wife your lordships would not have permitted it to be asked. But, my lords, I think every man must act from his own feelings; and I feel that any private conversation, entrusted to me, is not to be reported again.

Lord Radnor. His lordship will recollect the oath that he has taken is, that he shall declare the whole truth.

Lord Barrington. My lords, as I understand the oath, I can decline answering the question that has been asked me, without acting contrary to that oath—without being guilty of perjury. But, if it is the opinion of your lordships that I am bound by that oath to answer; and that I shall be guilty of a perjury if I do not answer; in that case, my lords, I shall think differently, for I will not be perjured.

The Duchefs of Kingfton. I do release my lord Barrington from every honourable obligation to me. I wish, and earnestly desire, that every witness who shall be examined, may deliver their opinions in every point justly, whether for me or against me.

I came from Rome at the hazard of my life, to surrender myself to this court. I bow with submissive obedience to every decree, and do not even complain that an ecclesiastical sentence has been deemed of no force, although such a sentence has never been controverted during the space of 1475 years.

Lord Barrington. My lords, I do solemnly declare to your lordships, on that oath that I have taken, and on my honour, that I have not had the least communication made to me of the duchefs of Kingfton's generosity: I have not had the least communication with her grace, by letter, message, or in any other way, for more than two months; and I had no idea of being summoned as a witness here until the Easter holidays, so that her grace's generosity is entirely spontaneous, and of her own accord. But, my lords, I have a doubt, which no men can resolve better than your lordships, because your honour is as high as any men; but I have a doubt whether, thinking it improper that I should betray confidential communications before the duchefs consented that I should, and gave me my liberty—I have great doubt whether her Grace's generosity ought not to tie me more firmly to my former resolutions.

The duke of Richmond. For one, I think that it would be improper in the noble lord to betray any private conversation. I submit to your lordships, that every matter of fact (not of conversation) which can be requested, the noble lord is bound to disclose.

Lord Mansfield. I mean only to propose to your lordships (to avoid adjourning to consider this question, or any thing farther upon it, at present) that the counsel might be allowed to call other witnesses in the mean time, and that lord Barrington may have an opportunity of considering of the matter, if the counsel should think proper to call his lordship again.

Lord Camden. My lords, I understand from the bar, that rather than your lordships should be perplexed with any question which may arise upon the noble lord's difficulty in giving his evidence at the bar, they would rather wave the benefit of his evidence in the cause.—My lords, if that be their resolution, and they think that safely, and without prejudice to the prosecution, they may venture to give up that evidence; your lordships, to be sure, will acknowledge the politeness of the surrender. But, my lords, now I am upon my legs, you will give me leave to make one short remark on this proceeding, and to hope that your lordships, sitting in judgment on criminal cases, the highest and the most important, that may affect the lives, liberties and properties of your lordships, that you shall not think it befitting the dignity of this high court of justice, to be debating the etiquette of honour, at the same time when we are trying lives and liberties.—My lords, the laws of the land (I speak it boldly in this grave assembly) are to receive another answer from those who are called to depose at your bar, than to be told, that in point of honour and of conscience, they do not think that they acquit themselves like persons of that description, when they declare what they know. There is no power of torture in this kingdom to wrest evidence from a man's breast who withholds it; every witness may undoubtedly venture on the punishment that will ensue on his refusing to give testimony. As to the casuistical points, how far he should conceal or suppress that which the justice of his country calls upon him to reveal, that I must leave to the witness's own conscience.

Lord Lyttleton. The laws of this land have spoken clearly on this occasion; and, if your lordships had applied them to the noble lord at your bar, he has told your lordships that he is willing to submit to your judgment. But, my lords, it is yet a question, whether or not

not the noble lord will be perjured; it is a question, not decided by your lordships, that he will be perjured if he refuses to betray confidence. I am sure that I feel, and I apprehend your lordships, as men of honour, feel the full weight of the noble lord's objection; he will speak to matters of fact, but he does not desire to speak merely to conversation; and, my lords, I am not surprized that he should make that objection; for if you consider how loose and inaccurate all evidence of conversation must be, it takes off, in a court of justice, much from its availment. The noble lord has told you, that confidential conversation may have passed between him and the noble lady at the bar; he has stated to you his doubts: and I apprehend he is not obliged to go on with his evidence, until your lordships have unanimously pronounced, that it is your opinion he is obliged so to do.

Lord High Steward. If the counsel for the prosecution say, that they have no questions to ask the noble lord, he may withdraw.

Lord Barrington. My lords, might I be allowed to say a word or two before I withdraw from this bar? It is impossible that any person can reverence this high court, indeed any court of justice in this country, more than I do. It is not, my lords, from contumacy, of which I am incapable. It is not with any view or purpose, that any of your lordships would disapprove, as individuals, I am certain, that I have taken the part which I have done. I do not say, that there are no cases in which a person ought not to reveal private conversation. There are cases, in my opinion, in which he should. There are cases, in my opinion, in which he should not; and, my lords, no person can draw the line but himself. But, my lords, I have recollected (I am obliged to the counsel for the prosecution who are willing to admit me to withdraw; I return them my thanks; I dare say, in that they have consulted my feelings as much as they could consistent with the duties of their station) —but I have recollected, my lords, since the generous manner in which the dukes of Kingston has been pleased to absolve me from all its ties—I have recollected that the said, the wished and desired that I might say any thing. If her grace thinks, that any thing I can say, consistent with truth, can tend to bring out the real state of this mysterious story, I am then ready to be examined.

Mr. Solicitor General. I do not desire to examine the noble lord. I stated to your lordships, that I do not think the cause, in which my duty engages me, will at all suffer by having deference to any difficulty that the noble lady may entertain. I will not examine the noble lord on the concession of the lady at the bar. The noble lord stands at your lordships bar a witness. Having taken the oath, though I do not examine him, the prisoner may.

Mr. Wallace. At the same time that I express my astonishment at the offer, lord Barrington is not called to the bar as a witness for the prisoner. The noble lady, at the bar, has her witnesses in her turn to call with which we shall trouble your lordships.

Lord Radnor. I do not look on a witness at the bar to be the witness of the counsel, or of the prisoner, but the witness of the house; I shall therefore ask a question or two of the noble lord. I will not distress the noble lord's feelings by enquiring into confidential matters. I will merely ask questions of fact. The first question I would ask the noble lord is, "whether he knows any fact by which he is convinced, that Mr. Hervey was married to Miss Chudleigh?"

A. I do not know of any fact which will prove the marriage between the dukes of Kingston and Mr. Hervey, of my own knowledge.

Q. The noble lord must leave it to the house to judge whether it will or not. But does his lordship know any fact relative to this matter?

A. I do not know any thing, of my own knowledge, that can tend to prove that marriage. I know nothing but what I have heard in the world, and from conversation.

Lord Radnor. I am afraid your lordships, by your acquiescence, have admitted a rule of proceeding here, which would not be admitted in any inferior court in the kingdom. I desire, therefore, to ask the noble lord, whether he knows any thing that will prove the marriage of the earl of Bristol with the lady at the bar?

A. My lords, if I do, I cannot reveal it; nor I cannot answer the question without betraying private confidence.

Lord Radnor. My lords, I move to adjourn to the chamber of parliament.
(Adjourned to the chamber of Parliament.)

After an adjournment of some time, the lords returned to Westminster Hall.

Lord high Steward. My lord viscount Barrington, I am commanded by the lords lords to acquaint your lordship, that it is the judgment of this house, that you are bound by law to answer all such questions as shall be put to you. Has the counsel for the prosecution any question to put to the witness at the bar?

Solicitor General. We shall not ask the noble lord any questions.

Lord high Steward. Has the counsel for the prisoner any question to put to the witness at the bar?

Mr. Wallace. Not any.

Lord Radnor. Does the witness know from conversation with the lady at the bar, that she was married to the earl of Bristol?

A. My lords, I have already told your lordships the motives which induce me to think that I cannot, consistent with conscience, with honour, or with probity answer such questions as will tend to disclose confidential communications made to me. At the same time I informed your lordships that if the oath went so far, as that I should break that oath if I did not answer all questions which could be put to me; if that was the determination of your lordships, I said I would not break my oath. My lords, I continue in the same opinion and principle. My own judgment, as far as it guides me, which is very imperfectly, does tell me, that I am not obliged to answer all questions that can be put to me. But, my lords, though nobody can draw the line of conscience, of honour, and of probity in this case but myself, yet in point of law, and in interpretation of law, and the oath I have taken, I am desirous of assistance from those who can give it me, and I had much rather trust almost any man's judgment than my own. I do not dare to ask your lordships direction again, or your opinion on a point of that kind. But, my lords, might I be permitted to apply to the learned counsel who are near me? If it is the opinion of the learned counsel that I am obliged, by my oath, to answer the noble lord's question, I will readily answer it.

Lord Radnor. I apprehend that no question can be put in this court on a matter of law to the counsel at the bar.

Lord Barrington. My lords, I have put the question to the attorney general, and I give him my thanks. He says, he thinks I am obliged, by my oath, to answer all questions. That being the case, I have nothing more to say, than humbly to beg your lordships pardon, for having given you so much trouble, and to beg and intreat, that you will believe that nothing but the tenderest and the strongest feelings, and the most determined resolutions to do what was right in my situation, could have induced me to give you so much trouble.

Lord Radnor. Whether his lordship knows from conversation with the lady at the bar, that she was married to the Earl of Bristol?

A. My memory, I have found, by long experience, to be a very erroneous one; and especially with relation to things past long ago. To the best of my memory and belief, the duchess has never honoured me with any conversation on that subject for many years past; I believe I might say for above twenty years past. And, my lords, that being the case, I must answer that question very doubtfully, because I cannot trust my own memory; but after having the solution which the learned counsel has given to my doubts, I mean not to conceal any thing from your lordships; thinking it right to be examined, I think it right to give frank answers; and any doubt in any thing I say will arise from my not remembering well the circumstance.

The duchess of Kingston many (I should not say too many, if I was to say thirty) years ago, did intrust me with a circumstance in her life, relative to an engagement of a matrimonial kind with the earl of Bristol, then Mr. Hervey. Whether it did amount to a marriage according to law; whether it was a good marriage or not; or whether there was any marriage at all, I really cannot pretend to say. As far as my memory serves me with relation to what she was pleased to communicate to me, I should, from ignorance of law, and what is a good marriage in law, be doubtful. But the duchess did communicate to me, that a matrimonial engagement had passed between her and Mr. Hervey; but whether it amounted to a marriage or not, I am not lawyer or civilian enough to judge.

Q. That had passed?

A. She spoke of it as the engagement whatever it was, as of a trivial circumstance which had passed.

Q. Did his lordship ever understand that there was issue of that marriage?

A. Upon my word I cannot say. I do not know that the duchess ever made any communication of that sort to me. I had heard of it in the world, but I do not know that the duchess ever communicated to me the circumstance of her having had any issue.

Q. Does his lordship know any thing of of a bond entered into on the part of the prifoner at the bar, of late years, relative to the fuppreffion of evidence, or the payment of cofts of fuit in the ecclefiaftical court?

A. I never had the leaft communication with the duchefs of Kingfton, or from any perfon relative to any thing of the kind. I do not recollect that I ever heard of any fuch thing, even in the world. And the duchefs of Kingfton has never communicated to me, in the courfe of her life, to the beft of my memory or belief, any thing which was, at the time ſhe was pleaſed to communicate it to me, in the leaſt a deviation from the ſtrictest rules of virtue, of morality, and of religion.

My lords, Is it too much to beg that what I have ſaid at the bar may be read over to me? Part of it is of a nice nature. I may have expreſſed myſelf improperly. The writer may have taken it down erroneouſly. I ſhould be glad to have it read over to me, that I may correct it in your lordſhips preſence.

(Here the univerſal voice was, “ read, read !” But lord Barrington ſpared the houſe the trouble, by addreſſing himſelf to their lordſhips as follows :)

My lords, I find by the clerk, that the part which is of the nicest kind, with relation to me, wherein I expreſſed the difficulties and feelings I had on the ſubject of queſtions that I thought I ought not to answer, and why, and on what ground, I have ſince thought it my duty, underſtanding that my oath obliges me to it, to give my answer, I find, my lords, that part has not been taken down by the clerk; and therefore, I ſhall give your lordſhips no farther trouble.

Judith Philips. I was the widow of the rev. Mr. Ames.—I remember the time when my huſband married Mr. Hervey and the lady at the bar:—I was not preſent, but heard him ſay ſo.—Some time after the lady came down and ſent word to my houſe, ſhe would be glad to wait upon me; I ſaw her; ſhe asked me if I could get my huſband to give her a certificate of her marriage, producing at the ſame time a piece of parchment written upon, with a ſtamp:—I ſaid I thought he would:—However, Mr. Merrel who was with her, ſaid ſhe had better conſult his attorney from Worceſter, whether that would be the beſt way; accordingly the attorney was ſent for; he adviſed a register-book to be brought, and for my huſband to enter the marriage in that book along with ſome burials which had lately happened in the pariſh.—[Book produced].—That is the book, and the hand writing of my late huſband.

Croſs Examination.

Counſel. By what means do you live? —By my own private fortune.—Who are you married to now?—A graſtier, who lives at Britol.—Was not your preſent huſband ſteward to the late duke of Kingſton?—He was.—Was he not diſcharged by him?—No: he thought the duke looked cool upon him, and therefore wrote a letter and diſcharged himſelf.—Where do you now live in town? —At various places.—Where generally? —At the turf coffee-houſe.—Who do you underſtand is to pay your expences there?—I don’t know.—Don’t you know that Mr. Meadows the proſecutor, is?—I do not.—How often have you ſeen Mr. Meadows there?—Twice or three times at the houſe—frequently in the yard.—Did he never make you any promiſe of reward for your ſervices?—Never.—Did you ever ſee him at Mr. Foſſard’s, in Piccadilly?—Once on Chriſtmas day laſt, by accident.

Withdrew.

Rev. Mr. Inchin, and Rev. Mr. John Dennis, clergymen of Hampſhire, proved the hand-writing of the Rev. Mr. Ames.—A clerk from Doctour’s Commons proved the entry of a caveat to the duke’s will. The Rev. Mr. Trebeck of St. Margaret’s, Weſtmiſter, produced the book, in which the marriage of the duke of Kingſton to the lady at the bar was regiſtered on the 8th of March, 1769; and the rev. Mr. Samuel Harpur of the muſeum depoſed, that he performed the ceremony on that day as there entered; —all ordered to withdraw.—It being now ſeven o’clock, the lord high ſteward adjourned until Monday morning.

Monday, April 22.

The court being met, agreeable to adjournment, and the attorney general having acquainted their lordſhips that the evidence in behalf of the proſecution was cloſed; the prifoner was called upon by the lord high ſteward to make her defence; ſhe roſe and read it to their lordſhips; it was compoſed of a variety of matter; it opened with an account of her family, which, though not ennobled, was as ancient and reſpectable a private family as any in the iſland: ſhe gave a ſhort genealogy of it, and recounted ſome of the ſervices which her anceſtors had rendered to their king and country; ſhe referred particularly to one of them, a knight of the name, who had ſignally diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the performance of his duty during the civil wars; she informed their lordships, that she was the daughter of the hon. colonel Chudleigh, and that when she came into public life to act for herself, she was possessed of the remains of the ancient patrimony of her family; that early in life she entered into the service of her much honoured royal mistress, the late princess dowager of Wales, in which respectable situation she remained for upwards of twenty years; that soon after her establishment in the princess's family, she got acquainted with Mr. Hervey, now earl of Bristol; that in whatever nature her connection with that gentleman might appear to their lordships, she appealed to the searcher of all hearts that she was never satisfied in her own mind, either in respect of what had happened then or afterwards, that it amounted to a marriage; that being thus situated, and looking upon herself as a single woman, and the late duke of Kingston having paid his addresses as such, she first conceived thoughts of securing herself against any consequences which might follow from an engagement which she never thought binding in the sight of either God or man, to whose awful tribunal she now solemnly appealed to witness the truth of what she said; that stimulated by the legitimate attachment she had for the duke of Kingston, she consented to institute a suit in the ecclesiastical court, where, after the fullest and most mature consideration of the most able civilians, men of the highest reputation in their profession as advocates, or in their judicial capacity, her pretended marriage with Mr. Hervey was declared by sentence of the ecclesiastical court null and void; that being determined to have every conscientious, as well as legal sanction, she desired doctor Collier, who was her advocate, before a licence was obtained, to lay the whole proceedings before the archbishop of Canterbury, who was so kind and condescending as to promise he would look over them, and give his opinion relative to the contents; that accordingly his grace, after looking over them, returned the papers to doctor Collier, with the most decisive and unreserved assurance, that he thought she was at liberty to marry, and that the sentence was supported on grounds equally clear, legal, and conscientious; that in pursuance of his grace's opinion, he granted a special licence, and delivered it to doctor Collier for the marriage with her late husband the duke of Kingston; that none of the circumstances now related were transacted in the dark, but were known to her late husband, who was particularly informed of every step taken in the prosecution of the business from its very first commencement, and of every previous matter on which the cause in the ecclesiastical court proceeded. Their present majesties, and her late royal mistress the princess dowager of Wales, on her marriage, gave her every gracious mark of their favour and esteem, and publicly recognized her as duchess of Kingston, the latter being particularly acquainted with the circumstances of her pretended connection with Mr. Hervey. Under such sanctions, such motives for the part she took, still strengthened by a sentence which had been looked on as binding and conclusive for upwards of seven centuries, if she erred, or that their lordships should think she was guilty, on any rigid principle of law, which she trusted they would not, she hoped, nay she was certain, they would impute it to the mere effect of an erroneous judgment, proceeding from mistaken counsel and advice, and not to premeditated or intentional guilt.

The prisoner then went into an examination of the legal effect of her evidence, and repeated several arguments urged by her counsel on the construction of the statute on which she was indicted; but as they have already appeared so often in the course of the pleadings inserted in the papers, we shall decline repeating them here.

She then proceeded to justify her conduct during the life of her late husband, on whom she bestowed the most high and lavish encomiums. She assured their lordships, that he always behaved towards her in the most tender and affectionate manner; yet she solemnly affirmed, in the presence of Almighty God, that she never abused the ascendancy she had over him to base or improper purposes. Whatever marks of unbounded regard he had manifested for her in the distribution of his fortune, flowed spontaneously from himself; and instead of urging him to the ample provision he made for her in the event of his decease, it was she that refused to acquiesce in his first intentions, that of making her the possessor of his whole fortune, without any reserve or subsequent devise over. That if she was guilty of avariciously engrossing every thing to herself, instead of having her present fortune only for life, she could have had it in perpetuity, and have had it in her power to have enriched her own family, to the utter disappointment and undoing of those, who, from motives which they ought to be ashamed of, were now persecuting her in the most violent and relentless manner. If in the event of her decease the duke had passed over his eldest nephew, that was not her fault. It was his nephew's own fault, who, by his disrespectful conduct to her, had disobliged him, and it could hardly be imagined that she was displeased at a distribution, which gave the preference to a person who had always continued to conduct himself towards her in a manner perfectly agreeable to what his grace was desirous of, that of paying her the respect and attention due to the relation she stood in, as being married to his uncle.

After having dwelt pretty fully on this point, she took notice of what had passed since, previously observing, how unfair and ungenerous it was to wait for her husband's death, in order to crush her when deprived of that protection and support he would have given her against the malice and revenge of her enemies. She said, that her motive for living abroad was falsely imputed to her intentions of avoiding the effect of the present prosecution. Nothing could be worse founded, and the event had proved it. She went to Italy for the benefit of her health, and settled at Rome for her residence; yet as soon as she learned that a criminal prosecution was set up against her, instead of avoiding the consequences, and conscious of her own innocence, she made a journey from that city at the imminent hazard of her life, and cheerfully submitted everything that was dear to her, and above all her honour and reputation, into the hands of that august assembly. It could not have been any solicitude about her fortune that prevailed on her to return. Though she had been outlawed, the effects of it could have never reached her, so as to induce her to undergo a public trial. She had an ample provision, independent of any thing she possessed in this country. On the very day of her departure from Rome, she had upwards of seventy thousand pounds lodged in the bank, besides about three thousand pounds due to her on an open account with her bankers: she trusted therefore, that their lordships would give her full credit, that no consideration operated so strongly on her conduct, as an eager desire of submitting herself to that august assembly, whose awful judgment she now waited, and would acquiesce in with pleasure, because she was fully convinced, let it be for condemnation or acquittal, it would be founded equally in wisdom and justice. Finally she trusted, that their lordships would take her whole case under consideration; that they would have a retrospect to the purity of her motives, to the rectitude of her intentions in the proceedings of the ecclesiastical court; the conviction arising from law and conscience under which she acted; and on the whole, if she acted erroneously, and not intentionally, that they would not punish error as direct intentional guilt, but would give judgment with their wonted wisdom, tempered with mercy.

Mr. Wallace was called on by the lord high steward, if he had any witnesses, to produce them, and proceed in the defence.

On an attempt made by Mr. Wallace to have Dr. Collier examined out of court, on account of his indisposition, lord Fauconbergh said he thought it would be a very great hardship if the prisoner should be deprived of the doctor's testimony. It seemed to him very material to have the doctor examined, no matter in what mode.

Mr. Wallace proposed, that counsel on both side should repair to the doctor, which would answer all the substantial ends of an examination in open court, as the counsel for the prosecution might, if they pleased, cross examine him.

The prisoner at the beginning of this conversation addressed the court in a short but sensible and pathetic speech, delivered on memory, with all the graces and elocution of a real orator. The substance of it was, that Dr. Collier was the gentleman she employed in the suit in the ecclesiastical court, as her advocate; that he could confirm every matter urged in her defence, so far as the same related to the proceedings and sentence of that court, and the subsequent conduct of the most reverend prelate who granted the special licence. That she trusted their lordships would, for those very important reasons, indulge her with having so strong a testimony of her innocence in her favour, as that of the very person who had so repeatedly urged both to her husband, the late duke of Kingston, and herself, the validity and conclusiveness of the sentence in the ecclesiastical court in bar of all future proceedings.

A conversation was again commenced, in which the dukes of Richmond and Manchester, Manchester, lords Ravensthorpe, Buckingham, and several others, bore a part.

Lord Camden. I most earnestly wish, that the prisoner should be granted every possible indulgence it is in your lordships power to give her; but, for my part, in all my practice or knowledge as a judge, I do not recollect a single instance of a person, on a criminal prosecution, being examined, but in open court, in the presence of the witness.

It was insisted by two or three noble lords who first spoke on the subject, that the indulgence desired by the prisoner should be granted.

Lord Camden. There is now no question before your lordships, and if there was, this would be a very improper place to debate it. The mode, as your lordships all know, prescribed by our form of proceeding, is to move an adjournment, and consider of the question, be it what it may, in our own house. For my part in my practice as a lawyer, in my office as a judge, or in the whole course of my profession or reading, I never heard or read, any precedent, which will authorize the mode of examination now proposed by the counsel at the bar. The noble lord who presides here this day, knows very well, that in the court where he sits as the first law officer in the kingdom, and where I had once the honour myself to preside, though I never desire to do so again, that interrogatories in civil cases are taken in the absence of the other party; but I will appeal to his grace's very extensive knowledge and great experience, if he recollects any one instance, either in books, or practice, in which any thing like the present was permitted in a court of criminal law. No, my lords; I shall set my face against it, and shall endeavour to defeat any such attempt. Your lordships are now sitting as a court of criminal judicature, and as such you are bound by the law of the land. The common law of this realm says, that in all criminal cases, affecting life, liberty, or property, the witness shall deliver his testimony viva voce, in open court, in order that he may be cross-examined, that the truth may be sifted from him, that the whole may be done in the presence of the prisoner, and that he may be confronted with those who contradict him, if thought necessary. Such, my lords, is the course of the common law, in our courts of criminal judicature: and such, I hope, they will ever remain. Only consider, my lords, what a dangerous precedent it might establish, contrary to ancient usage; and how nearly such an unconstitutional mode of proceeding might affect your lordships and your posterity, possibly to authorize a precedent, for deciding on your lives and fortunes, by partial depositions taken in a private chamber, by which means you would be the only description or class of men who would be debarred the peculiar rights of Englishmen; that of a fair, open and constitutional trial.

Some little time after, however, Dr. Warren being sworn, proved Dr. Collier was so ill, that he could not come without great danger of his life.

The counsel still urging questions to the physician, the duke of Richmond got up, and objected to any other questions being put; said he had given a very satisfactory reason on oath, for his not being able to appear, and that was all that could be required.

Lord high Steward. Mr. Wallace, go on with your evidence. Here Mr. Wallace stated the nature of the evidence he intended to call, which was confined only to two points; to prove Mrs. Craddock had told several persons, that she did not remember any thing of the marriage, and that she had likewise declared she expected to be provided for in consequence of the present trial; and to invalidate Judith Phillips's evidence by a letter which he meant to produce. The duke of Richmond here observed, that a part of what the counsel had now stated, as said by one of the evidence, was not as yet taken down. Mr. Gurney, the shorthand writer, was applied to to read his notes, but he not having that part with him, sent for it. The duke of Manchester then read the evidence from his notes, confirming the duke of Richmond's observation.

Whilst the book was fetching, the clerk read a letter from Judith Phillips to the lady at the bar, requesting her interest with the duke, to prevent her husband being discharged, though she deposed yesterday that he discharged himself from the duke's service.—Gurney's notes being brought, the part alluded to by the duke of Richmond was read, and agreed entirely with what his grace had said. Mr. Wallace therefore making an apology, for stating it from his memory erroneously, began to examine his evidence.

Mr. Berkeley. I am an Attorney, my Lords, to the Earl of Bristol, and therefore conceive I should not be obliged to reveal what passed between us.

nies are not bound to give in evidence the advice they gave their clients, either to the conviction of their employer or themſelves, but in matters of collateral facts not ſo reſpecting either, they are by no means exempt from giving their teſtimony.

House. Go on! Go on!

Mr. Wallace. Do you know Lord Briſtol?—I do; I am his Attorney.—Were you ever employed by him to wait upon Mrs. Craddock?—I was.—What was the Conſequence of it?

Mr. Berkley. I waited upon Mrs. Craddock from Lord Briſtol, who told me he wanted to obtain a divorce, and that ſhe was the only perſon who was preſent at the marriage. When I ſaw her, which was juſt before the commencement of the Jaſtification Suit, ſhe told me, the marriage muſt have been a long time ago; that her memory was bad, and ſhe could not remember any thing about it—(Lord Briſtol was preſent, and ſeemed aſtoniſhed).—This is all I know about it, for the affair was afterwards taken out of my hands and carried to the Proctors in Doctor's Commons.—Withdraw.

Mrs. Ann Pritchard. I know Mrs. Craddock; ſhe told me ſhe expected to be provided for after the trial: It is about three months ſince ſhe told me this at my houſe at Mile End; and further that ſhe expected a place in the Cuſtom-houſe for one of her family: I aſked her then to come and ſee me; ſhe ſaid ſhe could not till the affair was over.—Withdraw.

Lord High Steward. Mr. Wallace, have you any more evidence to call?

Mr. Wallace. I ſhall not trouble the Houſe with any more.

Mr. Solicitor General. The evidence we have produced, ſtanding ſo clear and uncontroverted from any thing offered on the other ſide, and the defence lately read by the priſoner, being ſo totally vague and unargumentative, I ſhall not trouble your Lordſhips with a ſingle word in reply.

Lord High Steward. My Lords, is it your pleaſure to adjourn to the Chamber of Parliament?

House. Ay! Ay!—The court adjourned accordingly, and, after ſome time, the Houſe was adjourned again to Weſtmiſter-Hall.

Lord High Steward. Your Lordſhips have heard the evidence on both ſides: and the ſolemnity of your proceedings requires that your Lordſhips opinions on the queſtion, of Guilty, or Not Guilty, ſhould be delivered ſeverally in the abſence of the priſoner, beginning with the junior Baron; and that the priſoner ſhould afterwards be acquainted with the reſult of thoſe opinions by me. I ſit your Lordſhips pleaſure to proceed now to give your opinions on the queſtion, of Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Lords. Ay, ay.

Then the Lord High Steward ſtood up uncovered; and, beginning with the junior Baron, ſaid, John Lord Sundridge, (Duke of Argyll) What ſays your Lordſhip? Is the priſoner at the bar guilty of the felony whereof ſhe ſtands indicted?

Whereupon John Lord Sundridge, ſtanding up in his place, uncovered, and laying his right hand upon his breaſt, answered GUILTY, upon my HONOUR!—

The ſame queſtion being put to all the reſt of the Peers, except the Biſhops, who excuſed themſelves from returning into court, reſerving at the ſame time their ſalvo jure, they all in the ſame manner declared the priſoner Guilty, upon their Honour! except the Duke of Newcaſtle, who gave this ſpecial verdict—Guilty by accident, but not with intent, upon my Honour!—After the Duke of Cumberland had delivered his verdict, the Lord High Steward, ſtanding uncovered at the chair, laying his hand upon his breaſt, ſaid;

Lord High Steward. My Lords, I am of opinion that the priſoner is guilty of the Felony whereof ſhe ſtands indicted, upon my Honour.

Lord High Steward. Your Lordſhips have found that the priſoner is guilty of the Felony whereof ſhe ſtands indicted: Is it your Lordſhips pleaſure that ſhe ſhould be called in, and acquainted therewith?

Lords. Ay, ay.

Proclamation was then made for the Deputy Uſher of the Black Rod to bring the priſoner to the bar, which was done as before.

Lord High Steward. Madam, the Lords have conſidered of the charge and evidence brought againſt you, and have likewiſe conſidered of every thing which you have alledged in your defence, and upon the whole their Lordſhips have found you guilty of the felony whereof you ſtand indicted. What have you to alledge againſt judgment being pronounced upon you?

Upon which the priſoner delivered in a paper, which was thus read by the Clerk of the crown:

"I plead the privilege of the Peerage."

Here

Here the Attorney-General got up, and objected to the plea; urging, that as a woman she could not be intitled to the benefit of the clergy, and read innumerable quotations from the statutes, and other authorities, in support of his objection. He spoke on this point full an hour. Mr. Solicitor-General likewise stood up, and produced an argument in support of the objection. Mr. Wallace confessed he was not prepared for such a proceeding; said it was stolen upon him in an underhand manner; however, he would venture to affirm, that neither their objections nor arguments had any ground in law, and therefore must fall of themselves.—Mr. Mansfield entered more fully into the defence of the prisoner's plea, and clearly proved that it was not to be set aside.

This question having been fully agitated by the counsel at the bar, the Lord High Steward again adjourned the court to the Chamber of Parliament, where as soon as they arrived, the opinion of the judges was taken, which unanimously decreed the prisoner's plea legal. Upon this the court was again resumed in Westminster-Hall, and the prisoner put to the bar.

Lord High Steward. “Madam, your plea has been taken into consideration by their Lordships, and they have agreed to allow it; however, I must likewise tell you, that such plea will not avail you in future, for upon the commission of a similar crime, you cannot plead it a second time, and therefore the offence will be capital. The law, madam, lets you off this time without punishment; but the feelings of your own conscience will amply supply that defect.—You are discharged, madam, out of custody, by paying your fees.”

Lord High Steward. My Lords, this trial being ended, nothing remains to be done here, but to determine the commission.

Lords. Ay, ay.

On this, proclamation was made for dissolving the commission, after which the White Staff being delivered to the Lord High Steward by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod upon his knee, his Grace stood up uncovered, and holding the staff in both hands, broke it in two, declaring the commission dissolved; then leaving the chair, he came down to the Woolpack, and said, Is it your Lordships pleasure to adjourn to the Chamber of Parliament?

Lords. Ay, ay.

Lord High Steward. This House is adjourned to the Chamber of Parliament.

The Peers and others then returned to the Chamber of Parliament, in the same order they came down, except his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland, who walked after the Lord Chancellor, taking rank of him, the commission being now ended.

Her Grace behaved with uncommon fortitude through the whole of this trying situation, except on receiving sentence, when she fainted away, and was carried out of the court.

The Counsel for the prosecutor, Evelyn Meadows, sen. and his wife, were, the Attorney and Solicitor General, Dr. Harris, Serj. Walker, Mr. Maddock, Mr. Dunning, and Mr. Hargrave; Mr. Roger Altham, as Proctor; Mr. Woodcock, Mr. Barnard, Solicitors; Augustine Greenland and John Chetham, Attornies for the prosecutor; Mr. Miller, Short-hand writer.

The Counsel for the Dukes of Kingston, were, Dr. Calvert, Dr. Wynne, Mr. Wallace, Mr. Mansfield, Serj. Davvy, Mr. Cox, Mr. Leigh, Mr. Buller, Mr. Hardinge; Mr. Bishop, as Proctor; Mr. Field, Solicitor; Mr. Gurney and Mr. Cawthorne, Short-hand writers on behalf of her Grace.

The British Theatre.

Covent Garden.

ON Monday the 8th ult. was performed at this Theatre, an after-piece of two Acts, called, Three Weeks after Marriage. It is said to have been taken from a Comedy, written by Mr. Murphy, which failed of success, on an idea that it contained some personalities unfit for public representation. Whatever merit it might have had in its original form, we do not pretend to say, but in its present dress we do not hesitate to pronounce it one of the best Farces, or Comedies of two Acts, to borrow a modern phrase from the modern Playwrights, that has appeared for some time.

The main part of the business is confined to the Father of Lady Racket, and Sir Charles her Husband. The story is shortly this :---The old Citizen's daughter is married before the action commences, to Sir Charles Racket, a Man of Fashion. They are represented as living in great harmony, till a difference of opinion arises relative to the propriety of playing a hand of whist. This produces warmth on both sides, which at length breaks out into ill humour, and mutual upbraidings. Sir Charles resolves at length to quit his father-in-law's house, at a late hour of the night, bid an adieu to his lady, and never see her more. In this resolution the old man and his wife, hearing of the unhappy rupture, interfere, and insist on knowing what their daughter has done to merit the displeasure of her husband. He, in answer, makes general charges; says he has detected her, and that Lady Racket is a vile woman. The surprise is here very artfully kept up for some time, on a supposition that Sir Charles's complaint is of a criminal nature, till at last the matter coming fully to be explained, the whole point in issue is found to be no more than whether a club or a diamond should have been played, in order to prevent the adverse party from getting the odd trick. The astonishment which seizes the old Citizen, on this occasion, is beyond description, and the observations he makes on the cause of quarrel truly pointed, and worthy of the pen of the supposed author. The couple are again reconciled, when the same subject a second time is introduced, and the same consequences attend it. Taking the cause of quarrel, with the several circumstances attending it, the English drama does not furnish a single instance in which a matter of so trivial a nature is wrought up into an hour's entertainment with more judgment, or perhaps with equal success. There are besides several other incidents in the Piece.

A mu-

A musical Entertainment called, Don Quixote, has also been performed here during this month, for the benefit of Mr. Reinhold. We apprehend that this Piece has already been performed as a Burletta, at Marybone Gardens; though we are told in Mr. Reinhold's advertisements, it never had been performed before. It is founded on that part of the history of Don Quixote, where he watches his armour in the inn-yard, as a candidate for knighthood; and where the women play many droll and merry tricks, as related by the humorous Cervantes. This author took it into his head to imitate an original, to whom he bears not the least resemblance. We hoped to have found Cervantes travestied; but he is hewed and hacked in the most disagreeable manner. The Burletta writer has taken a very uncommon liberty with his original, by changing the conclusion of the incidents at the inn; for Terefa and Maritornes, whom he converts into aerial spirits, persuade Don Quixote and Sancho to quit their adventures and go home.

The music is in some parts very good; in others but indifferent. English recitative is seldom tolerable to those who have been accustomed to the Italian; owing, we suppose, more to the difference in the languages, than in the talents of composers. Many of the songs are very well set, and are worthy of Dr. Arnold, who seems to have mispent his time and talents on this piece, which in the title page is very properly said to be, even with the assistance of his music, Vox & praterrea nihil.

Drury-Lane.

The only novelty which has made its appearance at this Theatre, during the course of this month, is a new Farce, called, Love's Metamorphoses.

It would be taking up the room which we wish to allot to more useful or entertaining articles, if we were to dwell on the subject of this piece.-- The plot of it is ridiculously improbable, that two sentimental lovers should be inspired at the same time, with the same desire of appearing before each other, in exactly the same disguise. Besides, the several characters are so ill preserved, the servants and masters hardly ever appearing as such, that if the performers had not been in the favour of the public, and was it not a rule never to damn at a Benefit, this poor thing would have had its fate.

Masquerade Intelligence.

From the various accounts given of the very elegant preparations at Carlisle-house for the Masquerade on Wednesday evening the 24th ult. the public expectation was highly raised, and in about an hour after the doors were opened, the lower range of rooms were much crowded. In these rooms different bands of music were placed, and in the concert room side-boards were placed, where female servants attended, uniformly dressed, to serve the company with tea, lemonade, &c. Soon after one the supper rooms were opened, when the beholders were struck with astonishment: all round the great ball-room palm-trees were placed at equal distances, whose branches joined each other at the top; in the middle of the room was displayed a number of alcoves, decorated with festoons and lamps of various colours, and at the upper end of the room was placed a spiral pillar of lights, which had an amazing fine effect. The Chinese room was changed into a real garden, the sides being filled with shrubs and flowers, and at one end were placed a great number of flower-pots; in the centre was placed a temporary building, on which stood a table for the reception of company; in the middle of this was a reservoir of water, in which gold and silver fish were swimming.

The company consisted of about 800 persons, but the characters were few, and those but indifferently supported, so that every one was better pleased with the elegance of the decorations than with themselves. The dances did not begin till near four o'clock, at which time several of the masks retired, though the house was not cleared till between nine and ten.

Among the characters were the following:—two double masks, one an old woman behind and a girl before, the other half man and half woman; a Devil, not very mischievous; a Punch, who made noise enough; a Radish Woman; a Waterman; a Waggoner; a Hay-maker; a Female without any covering beyond her stays and petticoats; several Nuns, theatrical characters, and Ladies in very elegant fancy dresses.

IN all the vast extent of Canada, there are but three radical or mother tongues, the Siouise, the Algonquin, and Huron. As to the first, it is impossible to say how far it extends ; and neither French nor English are much acquainted with those who speak it. By an acquaintance with the other two a man may travel fifteen hundred leagues in this country without an interpreter ; for though he may visit above an hundred different nations, each of which has a particular idiom, yet he can make himself understood by all ; even among the Indians of New England and Virginia. The Siouffe, as far as the Europeans are acquainted with it, is rather a hissing than an articulation of words ; but the Huron language has great energy, pathos, and elevation, and the Algonquin excels in smoothness and elegance.
to

By the capitulation granted to the French, when this country was reduced, both individuals and communities are entitled to all their former rights and privileges : the Roman Catholic is still to continue the established religion, but the king of Great Britain succeeds to all the powers and prerogatives of which his most Christian Majesty was possessed *. Since Canada became a colony of Great Britain, it has been divided into the three governments of Quebec, Montreal, and Trois Rivières.

The French, before the late war broke out, it is said, imported from Canada, including Louisiana, in beaver, seventy-five thousand pounds ; in other furs, forty thousand pounds ; in deer skins, twenty thousand pounds ; total, a hundred and thirty-five thousand pounds : while the English, in the same articles, imported only to the amount of about ninety thousand pounds.

Nova Scotia.

Nova Scotia, or New Scotland, by the French called Acadie, is bounded by the bay of St. Laurence and the Atlantic Ocean to the east ; by the same ocean, and New England to the south ; by the river St. Laurence on the north ; and by Canada on the west ; being computed to be five hundred miles in length, and four hundred in breadth. It had the name of Nova Scotia from Sir William Alexander, a Scotchman, and secretary to king James I. who had the first grant of lands in it.

By the twelfth article of the treaty of Utrecht, all the province of Nova Scotia, or L'Acadie, with all its antient boundaries ; also the city of Port Royal, now called Annapolis Royal, with all its dependencies in lands, islands, and other particulars, together with the dominion, property, and possession of the said islands, lands, and other rights, by treaty or otherwise obtained, was ceded in perpetuity to the crown of Great Britain. To this was subjoined an exclusion of the subjects of France from fishing on the coast of Nova Scotia, or within thirty leagues, beginning from Cape Sable, and stretching along to the south-west. A regiment was then sent over to take possession of Annapolis, the capital, but no provision was made to plant the rest of Nova Scotia till the year 1749, when about three thousand English families, under the command of governor Cornwallis, were sent thither, and erected the town of Halifax, in Chebucto bay, and since that several other embarkations have been made. In the late war, one of the disputes between Great Britain and France was about the boundaries of Nova Scotia, which the British commissaries demonstrated to extend to the river St. Laurence on the north, by several treaties between the two nations : whereas the French insisted, that only part of the peninsula was ceded to Great Britain ; but it is to be hoped, this dispute hath been finally decided by the event of the last war. As the French, who were settled in Nova Scotia, without regarding the oaths they had taken to the king of Great Britain, had constantly adhered to France, it was thought fit, upon the last reduction of it, to remove them from thence, and disperse them in the rest of the British plantations.

Writers differ no less about the quality than the extent of this country ; some describing it as scarce fit for the residence of the most barbarous savages, while others extol its fertility. Baron la Honton, a French writer of credit, many years resident in the country, tells us, that it abounds with little rivers, the entrance of which affords anchorage for the largest vessels ; that they are full of salmon, and that most of the gulphs and rivers, with which they communicate, yield great plenty of cod. He further observes, that almost every part of Acadia produces, or is capable of producing, corn, fruit, pease, and other pulse ; that the four seasons of the year are easily distinguished ; that the winter is very severe for three months ; that the country yields excellent timber for masts ; and, upon occasion, for building

ing any kind of shipping. The baron also affirms, that Nova Scotia is admirable for hunting, and speaks of it, in general, as a fine country, the air pure and salubrious, the climate tolerably moderate, and the water light and pellucid. With this gentleman the intelligent Charlevoix agrees, alledging it abounds with all the necessaries of life, and that the inhabitants may live very comfortably without much fatigue. Here is abundance of feathered game, such as partridges, ducks, teal, wildgeons, and bustard; the latter flock in such crowds to the banks of the rivers, and all the ponds, in the month of April, that their eggs alone are sufficient to subsist the inhabitants for that season; and yet, notwithstanding the extraordinary consumption of these eggs, it is not perceivable that the species are diminished. At the close of March the fish begin to spawn, when they enter the river in such shoals as are incredible. Herrings come up in April, and the sturgeon and salmon in May. Here are also multitudes of deer, beaver, otters, and some other quadrupeds, highly valued for their furs; and one of the finest cod fisheries in the world upon the coast. Though the winters are severe, yet they are very supportable, in consequence of the great plenty of fuel; and as the timber is not only fit for building, but also yields pitch and tar, and the soil is proper for hemp and flax, all manner of naval stores may be produced here.

A great part of this country consists of the peninsula that is formed by the bay of Fundy, Chenigto, and Green Bay; all the coast of which, from Cape Sable on the west, to Cape Canso on the east, is lined with shoals or sands. Besides the Bays above-mentioned there is a great number of others all along the coast, particularly those of Gaspe, Chaleurs, and Chedibucto, on the north-east; the bay of Islands, Chebucto, and La Here, on the south; and the bay of Annapolis on the south side of the bay of Fundy. In these bays, and other parts of the coast, are many fine roads and havens. The chief capes are those of Rosieres and Gaspe on the north-east; Capes Portage, Ecoumenac, Tourmentin, Port, Epis, Fogery, and Canso, on the east; Capes Blanco, Vert, Theodore, Dore, la Hevo, and Negro, on the south; Cape Sable, and Cape Fourche, on the south-west. The rivers and lakes are very numerous. Of the former, the most considerable are those of St. John, Passamagnadi, Penobscot, and St. Croix, which run from north to south, and fall into the bay of Fundy; and those of Risgouche, and Nipilignit, which run from west to east, and fall into the gulph of St. Laurence, and that of Chebucto, that falls into the Atlantic. Of the latter, those called Kefeben and Freneuse are very large; but there are many that have not yet received any particular names. As to the tribes of Indians in Nova Scotia, the most considerable, or at least those that are best known, are the Itchemins, Souriquois, and Mickmacks.

The country is said to be divided into twelve districts, each of which annually elects a deputy, who must be approved by the governor and council. This deputy is regarded as a kind of agent, or solicitor for the district, who reports its situation, from time to time, to the government; but they have not yet, we believe, any legislative or executive power. The most considerable places in this infant colony are, Halifax, Annapolis, Canso, St. John's, Minnes, and Chenigto.

Halifax is situated on Chebucto Bay, having a communication with all parts of the province, either by land carriage, the sea, or navigable rivers, with a fine harbour, where a small squadron of ships of war lies during the winter, and in summer puts to sea, under the command of a commodore, for the protection of the fishery, and to see that the articles of the late peace relating thereto are duly observed by the French. The river Chebucto is three miles broad at the town, near which is a small town called Dartmouth, a Dutch town, with an extensive common, corn-fields, and conveniencies for drying and curing fish. The number of the inhabitants is said to be about ten or twelve thousand, who live very comfortably by the trade they carry on in furs and naval stores, and by their fisheries. Here the governor and council reside, and a considerable garrison is kept. The town is also well fortified.

Annapolis stands on the east side of the bay of Fundy. Though but a small place, it has a noble harbour, capable of containing a thousand vessels at anchor, in the utmost security. Here also is a fort and garrison.

St. John's is a new settlement at the mouth of a river of that name, that falls into the bay of Fundy on the west side.

U u

Canso

Canfo is situated on an island at the east end of the peninsula, near the Strait of Fronsac, which divides Nova Scotia from Cape Breton. It may in time become a place of importance, on account of the excellent fishery in its neighbourhood, especially as the French have it not in their power now, as formerly, to disturb the fisheries, and encroach on the territories of the province, which has a prospect of enjoying peace many years, if it is not interrupted by the Indians.

Les Mines or Minnes, and Chenigto, lie towards the bottom of the bay of Fundy, on the east side, but are inconsiderable.

The most valuable appendage of Nova Scotia is the Cape Sable coast, along which is one continued range of cod fishing banks, and excellent harbours, tho' the impenetrable fogs, which for one part of the year obscure this country, render it of less utility to commerce and navigation.

New England.

New England, comprehending the colonies of Massachusetts's Bay, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Providence Plantation, is situated between 67 and 73 degrees of west longitude, and between 41 and 45 degrees of north latitude; bounded by Canada on the north-west; by Nova Scotia, or Acadia, on the north-east; by the Atlantic Ocean on the east and south; and by the province of New York on the west; being three hundred miles long, and from one hundred to two hundred broad.

In New England the summer is warm, but of short duration. For the space of two months the sky is perfectly clear, which renders the country so healthy, that it is reported to agree better with British constitutions than any other of the American provinces. The winters are long and severe, the wind often boisterous, and the air extremely sharp, but not intolerable. Naturalists ascribe the early approach, the length and severity of the winters, to the large fresh-water lakes lying to the north-west of New England, which being constantly frozen over from the beginning of November to June or July, occasion those piercing winds which prove so fatal to mariners on this coast. Towards the sea the land is generally low, and frequently marshy; but as you advance into the country it rises into hills, and on the north-east becomes altogether rocky and mountainous. Round Massachusetts's Bay the soil is black, and rich as in any part of England; and the first planters found the grass above a yard high, but rank, for want of mowing. The uplands are less fruitful, being for the most part a mixture of sand and gravel, inclining to clay.

The fruits of Old England come to great perfection here, particularly peaches and apples. Here are also all kinds of esculent plants, pulse, and corn; but Indian corn or maize, which the natives call weachin, is the most cultivated, and was the only kind known on the first arrival of the Europeans. This corn is of several colours, red, white, yellow, black, green, &c. and the diversity frequently appears not only in the same field, but in the very same ear, though white and yellow are the most common. Each ear, at a medium, produces about two hundred and forty grains, which is an astonishing increase. This corn the Indians boil till it is tender, and eat with fish, fowl, or flesh, as bread. Sometimes they bruise it in mortars and then boil it; but the most usual method is to dry the corn high, without burning it, then to beat it in mortars into fine meal, and sift it, which the Indians either eat dry or mixed with water. The English bake it in the same manner as flour; but the best food made from it is called samfi, being steeped in water for near half an hour, beat in a mortar, then sifted, boiled, and eaten with milk, or butter and sugar, like rice, which is not only an agreeable but a wholesome strengthening diet. The English also brew good strong beer from it.

New England abounds in excellent timber, oak, ash, pine, fir, cedar, elm, cypress, beech, walnut, chestnut, hazel, sassafras, sumach, and other woods used in dyeing or tanning leather, carpenters' work, and ship-building; yet such was the destruction made in the forests, that a law was passed to prevent the waste of woods, by inflicting penalties on those who cut down trees of a certain kind, before they were arrived at a specified growth and age. The oaks here are said to be inferior to those of Old England; but the firs are of a prodigious bulk, and furnish the royal navy of England with masts and yards; and they draw from these and other trees, pitch, tar, rosin, turpentine, gums, and balsam: the soil also producing hemp and flax, a ship may be built and rigged out with the produce thereof; and ship-building is actually a considerable employment in this country.

There is no where a greater abundance and variety of fowl than in New England; as geese, ducks, turkies, hens, partridges, widgeons, swans, herons, heath-cocks, pigeons, &c. nor is the feathered kind in greater plenty than quadrupeds, more immediately necessary to human subsistence and convenience. All kinds of European cattle thrive here, and multiply exceedingly: the horses of the province are hardy, mettlesome, and serviceable, but small. Here are also elks, deer, hares, rabbits, squirrels, beavers, otters, monkeys, raccoons, sables, bears, wolves, foxes, ounces, and a variety of other tame and wild quadrupeds; some of which are imported into Great Britain as foreign curiosities. But the most extraordinary of these animals is the moose, or moose deer; the black species of which, Mr. Josselin tells us, is about twelve feet high, with four horns, and broad palms, some distant near twelve feet from the tip of one horn to the other. His body is about the size of a bull, his neck resembles a stag's, his tail is somewhat longer, and his flesh extremely grateful. The light-coloured moose, called wampoon by the Indians, is of a smaller stature, and much more common than the black. The rattle-snake is another natural curiosity of New England, though not peculiar to it. Its length is about four or five feet, and its poison mortal in a few hours, unless proper remedies are applied; but it seldom attacks any human creature without provocation.

The seas round New England, as well as its rivers, abound with fish, and even whales of several kinds, viz. the whalebone whale, the spermaceti whale, which yields ambergrease, the fin-backed whale, the scrag whale, and the bunch whale, of which they take great numbers, and send besides some ships every year to fish for whales in Greenland. The bone of the New England whale, however, is said to be too brittle, and not so serviceable as that of Greenland. A terrible creature, called the whale-killer, from twenty to thirty feet long, with strong teeth and jaws, persecutes the whale in these seas; but afraid of his monstrous strength, they seldom attack a full-grown whale, or indeed a young one, but in companies of ten or twelve.

The principal rivers here are Connecticut, Thames, Patuxet, Merrimack, Piscataqua, Saco, Casco, Kennebeck, Penobscot, or Pentagonet. The most remarkable bays and harbours are those formed by Plymouth, Rhode Island, and Providence Plantations, Monument Bay, West Harbour, formed by the bending of Cape Cod, Boston Harbour, Piscataqua, and Casco Bay. The chief capes are, Cape Cod, Marble Head, Cape Anne, Cape Netick, Cape Porpus, Cape Elizabeth, and Cape Small Point.

LETTER IV.

On Polygamy—The Purchase of Wives—Aburd Matrimonial Customs in various Countries—On Divorces.

THE low condition of women among Barbarians introduced Polygamy, and the purchasing women to be wives. And the just respect paid to them, among civilised nations, restored the law of Nature, and confined a man to one wife. Their equality as to rank and dignity bars the man from taking another wife, as it bars the woman from taking another husband. We find traces in ancient History of Polygamy wearing out gradually. It wore out in Greece, as manners refined; but such was the influence of long habit, that, though a man was confined to one wife, concubines were indulged without limitation. In Germany, when Tacitus wrote, very few traces remained of Polygamy: He says, 'Marriage is there rigidly respected; nor is there any part of their morality more laudable: For they are almost the only race of Barbarians who are contented with a single wife; a very few excepted, who not from incontinency, but from an ambition of Nobility, take more wives than one.' When Polygamy was in that country so little practised, we may be certain the purchasing wives did not remain in vigour: And Tacitus accordingly, mentioning the general rule, 'The husband gives a dowry to the wife, but the wife brings none to the husband,' explains it away by observing, that the only dos given by the bridegroom were marriage-presents, and that he at the same time received marriage-presents on the bride's part. The equality of the matrimonial engagement, for the mutual benefit of husband and wife, was well understood among the Gauls. Cæsar says, 'What ever sum the husband has received, as his wife's portion, he allots as much from his own effects to be joined with it. An account is kept of this joint stock, and the fruits of it are preserved. Upon the death of either, the surviving spouse has the property of both the shares, with the fruits or profits.'

In Japan, and in Nicaragua, a man can have but one wife; but he may have many concubines. In Siam, Polygamy is still permitted, though the bride brings a dowry with her: But that absurdity is corrected by refined manners, it being held improper, and even disgraceful, to have more than one wife. The purchasing wives wore out of fashion among the ancient Tuscans; for it was held infamous, that marriage should be the result of any motive but mutual love. This at the same time put an end to Polygamy. Polygamy was probably early eradicated among the ancient Persians; for the bride's dowry was settled in marriage-articles, as among us. And there is the same reason for presuming, that it was not long permitted in Mexico; marriage there being solemnised by the Priest, and the bride's dower specified, which was restored in case of a separation. In the countries where the Christian Religion was first propagated, women were fast advancing to an equality with the men, and Polygamy was wearing out of fashion. The pure spirit of the Gospel hastened its downfall; and, though not prohibited expressly, it was however held, that Christianity is a religion too pure for Polygamy.

But, as hinted above, it was by slow degrees that the female sex emerged out of slavery, to possess the elevated state they justly are intitled to by Nature. The practice of exposing infants among the Greeks, and many other nations, is an invincible proof of their depression, even after the custom ceased of purchasing them. It is wisely ordered by Providence, that the affection of a woman to her children commences with their birth, because during infancy all depends on her care. As during that period the father is of little use to his child, his affection is extremely slight till the child begin to prattle and shew some fondness for him. The exposing an infant therefore shews, that the mother was little regarded: If she had been allowed a vote, the practice never would have obtained in any country. In the first book of the Iliad, Achilles say to Agamemnon, who threatened to force from him his Mistress Briseis, 'Another thing

I will tell thee: Record it in thy soul. For a woman these hands shall never fight, with thee nor with thy foes. Come, seize Briseis: Ye Argives, take the prize ye gave. But beware of other spoil, which lies stowed in my ships on the shore. I will not be plundered farther. If other be thy thoughts, Atrides, come in arms, a trial make: These very slaves of thine shall behold thy blood pouring around my spear.' The Comedies of Menander, Philemon, and Diphilus, are lost; but manners must have been little polished in their time, so far as can be conjectured from their translators or imitators, Plautus and Terence. Married women in their Comedies are sometimes introduced, and treated with very little respect. A man commonly vents his wrath on his wife, and scolds her as the cause of the misconduct of their children. A lady, perhaps too inquisitive about her husband's amours, is scolded by him in the following words:

'Would you be held a wife and virtuous spouse,

And of discretion due, observe this counsel:

Whatever I, your Lord, blame or approve,

Still let your praise or censure be the same. But harkee,—be this reprimand the last: If you again offend, no more a wife

Within these walls;—your father has you back.'

One will not be surpris'd, that women in Greece were treated with no great respect by their husbands. A woman cannot have much attraction who passes all her time in solitude: To be admired, she must receive the high polish of Society. At the same time, men of fashion were so much improved in manners as to relish Society with agreeable women, where such could be found. And hence the figure that Courtizans made at that period, especially in Athens. They studied the temper and taste of the men, and endeavoured to gain their affection by every winning art. The daily conversations they listened to on Philosophy, Politics, Poetry, enlightened their understanding and improved their taste. Their houses became agreeable schools, where every one might be instructed in his own art. Socrates and Pericles met frequently at the house of Aspasia: From her they acquired delicacy of taste, and in return procured to her public respect and reputation. Greece at that time was governed by Orators, over whom some celebrated Courtizans had great influence, influence, and by that means entered deep into the Government. It was said of the famous Demolthenes, 'The measure he hath meditated on, for a year, will be overturned in a day by a woman.' It appears accordingly from Plautus and Terence, that Athenian Courtezans lived in great splendor.

I proceed to the other cause of Polygamy, mentioned also above, viz. opulence in a hot climate. Men there have a burning appetite for animal enjoyment; and women become old and lose the prolific quality, not long after the age of maturity in a temperate climate. These circumstances dispose men of opulence to purchase their wives, that they may not be confined to one; and purchase they must, for no man, without a valuable consideration, will surrender his daughter to be one of many who are destined to gratify the carnal appetite of one man. The numerous wives and concubines in Asiatic harems are all of them purchased with money. In the hot climate of Hindostan, Polygamy is universal, and men buy their wives. The same obtains in China. After the price is adjusted and paid, the bride is conducted to the bridegroom's house locked in a sedan, and the key delivered to him: If he be not satisfied with his bargain, he sends her back at the expence of losing the sum he paid for her: If satisfied, he feasts his male friends in one room, and the her female friends in another. A man who has little substance takes a wife for his son from an hospital, which saves him a dowry.

It has been pleaded for Polygamy in warm climates, that women are fit for being married at or before the age of ten, and past child-bearing at twenty-five, while men are yet in the prime of life; and therefore that a second wife ought to be permitted, who can bear children. Is then the interest of the female sex to be totally disregarded in the matrimonial engagement, as if women were intended by Nature for beasts of burthen only? But, even putting them out of the question, it ought to be considered, that a man, by taking a second wife, deprives some other of the privilege all men have to be married. The argument indeed would be conclusive, were ten females born for one male, as is said to be case in Bantam: But, as an equality of males and females is the destination of Nature, the argument has no force. All men are born equal by Nature; and to permit Polygamy, in any degree, is to authorise some to usurp the privilege of others.

Thus in hot climates women remain in the same humble and dependent state, in which all women were originally, when all men were savages. Women by the law of Hindostan are not admitted to be witnesses, even in a civil cause; and I blush to acknowledge, that in Scotland the same law has not been long in disuse.

In contradiction to the climate, Christianity has banished Polygamy from Ethiopia, though the Judges are far from being severe upon that crime. The heat of the climate makes them wish to indulge in a plurality of wives, even at the expence of purchasing each of them. Among the Christians of Congo Polygamy is in use, as formerly when they were Pagans. To be confined to one wife, during life, is held by the most zealous Christians there to be altogether irrational: Rather than be so confined, they would renounce Christianity.

Beside Polygamy, many other customs depend on the nature of the matrimonial engagement, and vary according to its different kinds. Marriage ceremonies, for that reason, vary in different countries, and at different times. Where the practice is to purchase a wife, whether among savages, or among pampered people in hot climates, the payment of the price completes the marriage, without any other ceremony. Other ceremonies, however, are sometimes practised. In old Rome, the bride was attended to the bridegroom's house with a female slave carrying a distaff and a spindle, importing that she ought to spin for the family. Among the savages of Canada and of the neighbouring countries, a strap, a bottle, and a faggot, are put in the bride's cabin as symbols of her duty, viz. to carry burthens, to dress the viands, and to provide wood. On the other hand, the bride in token of her slavery, takes her axe, cuts down timber, bundles it up, and lays it before the door of the bridegroom's hut. All the salutation she receives is, 'It is time to go to rest.' The inhabitants of Sierra Leona, a Negro country, have in all their towns a boarding school, where young ladies are educated for a year under the care of a venerable old gentleman. When their education is completed, they are carried in their best attire to a public assembly; which may be termed a matrimonial market, because, there young men convene to make a choice.

a choice. Those, who fit themselves to their fancy, pay the dowry, and over and above gratify the old Superintendent for his extraordinary care in educating the bride. In the island of Java, the bride, in token of subjection, washes the bridegroom's feet: and this is a capital ceremony.

In Russia, the bride presents to the bridegroom a bundle of rods, to be used against her when she deserves to be chastised; and at the same time she pulls off his boots. The present empress, prone to reform the rude manners of her subjects, has discountenanced that ceremony among people of fashion. Very different were the manners of Peru before the Spanish conquest. The bridegroom carried shoes to the bride, and put them on with his own hands. But there purchasing of wives was unknown. Marriage ceremonies in Lapland are directed by the same principle. It is the custom there for a man to make presents to his children of rein-deer; and young women, such as have a large stock of rein-deer, have lovers in plenty. A young man looks for such a wife at a fair, or at their meetings for paying taxes. He carries to the house of the young woman's parents, some of his relations, being solicitous in particular to chuse an eloquent speaker. They are all admitted except the lover, who waits till he be called in. After drinking some spirits, brought along for the purpose, the spokesman addresses the father in the most humble terms, bowing the knee as if he were introduced to a prince. He styles him the worshipful father, the high and mighty father, the best and most illustrious father, &c. &c.

In viewing the chain of causes and effects, instances sometimes occur of bizarre facts, starting from the chain without any cause that can be discovered. The marriage-ceremonies among the Hottentots are of that nature. After, all matters are adjusted among the old people, the young couple are shut up in a room by themselves, where they pass the night in struggling for superiority, which proves a very serious work where the bride is reluctant. If she persevere to the last without yielding, the young man is discarded; but, if he prevail, which commonly happens, the marriage is complicated by another ceremony, not less singular. The men and women squat on the ground in different circles, the bridegroom in the center of one, and the bride in the center of another. The Suri, or Master of religious ceremonies, makes water on the bridegroom; who receives the stream with eagerness, and rubs it into the furrows of the fat with which he is covered. He performs the same ceremony on the bride, who is equally respectful.

One marriage-ceremony among the inland Negroes is singular. So soon as preliminaries are adjusted, the bridegroom with a number of his companions set out at night, and surround the house of the bride, as if intending to carry her off by force. She and her female attendants, pretending to make all possible resistance, cry aloud for help, but no person appears. This resembles strongly a marriage-ceremony that is or was customary in Wales. On the morning of the wedding-day, the bridegroom, accompanied with his friends on horseback, demands the bride. Her friends, who are likewise on horseback, give a positive refusal, upon which a mock scuffle ensues. The bride mounted behind her next kinsman, is carried off, and is pursued by the bridegroom and his friends, with loud shouts. It is not uncommon to see on such an occasion two or three hundred sturdy Cambro-Britons riding at full speed, crossing and jostling, to the no small amusement of the spectators. When they have fatigued themselves and their horses, the bridegroom is suffered to overtake his bride. He leads her away in triumph, and the scene is concluded with feasting and festivity. The same marriage-ceremony was usual in Muscovy, Lithuania, and Livonia, as reported by Olaus Magnus.

Divorce also depends on the nature of the matrimonial engagement. Where the law is, that a man must purchase his wife as one does a slave; it follows naturally, that he may purchase as many as he can pay for, and that he may turn them off at his pleasure. This law is universal, without a single exception. The Jews, who purchased their wives, were privileged to divorce them, without being obliged to assign a cause. The Negroes purchase their wives, and turn them off when they think proper. The same law obtains in China, in Monomotapa, in the isthmus of Darien, in Caribbeana, and even in the cold country round Hudson's-bay. All the savages of South-America, who live near the Oroonoko, purchase as many wives as they can maintain, and divorce them at their pleasure.

Very different is a matrimonial engagement between equals, where a dowry dowry is contracted with the bride. The nature of the engagement implies, that neither of them is privileged to dismiss the other without a just cause. In Mexico, where the bride brought a dowry, there could be no divorce but by mutual consent. In Lapland, the women who have a flock of rein-deer, as before-mentioned, make a considerable figure. This lays a foundation for a matrimonial covenant as amongst us, which bars Polygamy, and consequently divorce, without a just cause. And, when these are barred in several instances, the prohibition in time becomes general.

In my next, I shall consider the crime of Adultery, the criminality of which depends also in some measure on the nature of the matrimonial engagement.

The Hermit: An Eastern Tale.

IN the plains of Anatolia, lived, in times of peace, the sage Hussendgiar, retired from the world, and free from all those cares which perplex the breasts of those who, misled by avarice or ambition, make wealth or fame their idol. He applied his heart solely to wisdom, and meditated day and night upon the koran. The more he studied the book of glory, the more was his ardour for the knowledge of heavenly things increased:—and such was the happiness which he enjoyed in the retirement of repose, that the bliss of paradise, which Mahomet has promised to the faithful, seemed to be prefigured in it: and the joys he was possessed of in this world, gave him a foretaste of the pleasures reserved for him in the next.

His tranquility, however, was at length interrupted: the plains of Anatolia were laid waste by all the calamities of war, and Hussendgiar himself beheld, from a ruined tower, the hostile encounter of two armies. He was an eye-witness to the carnage that filled his soul with horror, and could not forbear exclaiming—“Heavens! wherefore were men created to destroy each other? How can a righteous God suffer human nature to deface itself?”

The mind of Hussendgiar was, from that day, filled with scruples and inquietudes. He lost his former serenity by pondering upon the ways of Providence: the maze appeared to him inextricable, and quite confounded his understanding.—Being constantly wrapped up in these contemplations, he one day fell into a profound sleep;—whereupon the angel Gabriel appeared to him, and addressed him in the following manner:

“Thou hast doubted of the divine wisdom and goodness, on account of some appearance of evil, which thy limited understanding could not explain. Men were not born to dwell for ever upon earth; therefore it is wisely ordained by the Almighty, that all human bliss should be imperfect.—I will now shew you the place where, alone, unmixed happiness can be expected.”

So saying, the angel gave Hussendgiar a view of the glories of Paradise, and such an impression did the vision make upon his mind, that it was ever after raised above all human pleasures or pains; and he retained a full conviction, that evil is necessary in a transitory state, in order to wean man from it, and that mortals should expect no true felicity, till the angel of death has put a period to their days. He soon resumed his former tranquility and composure of mind, and lived happier in his cell, than monarchs in their palaces.

The calms of life are never lasting: Hussendgiar's peace was once more to be disturbed. The prince Muezin, being fatigued in pursuit of the foe, happened to take shelter at the cottage of Hussendgiar, with whose conversation he was so delighted, that he resolved to keep him always about his person, and to confer on him distinguished honour. This preferment Hussendgiar would willingly have declined: a court had no charms for him. However, he could not resist the importunities of the prince;—and, the war being over, he accompanied him to his court.—He had not been long there, when envy filled the breasts of the courtiers, who could not bear to see an obscure hermit in equal credit with themselves. The vizir Abdelaziz, above all, sought his ruin, and every day laid new snares for him; but such was his integrity, that he always found it easy to justify his conduct. The prince being fully satisfied of the malice of Abdelaziz, would have punished him; whereupon Hussendgiar gave a new proof of his worth, by interceding for him, and procuring his pardon. This last trial over, Hussendgiar lived unmolested till the death of the prince; the love of retirement then took possession of his heart, and he returned to his former cottage, in order to wait the summons of the angel of death; having, from living in a court, received new conviction, that happiness is not to be expected on this side of the grave.

Wednesday, Jan. 31.

THE House met at half after two o'clock, and proceeded to receive several petitions presented for private bills.

Mr. Grey Cooper presented a state of the surplus monies remaining in the Exchequer the 5th of April and 10th of October, and at the same time moved for an account of the state of the surplusses remaining in the Exchequer on the 24th of January last.

Mr. Temple Luttrell moved for leave to withdraw the petition of Lord Waltham, of the kingdom of Ireland, complaining of an undue election and return for the borough of Malden, in the county of Essex, which was agreed to.

The petition complaining of an undue election and return for the borough of Cricklade, in the county of Wilts, which stood for the day, was postponed by motion.

Friday, Feb. 2.] Nothing done. Adjourned to February 5.

Monday, Feb. 5.] Private business.

Tuesday, Feb. 6.] Not members sufficient for a ballot.

Wednesday, Feb. 7.] No debate.

Thursday, Feb. 8. and Friday 9.] Private business. Adjourned to February 12.

Monday, Feb. 12.] Private business.

Tuesday, Feb. 13.] No debate.

Wednesday, Feb. 4.] The order of the day for taking into consideration the report of the committee appointed last session, to try the election for Shaftesbury, on the petition of Hans Winthrop Mortimer, Esq; the member seated by their determination, was read. After which, Sir George Yonge, chairman of the committee, stated the proceedings of the committee, and the facts. He stated, that the most notorious bribery, corruption, and perjury, had been carried on at the last election at Shaftesbury; not secretly, and as if ashamed of such practices; but openly, and with pomp and parade, by sound of trumpet, ringing of bells, public processions, and other methods of inviting the voters to accept the bribes. That it appeared likewise to have been the practice, for many years back, for the voters at Shaftesbury to expect money from the candidates at election; and that nothing was to be done without it. In proof of these facts he made several references to the report of the committee, which was read; and having expressed his sense of the duty he owed to himself as a member of parliament, to the committee of which he was appointed chairman, and to the House, he added, that he had discharged his conscience in bringing the whole of the evidence before the House, which would answer every purpose, unless he had the support of the House in regard to what he should propose in the further proceedings upon this matter. He concluded, by shewing the necessity of coming to some resolutions effectually to stop these shameful proceedings at Shaftesbury, and to punish the delinquents; for which purpose he moved, first, the following resolution:

Resolved, That it appears to this House, from the minutes of the committee appointed to try the merits of the last election at Shaftesbury, that the most notorious subornation of perjury had been practised, and the most wilful corrupt perjury committed, at the last election for Shaftesbury in Dorsetshire. Agreed to.

That it appears to this House from the minutes of the same committee, That Francis Sykes and Thomas Rumbold, Esqrs. (the late sitting members) John Good, William Bennet, William Armstrong, Matthew Mercfield, and Thomas Hannam, were abettors, &c.

This motion produced a debate. Mr. Serjeant Adair expressed, That it was contrary to the rules of law and equity to condemn persons unheard, who had no notice or expectation of such a proceeding. He was followed by Mr. Dempster, much upon the same ground, adding, that it was taking upon the House to find persons guilty without evidence. Neither of these gentlemen seemed to think the evidence from the minutes any proof of the charge against Sykes and Rumbold. The Solicitor General urged the same, and said, it was a resolution the House could not come to precipitately; that it ought to be duly weighed and re-considered. Mr. Montague objected to the resolution being general, as it had not appeared to him that the evidence was equally strong against all. Sir George Yonge agreed to divide the resolution, and take each name separately; and the debate now went on upon the resolution singly against Mr. Sykes. Mr. Serjeant Adair moved, That the further consideration of the report be put off to this day fortnight, when Mr. Sykes should have notice to attend. Mr. Solicitor General and Mr. Hans Stanley supported Mr. Adair's motion.

The original resolution was supported by the Lord Mayor, [Mr. Sawbridge] Sir Joseph Mawbey, and Sir Edward Atkley.

Sir Cecil Wray observed, that he was glad the chairman had begun at the right end, viz. with the corruptors; but that in the present case, he must support the amendment, as, considering the House as a grand jury, it ought to have viva voce evidence, and not blindly take what was given before another court, which ought not to have any other weight with the House, than as leading to an enquiry.

Mr. Adair's motion passed in the negative without a division; and the questions being severally put, with respect to the several persons mentioned, the resolution against them all was agreed to.

Sir George Yonge next moved, that the Attorney-General be directed by the House to prosecute all the said parties; which was likewise agreed to.

Finally, He moved for leave to bring in a bill to disfranchise certain persons to be therein named, and to incapacitate them from voting at elections for members to serve in parliament for the borough of Shaftesbury; which was agreed to, and a committee ordered to bring in the same.

Thursday, Feb. 15.] The Right Honourable T. Townshend spoke fully upon the privileges of the House of Commons. He maintained, that the only true substantial meaning or idea those privileges conveyed was, that they were the indubitable right of all the Commons of England, who had one general interest in them. That to be sure, in a more confined sense, they were particularly applied first to that House, as a deliberate body, and one of the branches of the legislature. Secondly, to the individual members who composed that body. He did not intend to make them, however, the subject of this day's business; they were but of secondary, nay indeed of very inferior consequence when opposed to that great privilege, the power of granting money, of keeping the purse of their constituents safe from the hands of violence, art or fraud. This was a trust of the first magnitude; it, in fact, included every other; for so long as that was preserved inviolate, the crown would remain under the constitutional controul of parliament; so soon as that was wrested by open force, defeated by indirect means, or done away by fraud, the liberties and the privileges of the people would be for ever annihilated. He expatiated on the commendable, wise and well-founded jealousy of that House whenever the least attempt had been made in that way even by the other House; but when any endeavours were made by the crown, or its ministerial agents, the Commons at all times caught the alarm; they had at all times uniformly united, as if they were actuated by one soul, to resist any attempt of the crown to encroach upon their power of granting or refusing the money to be raised on themselves or their constituents. He then opened the cause which induced him to make these observations; and read the following papers.

The Message to the Irish House of Commons.

An Extract from the Address of Knights, &c. to Lord Harcourt.

That your Excellency will be pleased to return his majesty our most grateful thanks for his gracious declaration, that his majesty hath nothing more at heart than the security and protection of his people of Ireland, of which his majesty has given a signal proof, by his offer, if it shall be the desire of parliament, to replace such forces as may be sent out of this kingdom, by an equal number of foreign Protestant troops, the charge thereof to be defrayed, without any expence to this kingdom.

An Extract from the Votes of the House of Commons of Ireland.

An amendment was proposed to be made to the resolution, by inserting after the word

N O T E.

* See our Mag. for last December, p. 751.

resolved, the following words, viz. "That having, in consequence of his majesty's gracious recommendation, and of our mature consideration of the state of this country, repeatedly declared our opinion, that twelve thousand men are necessary for the defence of this kingdom; being sensible that it would be a violation of the trust reposed in us, should we have subjected our constituents to a very heavy expence, in times of perfect tranquillity, for the purpose of providing a force, which we are to part with in the times of danger; and being convinced, that since the time at which we first declared twelve thousand men to be necessary, the probability of a war has increased, and not diminished."

And the Right Honourable Mr. Speaker's Speech to his Excellency Simon Earl of Harcourt.

Lunæ, 25. Die Decembris, 1775.

May it please your Excellency,

The conduct of the Commons, in the course of this session, has marked more strongly, if possible, than in any former period, their loyalty, duty and affection to his majesty, and their zeal for the interest and honour of Great-Britain. At the hazard of their own safety they have consented to part with one third of the forces deemed necessary to be maintained at all times within this kingdom for its defence, in a season when powerful reasons existed for retaining them. Without putting Great Britain to the expence of replacing them, though generously offered; and they have cheerfully granted to his majesty a very considerable supply, in addition to all former duties, though the liberality of the last session served only to expose the weakness of their resources. This disposition in the Commons they doubt not your Excellency will improve to their advantage, and they trust that through your Excellency's favourable representation, it will serve to unite Great-Britain and Ireland in still closer bonds of mutual affection so necessary to the security and property of both. They acknowledge with gratitude your Excellency's generous efforts to open to them new sources of commerce, and to remove some restraints upon the old; they see with joy a beam of light break through that dark cloud which has so long overshadowed this nation; and they are animated with the hope that the honour is reserved for your Excellency's administration, of establishing this important truth, that nothing will contribute more to augment the strength and wealth of Great-Britain than the increase of both in this kingdom."

Having read these papers, he said, the message contained two propositions, by both which the Parliament of Great-Britain were pledged to the Parliament of Ireland, if it should accept the conditions held forth by this message, to pay for the troops to be sent to America, and to replace them with 4000 foreign Protestants; and further to induce the Irish nation to accept of this insidious bargain, she was to have 12,000 men within the kingdom kingdom, and, at the same time, to be relieved of a burthen of 80,000*l.* per annum. Such a proposition could only have originated in the worst designs, or must have been the effect of the most consummate folly. For what was the whole measure taken together? the minister on this or the other side of the water, no matter which, makes the King engage his royal word; that the expence shall be borne by the Parliament of Great-Britain; but adding folly to temerity, makes him promise, that Great-Britain shall pay for 8000 men, though if the bargain was accepted, she would actually have but 4000 men in her service. After thus stating, in his opinion, the meaning of the words, he proceeded to shew, that they were received in this sense by the Irish Parliament, though neither of the offers were received in the terms proposed, and quoted the Speaker's speech, delivered at the bar of the House of Lords, on the 25th of December, 1775, in which he offers, in the name of the Commons, to send the 4000 natives out of the kingdom, without putting Great-Britain to the expence of replacing them, though generously offered. He then stated the complaint in the following words: "That the Earl Harcourt, Lord Lieutenant-general and General-governor of Ireland, did, on the 23d day of November last, in breach of the privilege, and in derogation of the honour and authority of this House, send a written message to the House of Commons of the Parliament of Ireland, signed with his own hand, to the following effect." He moved, that a committee be appointed to enquire into the matter of the said complaint, and to report the same, as it shall appear to them, to the House.

Sir George Yonge seconded the motion.

Lord Clare said, the right honourable gentleman who made the motion, had been lavish of his encomiums on Ireland, but did not offer a syllable in behalf of poor Britain. Ireland retained a proper sense of freedom; she would not admit foreigners, even with the consent of parliament; her principles were sound, her manners were pure, her counsels were uncontaminated; while poor degenerate Britain was fallen from her former greatness, and was sunk into the lowest extremity of corruption, folly, and want of spirit; yet while he was proud to hear his country so highly extolled, he could not help lamenting that fallen Britain had not one friend to stand forth in her defence. His lordship having continued his vein of irony and humour for a while, commented upon the two propositions. The offer of sending foreigners and of defraying the expence signified nothing, no such offer or promise was intended; it was all the idle reveries of a gentleman, whom, for the familiarity of expression, he would call by the name of Mr. Edmund Sexton Pery. He knew Mr. Edmund Sexton Pery very well, and he knew him to be a good sort of a considerate, honest, sensible man; but however sensible Mr. Pery might be, the house was not bound by his interpretations. The honourable mover says, that Mr. Pery went to the bar of the house of lords, and delivered a certain speech, and that the lord lieutenant acquiesced in that interpretation of the message, because he did not contradict it. Would he have lord Harcourt rise and come to Mr. Pery to the bar, and contradict him, by telling him he never meant any such thing? I dare say he would hardly be so unreasonable. I have indeed heard it asserted by some of my countrymen, that they spoke better English than the people of this country. It may be so, but it is the first time I ever heard it asserted, that they understand it better. I presume that Mr. Pery thought he understood the message; but I will not allow that either lord Harcourt, or this house, are bound to abide by his interpretations; neither can I be persuaded that the house of commons of Ireland are any more bound than we are by his conceptions. For what does the whole amount to? Mr. Pery in his individual capacity, says so and so. What is that to the house of commons? He is speaker it is true, but what he does out of the house when he is not instructed, is no more the act of that house, than if it had been done by any other person.

Mr. Conolly replied to his lordship, that he was an Irishman as well as the noble lord, and as Ireland was to be the subject of that day, in the cocking phrase, he was ready to pit himself against him. He then observed, that he was not surprised that the noble lord was in such extreme good humour with ministers on both sides of the water, as his lordship, and three others, who enjoyed sinecure employments, had a present made them in one day of 14,000*l.* (meaning the arrangement of vicetreasurers, and the clerk of the pells) and less a possibility should arise of any defalcation of their salaries, parliament was so good humoured while they increased the salary, to take upon themselves to provide payment out of the public purse for deputies, who were to do the duty. It was therefore no wonder that his lordship and his colleagues should be merry, while Ireland continued to be sad, to see the salaries of sinecure places raised, while she was mortgaging her funds, laying on new duties, and providing for deficiencies of grants. He gave a picture of Ireland; an exhausted treasury, ruined trade, starving manufactures, accumulating pensions, new created places, state oppressions, daily executions, a ruined, mouldering army, increasing debts, cattle jobs, bands of lawless ruffians in defiance of law, and beyond the power of punishment, in short, every public evil and private mischief that ever was on earth to curse and debase mankind. He did not arise to the question simply stated, whether the message was really a breach of the privileges of the commons of England, but principally, he said, to give an account of what had passed in the Irish house of commons, when Sir John Blaquiere brought the message from the lord lieutenant. The house refused the offer, he said, upon two principles; first, because they thought the introduction of foreign troops an unconstitutional and dangerous measure; and, secondly, because it was thought that the ministry had no mind that they should have them, so Sir John himself voted against them. He said, Ireland was quite defenceless, that the 12,000 nominal men were only 10,500, out of which 4000 were to be sent away; that the White-boys were governors of all the south of Ireland, where four-fifths of the people were Catholics; that no private gentleman could be sure of his life, sitting there in his own house, for one half hour; that more troops were really wanting, instead of taking those away they had already; that men had their ears sawn off, and others were buried alive, to the disgrace of government, that could not or would not protect the people; that the peasantry were in such a state of poverty, that no revolution or change of situation could possibly be to them for the worse.

Right hon. Welbore Ellis said the meaning of the message had been mistaken; that taking the expressions in any light, no breach of privilege could be deduced from them. He recalled to the remembrance of the house, that in 1769, when the Irish establishment was raised from 12,000 to 15,000 men, his majesty passed a royal personal promise to the Irish parliament, that there should never be less than 12,000 men in Ireland, except in case of actual invasion or rebellion in Great Britain. Now, the earl of Harcourt's message, he contended, had reference to this promise, as the present want of troops was not within those exceptions, it certainly was his majesty's first business to be absolved from that promise, by the parties to whom it was made; but if he had applied first to the commons of Great-Britain, it must have been for their approbation of a measure in direct breach of his promise to Ireland. He compared it to the king's proposing military establishments to the house; the king does the whole by his prerogative, and leaves nothing to the house of commons but to vote the money. Is not this engaging for the consent of parliament? yet all the world knows that the house may object to them, and consequently that they cannot be effective without their consent.

Mr. Gordon thought the first part of the message was agreeable to the sense now put on it by the honourable gentleman who spoke last: but the other part seemed a little obscure at first sight: yet it might be concluded, that as a measure of government, it could never be in the idea of the minister to make such an attempt, in express contradiction to the disbanding act of king William. It was, in his opinion, a fair inference to say, that the expression "enabled so to do," meant the previous consent of the British Parliament. If he thought administration had any other intention in view, no man would be more ready to join in a vote of disapprobation and censure. He condemned the conduct of the minister, respecting the indemnity bill, and disapproved of introducing foreigners into the dominions of Great-Britain, without the consent of parliament.

Mr. Powys had little doubt that the message under consideration meant more than it expressed, and was intended as an experiment to try if the Irish parliament would consent to receive foreign troops, in order to establish a precedent which might be afterwards employed to other purposes.

Lord Middleton said, he had a fortune in both kingdoms, but had no predilection for either in a political light, because he looked upon their interests to be mutual; but whatever other gentlemen might think of the message, of the true import of which it was impossible there could be a second opinion, he had not a doubt but it aimed at one fixed object, that was, to habituate both countries to certain notions which must in the end reduce the parliament of each to be the mere instrumental agents of the crown, without the least degree of will or independence whatever. It was a scheme, however deep, formed nevertheless on very simple principles, and went directly to vest in the crown the virtual power of taxing, as opportunity might serve, both Great-Britain and Ireland. In Ireland the minister was taught to ask some favour; then England was to be pledged. In England again, when circumstances recurred, or made impracticable, Ireland was to be taxed, in order to maintain the supremacy of the British legislature.

Mr. Dunning divided the message into two parts. On the first he observed, that it contained no condition implied or expressed. It was his majesty's intention as immediately proceeding from his own mind, declared in the most positive terms the English language was capable of conveying. It was a complete undertaking on his part to pay for the 4000 men, if the Irish house of commons should chuse to consent or accept of the terms. It was impossible in the nature of things, that any man possessed of any thing he could properly call his own, or binding himself to the execution of any act within his power, could promise in terms more clear, positive, or unequivocal, than those in which this part of the message was conceived. To get clear of this, he said, two modes had been adopted, both with equal bad success. One of those was a naked contradiction to the obvious sense of the words; but such an unsupported denial was abandoned in the very instant it was urged; for the noble lord (lord Clare) and the honourable gentleman (Mr. Ellis) who asserted at random, being conscious that it was but a random assertion, endeavoured to explain it, by saying that the affair was conducted precisely in a manner of a subsidiary treaty. This he said was still worse, for no argument was better than a bad one. It was well known, that the king when treating with foreigners, represented the state, which could never be the case, when treating with one part of his subjects, and engaging for another; besides the consequences, had the offer been accepted by the Irish Parliament, would have clearly shewn the difference, and established the distinction beyond all question. The troops, if the season of the year had permitted, permitted, might be now in America; the foreigners might be landed in Ireland: Great Britain was pledged; the cause in which the troops were to be employed, and the necessary arrangements by which the measure was to be brought about, is a favourite one; so that the whole business might be effected by his majesty's bare intention, as completely without, as with the consent of the British Parliament. The second part of the message, he insisted, was clear and explicit. The offer was to replace the 4000 troops, by an equal number of foreign Protestants, "if it be the desire of Parliament." Here again was clear intention, and offer expressed, with the condition annexed, that was, "if it be the desire," &c. By every rule of legal construction or common sense, if there be an undertaking accompanied by a condition, if the condition be accepted by the party to whom it is proposed, the bargain is from that instant complete, and mutually binding on both parties. If then the proposition was a positive one, and it had been accepted, it only remained to discover whether or not it was the Commons of Great-Britain, whose word was thus pledged without being consulted. This, he presumed, would require very little proof. No man would say that Hanover was to bear the burden. He could less think that any of his majesty's new allies were to do so, however zealous they might be for chastising his rebellious subjects in America. The civil list, he suspected, was still less equal to afford so heavy a disbursement. Where then could the necessary means of paying so large a body of men be obtained, but from the British Parliament? by what had fallen in debate, as well as general declamations made at the time this business was first mentioned, he understood this famous message had been disavowed by the minister, and his friends on this side of the water. He presumed the minister on the other side did not venture to do it entirely on his own judgment. This excited his curiosity to know where it originated. It would be a sufficient answer, if the minister either here or in Ireland owned it. If neither did, but the advice came from another quarter, he should be glad to know, because in such an event more particularly, it would be the duty, as it ought to be the wish of this House, to sift the matter to the bottom, in order to come at the real author or authors.

Lord North gave a long narrative of the increase of the establishment, which took place in Ireland in 1769, and of his majesty's promise to his Irish Parliament, that 12,000 men should always remain within that kingdom, except in the event of a rebellion in this. He said, the royal promise, though binding on his majesty, was not law, therefore sending the troops out of the kingdom, to the amount of any number, was perfectly legal. His Lordship said he would not answer the general question put to him by the last honourable gentleman: not chusing to gratify mere curiosity, at the expence of betraying the secrets of the cabinet. He avowed the having co-operated with the rest of the King's servants, in giving general instructions; but would not charge his memory with having any immediate hand in drawing up the particular letter or paper, on which the present measure was supposed to be taken. He said, he thought it was perfectly justifiable, and was willing to share in the consequences. Yet he could not see how it was fair in argument to charge administration here with specific measures taken in Ireland; nor could he conceive, either positively or by implication, that he or his colleagues in office were bound in any manner by what passed in another kingdom. To some allusions made by Mr. Dunning and Mr. Gordon, relative to the Hanoverians being sent to Gibraltar and Minorca, and the fate of the indemnity bill, he replied, he thought the measure perfectly legal, and was ready to meet his adversaries on that ground whenever they thought fit. He gave a history of the indemnity bill, and in a humorous way, proved that it was thrown out by a noble Marquis [Rockingham] in the other House. If foreign troops was an improper measure, the minister in Ireland acted perfectly right, for he declined to support it; and finished with observations on the German resources, and the poverty of the civil list.

Lord John Cavendish rose to give his attestation of the personal worth of Lord Harcourt. He observed, that, his lordship had been little acquainted with public business, till his late appointment; therefore, if it was his own measure, he was much the more excusable; but he believed it was not. However, if it was not, as the Irish nation had been too wise and too spirited to accept of one part of the proposal; and as ministers, whatever they might affect to the contrary, had not dared to send a single man out of Ireland, on such an authority, the matter hardly deserved the time and attention some gentlemen seemed willing to bestow on it. The people of Ireland had already done half the business, by refusing the offer; the ministry had in fact done the other half, from their own fear; so that on the whole, he did not desire to send the matter to a committee, but wished to come to some decisive resolution, which would condemn the whole transaction, without any particular reference or application to those who might be supposed to have first planned, or endeavoured to carry it into execution.

Lord George Germain contended, that whatever might have been the sense of the message, his majesty's servants could not be supposed to be strictly answerable for its contents. He said, that Lord Harcourt might have mistaken, or exceeded his instructions. He did not know he did, or he might have conveyed his meaning in the clearest terms; but yet, whether he did, or did not, the first part of the message only proposed a matter to the consideration of the Irish Parliament, clearly and legally within the constitutional exercise exercise of the regal power. If his majesty had not given his royal promise to keep 12,000 men within the kingdom, he might have ordered the whole, or any part of the troops on that establishment, to any part of the British dominions he pleased, without applying to the Parliament of either kingdom. He said he had heard a great deal of what passed in debate in the House of Commons of Ireland, but he could not perceive what direct relation it bore to what was now under consideration. The efficient minister, as he was called, was likewise much spoken of. Sir John Blaquiere said this, and Sir John Blaquiere said that; but for his part, what Sir John Blaquiere said one way or the other, was of no great consequence. He knew a Sir John Blaquiere, and had been in conversation with him, but in that way what he said could be made a ground of censure on a British ministry, was more than he could reconcile to the relation they really stood in to each other; if they stood in any. He confessed the measure of paying for 8000 men, when we were to have the service of but 4000, was extremely uneconomical, and he thought very improper; yet if 4000 men could be had upon better terms, and that it was supposed it might be more proper to send natives than foreigners to America, the measure on that account, and that alone, might be defended.

I. A Sermon preached before the Incorporated Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, at their Anniversary Meeting, in the Parish Church of St. Mary le Bow, Feb. 16, 1776. By John Lord Bishop of Peterburgh. Harrison.

EQUALLY moderate in his religious and political principles, as becomes a preacher of the gospel of peace; this very intelligent prelate has clearly proved that christianity is a reasonable service, and promotes our happiness temporal as well as eternal. As to the best methods of communicating these glad tidings to such as are still in darkness, "far be it ever from the practice of the reformed church (says his Lordship) to compel men to come into us by force; let the disciples of Mahomet spread their faith by fire and sword; let the church of Rome make its religion subservient to its policy, and write its comment upon the gospel of peace in characters of blood.

"The aims we are allowed to struggle with against the powers of Satan, and the prejudices of superstitious ignorance, are persuasion and example. . . . And

He concludes, "May we join in one common prayer to Almighty God, to dispose the hearts of all men, that by a proper sense of duty to the laws on one hand, and a just attention to the rights of our fellow-subjects on the other, we, and all the dependent members of the parent state, may happily and speedily be united again as one people; and thereby open the way to that more comprehensive union, wherein we, and all the nations of the earth, shall become one fold under one shepherd, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ! &c."

II. Odes. By Richard Cumberland, Esq; 4to. Robson.

This publication consists of two odes, 1. an irregular one to the sun, stuck out on the spot, in the mountainous parts of Westmoreland and Cumberland. On this ode Mr. Gray's journal is the best commentary, as it refers to all the scenes here hinted at. Some of his Pindaric fire seems also caught by our bard, tho' if we are not mistaken, both Messrs. Gray and Mason are great enemies to irregularity in odes, or that measure which is falsely called Pindaric, such as Cowley adopted, and which is often only an excuse for idleness. Our modern Pindar is thus introduced and lamented:

Ah! where is he that swept the sounding lyre,

And while he touch'd the master-string,
Bade Ruin seize the ruthless King

With all a prophet's fire?

Mourn him, ye naiads, and ye wood-nymphs,
mourn,

But chiefly ye, who rule o'er Kewick's vale,
Your visitor bewail,

And pluck fresh laurels for his hallow'd urn!
He saw your scenes in harmony divine,

On him indulgent Juns could shine;
Me turbid skies and threat'ning clouds await,
Emblems, alas! of my ignoble fate.

Ode II. is addressed to (the late) Dr. Robert James, and is a just and elegant tribute to that "victorious sage, Great tamer of the fever's rage," on the recovery of the author's son by his powders:

Thine, mighty master, is the art
To heal the father's bursting heart;
Tis thine, Elijah-like, to save
The widow's darling from the grave;
Thine, in the very gasp of death,
To rescue the convulsive breath;
And to a husband's bosom give
Her, without whom I cease to live.

Prefixed is an address to Mr. Geo. Romney, painter.

III. AParody on Gray's Elegy. By an Oxonian. 4to. 1s. Weble.

This honest Oxonian, or rather Londoner, has here committed a shameful literary theft and mutilation, by pirating, with several alterations, all for the worse, and some very absurd, an Evening Contemplation in a College. By J. Duncombe, M. A. (then Fellow of C. C. C. Cambridge); printed for R. Doddsley, about twenty years ago.

IV. A Collection of Poems on Divine and Moral Subjects: Selected from various Authors. By William Giles, 8vo. p. 303. Buckland.

In the preface to this judicious compilation, tion, we are told, that, "from Hugo's Pia Desideria Mr. Quarles took his emblems; but forgot, we may charitably suppose, to mention this circumstance in his preface."

Few pieces here inserted are originals, except some by the editor. Of those, therefore, we shall add one specimen, first observing, that among several flowers gathered from our borders, the Thought in a Garden, was a juvenile performance of the late Dr. John Sharp, rector of St. Mary Abchurch; and that we wonder at Mr. Giles's not printing the Elegy in a Country-church yard from the author's own edition, as Mr. Gray undoubtedly gave it.

"Their furrow oft the stubborn glebe has broke,"

and not harrow, as it is here printed.

AN EPI TAPH.

"Say, passing friend, why read the sculptur'd tomb?"

Why view in me thy swift-pursuing doom?
Each fleeting moment chides thy longer stay,
And speaks thee mortal, ere it glides away.

I once, like thee, too prodigal of time,
Mis-spent the dawning of life's early prime;
But mighty Grace my devious steps pursu'd,
And all the vices of fond youth subdu'd:
In swift succession, Death, with hasty stride,
Soon stopp'd the progress of life's flowing tide,
With friendly hand confirm'd my sweet employ,

And stamp'd immortal all my future joy."

V. Reflections on the Growth of Heathenism among modern Christians: In a Letter to a Friend at Oxford. Humbly recommended to the serious Consideration of all who are entrusted with the Education of Youth. By a Presbyter of the Church of England. Motto: If the Lord be God, follow him; but if Baal, follow him. 1 Kings xviii. 21. Rivington.

A large shoeing-horn, which formerly belonged to an ancient abbot of St. Edmund's-Bury, on which are engraved the seven works of charity, and the powder-horn of King Henry VIII. adorned with the history of St. Stephen's martyrdom, led the owner of them, a friend of the author, to remark, that, "in this age, the devices of both these would have been taken, not from the Holy Scripture, but the heathen mythology."

From hence the present writer takes occasion to animadvert on the prevailing taste for heathen learning, and the fabulous objects of the heathen system, which has even got possession of our churches, is conspicuous in the gardens of Stowe, and in most of our rural ornaments; and which, "under the auspices of the whole tribe of heathen demons," has given a name to the London Pantheon. Instead of the cock, St. Peter's monitor, or the globe and cross, as on St. Paul's; the dragon on Bow steeple, "an emblem expressive of the devil," and an organ in a well-known music-room [at Oxford, we presume], consecrated by a superscription to Apollo, excite our author's wonder and indignation; as do the praises bestowed on Brutus, rebels, and regicides, on Scæva, Cato the suicide, and the Spartan virtue: nor do the names of plants, now borrowed from the heathen Venus, instead of the Christian Virgin, viz. Venus's Looking-glass, Bason, Navel-wort, Fly-trap, &c. instead of Our Lady's Slipper, Thistle, Mantle, &c. escape his notice. But, above all, abundant scope for his animadversion is afforded by our poets, who, in general, it must be owned, follow the heathens "as implicitly as if the Muses had deprived them of their wits." Of this it is needless and would be endless to allege instances; and no doubt (as he says) they are, seriously speaking, as absurd in Christians as if the heathens had adorned their temples with statues of Moses and Aaron, the destruction of Sodom, or any other Scripture history. And here, by the way, he mentions, in a note, the heathen funeral-rites, instead of Christian burial, lately bestowed by a certain nobleman* on a dead Christian, "whose heart was carried thro' the Elysian fields to soft music, and solemnly placed in a very conspicuous mausoleum; in the same place where a Bacchanalian festival was celebrated some years ago, and sacred rites performed before the idol of Bacchus." Our philosophers, also, as well as our poets, orators, and artists, are all, he observes, affected to heathenism, which he proves in particular from Dr. Halley. But this may suffice for an idea of our author's design. On the whole, though his facts are undeniable, yet whether his conclusions will necessarily follow, we much doubt. Mr. Addison, with all his veneration for classic ground, the heathen poets, and the character of Cato, was unquestionably not only a true believer, but a zealous champion for the faith delivered to the saints. His Campaign is untinctured with heathenism; his fine simile of the angel is truly Christian; and his friend, Mr. Tickell, in his admirable poem on the Prospect of Peace, has also carefully avoided the fault here condemned, by never introducing the pagan mythology, or fabulous history, but in his similes or allusions. If a fondness for heathen vertu, and the Greek and Roman classics, must necessarily pervert their admirers from the worship of the living God to that of idols, with equal reason might have been apprehended some time ago, that the adoration of Josses would have been introduced by the prevailing taste for the Chinese zig-zags, bells, and dragons. Yet no such consequence ensued; nor among our numerous lovers of the Gothic or Arabesque architecture, did we ever hear of one whose religious principles sunk in proportion as his buildings rose. Though Strawberry-hill is totally of that construction, Mahometism has never been imputed to its owner, any more than it was of old to those pious monks who built our venerable cathedral. We must add, that, by endeavouring thus to banish the Greek and Latin poets, our author has, we think, attacked a nest of hornets, and will certainly, if he is discovered, incur the discipline of the genus irritabile of schoolmasters, tutors, ushers, &c.

N O T E.

* Lord Le Despencer.

But,

But, above all, and to be serious, when this indulgence of paganism is called "the grand abuse," and represented as "more fatal to the interests of Christianity than all the abuses purged away at the Reformation," that is, than the worship of images, transubstantiation, &c. we must beg leave to enter our dissent, and to say—Thy zeal hath even consumed thee.

The Dawning Day: A Poem.

WELCOME, welcome, jolly dawn,
Early welcome on the lawn,
Dancing with the bloomy spring,—
Wakeful bird, arise and sing,
Chearful lark, ascend the sky,
Lo, the nightly shadows fly!
Hark! it mounts, with gladsome strains,
From the bloomy breathing plains.
Rise (it calls) the Sylvan throng,
Rise and swell the votive song,
Strain your little throats in praise
Of the author of our days,
Who continues still to give
Means to joy, and joy to live.
Wakes the slinnet, wakes the thrush,
Musick spreads from bush to bush;
Spreads like fire, till songs of joy
All the tuneful tribe employ.
Damon, yet supinely laid,
Hears the sprightly serenade;
Hears, and rising with a bound,
Flings dull sleep upon the ground:
Then, across the plain at large,
Tends his woolly wanton charge;
Innocence, his knowledge; health
And contentment crown his wealth.

Bless of blisses now to stray
Down the balmy breezy way;
While a thousand warbling throats
Pour a thousand warbling notes,
And a thousand opening flowers
Scent a thousand verdant bowers,
And a thousand limpid rills
Prattle, prattle down the hills.

Come, ye innocently gay,
Lovers of the dawning day;
Come and view your favourite joys,
Purple clouds, and blushing skies!
Let the slothful, as they will,
Hug their lifeless slumbers still;
Be it yours, with lightsome tread,
Now to brush the dewy mead,
Study nature, and inhale
The fresh fragrance of the gale.
Or, let atheists as they may
Still the r idol chance obey;
Be it yours, on bended knee,
Under green embowering trees,
Now to lift your thoughts on high,
And unseen by every eye,
But by that which erst survey'd
Godlike Philip in the shade;
Full of gratitude to call
On the mighty Lord of all,

Poor, and the intended Bill for their better Relief and Employment. By a Kentishman. Conant.

The first part of this pamphlet was written in the year 1770, when a proposal for general work houses was made to the county of Kent, by the late Mr. Warde, of Westram; and the remainder consists of two letters occasioned by the similar plan now proposed by Mr. Gilbert.

Crown his service, and bestow
Dignity on all below:
Sure that they who seek his ways
Yet will gain immortal praise,
In a world more firm than this,
Full of knowledge, full of bliss;
Where revolving suns no more
Shall the doubtful dawn restore,
But one perfect day delight,
Ever blooming, ever bright.

A poetical Representation of the River Bann.

UP springs the muse on vig'rous pinions borne,
And lights triumphant on the cliffs of Mourne,
Where issuing headlong from his triple source,
Down falls the mighty Bann with rapid force;
With rapid force the muse attends his way,
And to the torrent suits the sounding lay:
Till past the town that from him takes its
name,

Which town, some time ago, was high in fame,
But now for want of patronage declines,
Tranquil he flows, and claims smooth flowing lines;

To numerous greens his useful waters leads,
And winds and blesses through delicious meads;
While fragrant gales his buxom bosom fan,
And waft away, "The blooming banks of Bann;"

Through Guilford next, Moyallon's blissful plains, [swains,
Moyallon's sprightly nymphs and jovial
Reflect new lustre on the gladsome waves,
Which shortly after Portadown receives:
Thence the rich current, navigably strong,
To celebrated Lough Neagh glides along.

Fantastic lake! what boot thy curious stores,
Thy fabled virtues, and thy fairy shores;
Since frequent vapours from thy surface rise,
Hide the fair sun, and blot the cheerless skies;
Keep the dull peasant in continual doubt,
And bear moist mischief all the land about.

Here whilst conjoining floods their tribute pay,
Foaming and full he works his mystick way:
Runs out at Toome, where hurtful sands abound;

[nown'd;
Flows down the Grange, for catching eels re-
By Portlenone extends his humid train:
Flows on and washes beauteous Colerain;
And lastly down a famous salmon bay,
Enters the great Deucaliedonian sea.

Flow on, sweet river! ever flow in fame,
Be all thy praises lasting as thy name;

Bless

Blest be each act that makes thy banks to smile,
Those banks that shame the Ganges and the Nile.

To Miss W. H—.

COME, lovely W—y, as soft as May,
With blooming charms in bright array,
Oh! come with me and be my wife,
And calm the busy toils of life:
And we th' extreme delights will prove,
That wait on virtuous, mutual love.
I'll plait my love a shady bow'r
To guard her from the sultry hour,
I'll weave a garland for my fair
To deck her lovely nut brown hair,
I'll gather pinks and lillies sweet,
And strew them underneath her feet,
I'll cull the sweetest choicest fruits,
That best my charmer's palate suits,
I'll bring her drink from yonder rill,
That murmurs down yon verdant hill,
And then at eve we'll both repair,
To soft repose devoid of care,
And on her snowy bosom rest,
Clasp'd in her arms supremely blest.

The inclosed fable (the production of a youth of fifteen years of age) being by accident in my way, I thought it might be worth your acceptance to insert in your magazine; 'tis a translation from a Latin fable in prose, given to him as an exercise by his master, if you will be so kind to insert it as soon as convenient, you will much oblige a constant reader.

The Entail.

IN a fair summer's radiant morn,
A butterfly divinely born,
(Whose lineage dated from the mud
Of Neah's or Deucalion's flood,)

Long hovering round a perfum'd lawn,
By various gusts of odours drawn,
At last established his repose,
On the rich bosom of a rose.
The palace pleas'd the lordly guest,
What insect own'd a grander nest?
The dewy leaves luxurious shed,
Their balmy odours o'er his head,
And with their silken tap'stry fold
His limbs, enthron'd on central gold,
He thinks the thorns embattled round,
To guard his castle's lovely mound;
And all the bushes which domain,
Subservient to his fancy'd reign.
Such simple blessings swell'd the fly,
Yet in his mind's capacious eye,
He roll'd the fate of mortal kings,
The common fate of flies and kings;
With grief he saw that lands and honours
Are apt to slide to various owners,
Where lords have dwelt, now grocers dwell,
And how cits buy what barons sell.
"Great Phœbus! Patriarch of my line!
"Avert such shame from sons of thine!
To them confirm these roofs he said,
And then he swore an oath so dread,
The stoutest waf that wears a sword,
Had humbled to have heard the word,
"If law can rivet down entails,
"This manor ne'er shall pass to snails,
"I swear," and then he smote his ermine,
"These tow'rs were never built for vermin."

A caterpillar grovelling near,
A subtle, slow conveyancer,
Who summoned, waddles with his quill,
To draw the haughty insects will,
None but his heirs must own the spot,
Begotten, or to be forgot;
Each leaf he binds, each bud he ties,
To eggs of eggs of Butterflies.

When lo! how fortune loves to teize
Those who would dictate her decrees!
A wanton boy was passing by,
The wanton child beheld the fly,
And eager ran to seize the prey,
But too impetuous in his play,
Crush'd the proud tenant of an hour,
And swept away the mansion flower.

FOREIGN TRANSACTIONS.

Naples, March 5.

NOTWITHSTANDING the publication of the edict which prohibits the Free Masons from holding clandestine assemblies at a lodge near Cape Demonte, they still continue frequenting that place, of which the government being informed, caused the Lodge to be surrounded last Sunday, and all who were there to be arrested and put in prison.

Cádiz, April 3. Two Spanish men of war, brought into Malaga three large Barbary corsairs, which they had taken in the Mediterranean, just after they had plundered two merchant ships of the most valuable part of their cargoes; the corsairs were in a shattered condition, and had lost many men. There is a very considerable fleet of men of war lying off May, 1776.

Cape Malaga under sailing orders, being victualled for eight months, and have all kinds of warlike stores aboard; from which it is conjectured that they are bound to some part of the West Indies. There are also on board many artificers, and materials for building of forts and batteries.

Paris, April 5. Among many other national improvements lately undertaken in France, a considerable commercial company, actuated by a true spirit of patriotism, is formed in Paris, under the name of Caisse d'Escompte, or Discount Office, an establishment with a fund of fifteen millions of livres. They have contracted to discount bills and notes, both in peace and war, without ever exceeding the rate of four per cent. per annum, and have tied themselves down to this single branch of business, the gold and silver trade, and to receive voluntary deposits of cash, without meddling in any other matters whatsoever. This new establishment is an improvement of the plan on which the Bank of England is fixed;

and as the regulations relative to its administrations, its dividends, &c. are wisely calculated to insure success, it is probable the profits of the house will be considerable enough to enable the administrators to lower in a little time the rate of interest to three per cent.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

March 23.

YESTERDAY the right hon. the lord mayor, seven of the aldermen, seventy common-council-men, city remembrancer, and other city officers, met at Guildhall, and proceeded from thence in procession to St. James's, to present to his majesty the following address and petition, relative to the present unhappy war in America:

To the KING's Most Excellent Majesty.

The Humble Address and Petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common Council assembled.

Most gracious Sovereign,

WE, the lord mayor, Aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in Common council assembled, beg leave to approach your throne, and to intreat your majesty's royal attention, whilst, with the humility of dutiful subjects, we lay before your majesty, what at present most immediately affects us in the spirit and tendency of the public measures now depending; and the anxiety we feel at the naked and exposed state in which this country will be left, by draining it of the national troops, as well as at the danger and disgrace attending the late treaties for foreign mercenaries, whose latitude is such, as to provide the means of introducing a foreign army even into this realm. We cannot, Sir, without horror, look forward to that dismemberment of the empire; that increase of the national debt, and of burthenome taxes; that loss of our most valuable resources; those distresses of our merchants and manufacturers; those deficiencies of the revenue; that effusion of the blood of our countrymen and brethren; that failure of public credit, and those dreadful calamities and convulsions which must follow a civil war so begun and pursued, whose extent no wisdom can foresee.

We humbly conceive, that no people can be bound to surrender their rights and liberties as a return for protection. The colonies have fought our battles with us; and in the last war they so far exceeded their abilities, that this nation thought it just and necessary to make them an annual compensation; and even now, driven to open hostilities in their own defence, they are willing (their own charters being inviolably secure) to continue to us all those advantages of a regular and exclusive commerce, to which we have long owed our opulence and prosperity. And we have every assurance which men in their situation can safely give, that, if asked as freemen, they are willing to go farther, and to afford to the exhausted state of the revenue of this country, such reasonable voluntary aid as their abilities permit, provided that their contributions are alienably applied to relieve that distress which is the only fair and politic foundation of requiring them, and that neither their aids, nor our own sinking funds, shall be any longer perverted from a public benefit, and misapplied to the purpose of corruption, instead of redeeming the debts of the nation, according to the first wish and just institution.

Indulge but, most gracious sovereign, the humanity and benignity of your own royal disposition, and our prayers will be granted. We implore the extension of your majesty's justice and mercy to that Continent, which, when arbiter of the terms of peace, it was your majesty's own determination to prefer to every other compensation, for all the expences of the last war.

We humbly and earnestly beseech your majesty, that the most solemn, clear, distinct, and unambiguous specification of those just and honourable terms, which your majesty, with both houses of Parliament, mean to grant to the Colonies, may precede the dreadful operations of your armament. Every colour and suspicion of injustice and oppression will then be removed from the proceedings of the mother country; and if those just and honourable terms are not submitted to, your majesty will undoubtedly be enabled to meet, what will then be rebellion, with the zealous hearts and hands of a determined, loyal, and united people.

To which his Majesty was pleased to return the following answer:

"I deplore, with the deepest concern, the miseries which a great part of my subjects in North America have brought upon themselves by an unjustifiable resistance to the constitutional authority of this kingdom; and I shall be ready and happy to alleviate those miseries by acts of mercy and clemency, whenever that authority is established, and the now-existing rebellion is at an end. To obtain these salutary purposes, I will invariably pursue the most proper and effectual means."

April 1. On Friday at a Court of Assistants of the company of Drapers, a motion was made by James Heywood, Esq. the senior member of that court, and seconded by Mr. Alderman Oliver, "That the court of common council of this city having ordered the freedom of the city to be presented in a gold box to Richard Price, D. D. and F. R. S. as a mark of their approbation of his pamphlet, entitled, "Observations on the Nature of Civil Liberty, &c." that it be resolved by this court to present the said Richard Price, D. D. and F. R. S. with the freedom of the company; and on the question being put, it was carried in the affirmative by a great majority.

Westminster, April 2. This day his majesty came to the house of peers, and being seated on the throne, Sir Francis Molyneux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, was sent with a message from his majesty to the house of commons, commanding their attendance in the house of peers. The commons being come thither accordingly, his majesty was pleased to give the royal assent to

An act for the better supply of mariners and seamen to serve in his majesty's ships of war, and on board merchant ships, &c.

An act for vesting certain estates, now held in trust for the benefit of the Royal Hospital for Seamen at Greenwich, in the commissioners and governors of the said hospital.

An act for the better regulation of the pilots conducting ships and vessels into and out of the port of Boston in Lincolnshire, and for preventing mischief by fire in the said haven and harbour.

An act for lighting and watching the streets, lanes, &c. within the borough of Bolton in Lincolnshire.

An act for rebuilding the parish church of Tardebigg, in the counties of Worcester and Warwick.

An act for better cleansing, lighting and watching the streets, lanes, &c. in Dorchester.

An act for lighting and watching of Camberwell and Peckham, in Surry.

An act for making and maintaining a navigable canal, from or near Stourbridge, in Worcestershire, to join the Staffordshire and Worcestershire canal at or near Stourton in Staffordshire. And to two more canal bills, two road, and ten private bills.

8. A letter from Petersburg says, "The Empress of Russia has given the Jesuits a refuge, on condition of their not assuming the ecclesiastical function, or attempting to make converts."

They write from Ireland, that according to the last returns made by the Adjutant-General, the troops on that establishment amounted to 10,230 men, of which 4000 are ordered for America.

9. By a gentleman just arrived from the island of Jersey, we are informed, that upwards of 20 families have arrived there from America, in order to settle in that island.

11. Advices from Constantinople by the way of Genoa say, that the Grand Signior is beginning again to make new armaments, the design of which do not appear, which occasions a variety of speculations.

We have an account that the following is a true list of the privateers fitted out by the order of the Congress last January, with the commanders names and their force. They sailed about the middle of February last, on an expedition kept a profound secret, viz.

Hopkins, Commander in Chief.

The Alfred, Tatterford, 32 guns, 390 men.
The Columbus, Whipple, 32 guns, 300 men.
The Andrew Doria, Biddle, 16 ditto, 200 men.
The Sebastian, Hopkins, 14 ditto, 200 men.
The Providence, Hazard, 12 ditto, 150 men.

A list of row galleys in the river Delaware, with the commanders names, viz.

The Washington, (204 feet in the keel) Doughty, commander in chief; the Dickenson, Rice; the Chatham, Alexander; the Camden, Ears; the Burke, Blear; the Esfingham, Moor; the Bull Dog, Henderson; the Franklin, Boyce; the Congress, Hamilton; the Experiment, Thompson; the Ranger, M'Gomery; the Hancock and Adams, Moore; the Warren, (no master when the account came away.) The Congress have ordered thirteen frigates to be built with the utmost expedition, of 36 guns each.

Extract of a Letter from a French Gentleman, dated Graveline, near Calais, April 4.

"Yesterday an English officer came to this place, to enquire for somebody who lately left him. He laid at my house, and during the night shot himself through the head. He had much money in his pocket, a commission of a regiment, and a letter addressed Madam N——r.

PIERRE FONTAINEAU.

17. An Admiralty Court is established at Virginia, by authority of the Congress, and John Blair, Edmund Randolph, Esquires, and another gentleman, are appointed judges of it. They have condemned several English vessels which have been taken by the American privateers, as lawful prizes.

The governors of Gibraltar and Port Mahon are shortly expected in England; the consequence of which will be, that the command of both those fortresses will devolve on two Hanoverian generals.

It is positively affirmed that no less than nine general officers of superior rank refused the command of the troops in America before general Howe accepted of it.

The last French mail brought certain accounts, that there was a fleet equipped at Toulon, and ready to put to sea in three days notice, consisting of twelve ships of the line of battle, three frigates and a bomb.

19. Yesterday an order for a writ of summons to the House of Peers was signed by his majesty, for Edward Southwell, Esq; knight of the shire for the county of Gloucester, by the title of Baron Clifford, of Clifford, in Gloucestershire.

The following is the authentic sentence pronounced by Sir Elijah Impey, Chief Justice of the assizes held at Calcutta in Bengal upon Rajah Nuncomar, in consequence of the Jury having brought in their verdict Guilty:

"Acquaint the prisoner, that he has been convicted of a capital offence, for which his life becomes forfeited to the law; that he has been convicted, after a long examination, after hearing his counsel to every point, in which he could prove his innocence, or in which he could object to the indictment.

"The Jury have found him guilty of the charge; and the court are of opinion, that there are no objections in law in his favour; that he has been convicted of a crime, under all its circumstances, highly aggravated; that his rank and his fortune made a desire to derive money by unjust means, more atrocious than to a man in indigent circumstances; that the offence he has committed has been against that very person, who intrusted his fortune to him; that it was to defraud the relations and friends of that person, who in his life-time, lived under his protection, and who at his death, as appeared in evidence, committed, in a most pathetic manner, his widow, his relations and all that were dear to him, to his protection; that he has made a scandalous and flagitious use of that situation he was put into by his dying friend; that this, a great crime in itself, has been, by the manner in which it was committed, highly aggravated; that the jury, by finding him guilty, have declared his whole defence was supported by perjured witnesses, that not contented with endeavouring to support his innocence by perjury, he went so far as to sing the charge of perjury upon his prosecutors; that he has added crime to crime, and perjury to perjury: He must, therefore, hear the sentence of the law, and hear it as a definitive sentence; that he must not look up for mercy. It would be cruel in the court to flatter him with mercy, when there is no intention to extend it. I must, therefore, undergo the severe task of pronouncing judgment against him.

“Judgment.—You must return from hence, &c. to the place from whence you came; from thence you are to be carried to the place of execution, where you are to be hanged by the neck until you are dead; and the Lord have mercy upon your soul.”

26.) Yesterday morning at seven o'clock her majesty was safely delivered of a princess; on which account notices were immediately sent to the lord chancellor, the archbishop of Canterbury, all the great officers of state, foreign ministers, &c. At ten o'clock the same day expresses were sent off to all the courts in Europe of the happy delivery of the queen, and the birth of a young princess.

The queen was taken ill on Wednesday night about eleven o'clock, and the great officers of state, &c. were sent for to Buckingham house; but her majesty being much better by twelve, they all went home, (except Dr. Hunter and the queen's midwife) but were sent for again in the morning about six.

Whitehall, May 3.] General Howe, commander in chief of his majesty's forces in North-America, having taken a resolution on the 7th of March to remove from Boston to Halifax with the troops under his command, and such of the inhabitants with their effects, as were desirous to continue under the protection of his majesty's forces; the embarkation was effected on the 17th of that month, with the greatest order and regularity, and without the least interruption from the rebels. When the packet came away, the first division of the transports were under sail, and the remainder were preparing to follow in a few days; the admiral leaving behind as many of the ships of war, as could be spared from the convoy, for the security and protection of such vessels as might be bound to Boston. Gaz.

3.] The king hath been pleased to order letters patent to be passed under the great seal of Great-Britain, constituting and appointing Richard lord viscount Howe, of the kingdom of Ireland, and the hon. William Howe, Esq; major general of his majesty's forces, and general of his majesty's forces in North America only, to be his majesty's commissioners for restoring peace to his majesty's colonies and plantations in North America; and for granting pardon to such of his majesty's subjects there, now in rebellion, as shall deserve the royal mercy.

His majesty hath also been pleased to nominate and appoint Henry Strachy, Esq; to be secretary to the said commission.

St. James's, May 14.] The king has been pleased to order a writ to be issued under the great seal of Great-Britain for summoning Francis Osborne, Esq; commonly called marquis of Carmarthen, up to the house of peers, by the stile and title of baron Osborne of Kiveton in the county of York.

The king has been pleased to grant unto her grace the dutchess of Argyll the dignity of a Baroness of the kingdom of Great Britain, by the name, stile, and title of baroness Hameldon, of Hameldon, in the county of Leicester; and the dignity of a baron to her heirs male.

The king has also been pleased to grant the dignity of a baron of the kingdom of Great-Britain unto the following gentlemen, and their heirs male; viz.

Alexander Hume Campbell, Esq; commonly called lord Polwarth, by the name, stile, and title of baron Hume of Berwick.

John Stuart, Esq; commonly called lord Mount Stuart, by the name, stile, and title of baron Cardiff of Cardiff Castle in the county of Glamorgan.

The right honourable Sir Edward Hawke, knight of the Bath, by the name, stile, and title of baron Hawke of Towton in the County of York.

The right honourable George Onslow, by the name, stile, and title of baron Cranley of Imper Court in the County of Surry.

The right honourable Sir Jeffery Amherst, Knt. of the Bath, by the name, stile, and title of baron Amherst of Holmesdale in the county of Kent.

Sir Brownlow Cust, Bart. by the name, stile, and title of baron Brownlow of Belton in the County of Lincoln.

George Pitt, Esq; by the name, stile, and title of baron Rivers of Stratfieldsay in the county of Southampton.

Nathaniel Ryde, Esq; by the name, stile, and title of baron Harrowby of Harrowby in the county of Lincoln.

Thomas Foley, Esq; of Great Whitley in the county of Worcester, by the name, stile, and title of baron Foley of Kidderminster in the county of Worcester.

Anecdote of King George II. and the Honourable Miss Chud—h.

When Miss C—— was maid of honour, a masquerade was advertised, at which the nobility and gentry strove who should outstrip the other in every species of luxurious extravagance. Miss C——'s taste was well known, and much admired. It is well remembered how fond the late king was of this species of entertainment.—He was particularly delighted with picking out Miss C——h, in any disguise she might happen to wear; but on the night to which we refer, it was not necessary to exert much skill in the discovery. The lady was dressed, or rather undressed, in the character of Iphigenia. Her garment was of flesh-coloured silk, fitted exactly to the body; but her bosom was bare.—His majesty, taking out his handkerchief, laid it on her breast, saying, "Let me hide, madam, the forbidden fruit.—It is impossible to view, and not wish to taste it."

BIRTHS.

March 9. THE grand duchess of Tuscany, of a prince.—April 6. The lady of lord Lincoln, of a daughter in Arlington-street.

MARRIAGES.

March 21. ROGER Jortin, Esq; of Chancery-lane, to Miss Maty, dau. of Dr. Maty, of the British Museum—25. Norman M'Leod, of M'Leod Esq; to Miss M'Kenzie, of Suddie, in Scotland, Esq;—Gore Townshend, Esq; of Honington-hall, in Warwickshire, to the hon. lady Elizabeth Windsor, sister to the earl of Plymouth.—April 7. Richard Bethel Cox, Esq; of Albemarle-street, to Miss Drummond, at Charing cross.—10. John Prestwich, Esq; only son of Sir Elias Prestwich, of Holm-hall, Lancashire, to Miss Margaret Hall, eldest dau. of the late alderman Hall of Dublin.—20 John Wilmot, Esq; eldest son of the right hon. Sir John Eardly Wilmot, knight, to Miss Sainthill, the only dau. and heiress of the late Samuel Sainthill, Esq.

DEATHS.

March 21. LADY Trevannion, at Bath, widow of Sir Harry Trevannion, and daughter of Sir Rowland Watts, Bart. of Worcestershire, dec.—William Mure, Esq; of Caldwell, in Scotland, one of the barons of the court of exchequer.—The lady of the lord bishop of Ely, in Hertford-street, Mayfair—25. The earl of Strathmore, one of the sixteen peers for Scotland, at Lisbon.—April 13. Peter Lafcelles, Esq; banker, and one of the directors of the East-India company.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

Kilkenny, April 24.] Last Saturday, Roger Maher was executed at Gallows-green, pursuant to his sentence, for being concerned with those insatuated rioters called White Boys.

Same day James Kennedy, alias captain Madcap Setfire, and James Duffy, were executed at Brana in the Queen's County, pursuant to their sentence at Maryborough assizes, for White Boy practices. And,

On Monday last, Martin Bennet and Terence Phelan, two more of those deluded rioters, were executed at the four roads of Cuffesborough, in said county, pursuant to their sentence.

We hear that two more of the Maryborough White Boys will be executed at Cullowhill, and the remainder at Maryborough.

Cork, May 2.] Yesterday morning between eleven and eight o'clock an accidental fire broke out in the cellars of alderman Maylor, which burned with great violence until between twelve and one, and besides consuming the joists and roofs of the buildings, destroyed a great number of barrels, staves, hoops, &c. to the amount of several hundred pounds. The flame was at length subdued by the activity of Mr. Sheriff Lawton and many others of the inhabitants, who actuated by regard to a worthy citizen and magistrate, unable him self to give any assistance (Mr. Maylor being confined to his bed) as well as by the general principles of humanity exerted themselves on this occasion.—The engine belonging to St. Paul's parish did remarkable execution, but the other engines, we are told, are shamefully unfit for service.

Clenmell, 4.] This day Edmund Grady was executed opposite the jail in this town, pursuant to his sentence for committing a rape on the body of Mary Donoghoe, he utterly denied the fact at the place of execution.

Cork, 9.] We are informed that Mr. John Broaderick, of Boerhaven, in this county, hath by unwearied application and painful study, discovered the longitude, which he found by an observation of the sun's meridian altitude with greater exactness than the latitude, by which the variation of the compass is corrected, nor would an automaton, though truly made, serve any where but upon the equator. By this great discovery time is explained and corrected in all parallels round the globe, and many errors exposed in other sciences, and a great one in land-surveying.—Said Mr. Broaderick is now compiling his works, and by the 25th of June we hope to hear of his application to the commissioners of Longitude for the reward which is 10,000l. if he determines the same to one degree of a circle, 15,000l. if to two thirds of that distance, and 20,000l. if to one half a degree, to be paid by the treasurer of the navy.

This morning the Surprise revenue cruiser, arrived here exprols from Milford, it is said, countermanding the sailing of the victualling ships from hence to Boston, and ordering their destination to Hallifax.

DUBLIN.

May 4.] Dennis Eagan was executed at St. Stephen's-green, for house robbery, pursuant to his sentence.

5.] Early in the morning, some of the prisoners in Newgate, having got off their irons, intended to escape out of a part of the Jail two stories high, and broke a hole through the wall; Whyte, Cassidy, and Pagan got out by the help of a rope before a discovery was made.

The following article of intelligence is an authenticated fact:—Lately a young gentleman, who is a midshipman of a frigate now lying at Portsmouth, (and son to the hon. Mr. Scott, Brother to the earl of Deloraine) being up in the shrouds of his vessel, was by some accident shaken off, and thrown into the sea; the tide was going out with the utmost rapidity, and the young gentleman, who could not swim, was in the greatest danger of perishing. A seaman, who happened to be near him on the shrouds when he fell, seeing his situation, but feeling also that if he descended regularly, and waited to get a boat out, the youth must inevitably be lost, generously plunged into the deep, swam after him, and fortunately came up with him when he was just exhausted. The ship taking the alarm during this interval, a boat was dispatched with all possible haste after both, and the honest tar, with the young gentleman in his hand, was soon brought on board, amidst the general acclamations of the ship's company.

May 6.] Was held a post assembly at the Tholsel, to elect sheriffs for the ensuing year, to commence at Michaelmas next, in the room of Alexander Kirkpatrick and Joseph Andrews, Esqrs. who have fined; when the following persons were returned by the Commons to the board of Aldermen as proper persons:

Mr. Ambrose Leet, who had suffrages,	50
Mr. Henry Howison, merchant,	48
Mr. William Alexander, Jun. merchant,	47
Mr. Patrick Bride, apothecary,	46
Mr. John Rose, merchant, —	46
Mr. William Worthington, weaver,	45
Mr. John Pentland, apothecary, —	43
Mr. John Nugent, merchant, —	42

Out of which return the Aldermen elected John Rose and William Alexander, Esqrs.

Extra of a genuine Letter from Philadelphia, dated March 12.

" Pennsylvania is preparing for the worst. Our river is defended by Chevaux-de-frize sunk in the channel (on which no less than three vessels have been sunk by the carelessness of pilots) a very large strong chain, a battery, a 20 gun ship, a large floating battery to carry 20 eighteen pounders, and 13 gun-gallies with an eighteen pounder in their bows, and 50 men properly provided for in each; three battalions of regulars, and from 30 to 40,000 militia.

" At New-York we have a founder who has already cast 14 or 15 excellent brass field pieces. We have a foundry for iron ordnance, from 24 pounders to swivels. As to iron shot, we have plenty, and, on a pinch, could supply the whole world. The means made use of to introduce the manufacture of salt-petre, has met with the desired success; in one manufactory they make 50 Cwt. per week. At Newbury, in New England, they make at least 100lb. per day."

Extra of a Letter from London, May 16.

Yesterday the court of Common Pleas pronounced a solemn adjudication in a cause wherein ——— Corley, an attorney of the courts, was plaintiff, and the sheriff of the county palatine of Lancaster, defendant. The question was, whether an attorney of the king's court could be arrested in the usual way, or whether an exhibition of his writ of privilege was not a sufficient indemnification to the sheriff to discharge him out of his custody; and also, whether an action could not lie against the sheriff for detaining the person after such exhibition?—The case being of public importance, the judges, after hearing counsel on each side, and advertg to every information, declared unanimously the following opinion: viz. That when an attorney of the king's courts is arrested in the general way, he cannot procure a super-seas until special bail put in, and after declaration filed; and that then he must plead his privilege in abatement, or apply to the court by way of motion. That to the writ of privilege must be annexed an affidavit of service, of admission, and of present practice. The spirit of the privilege of an attorney was fully explained to subsist in the public benefit, in whose service the laws supposed him to be acting, and extended merely to his person. That the conduct of the sheriff was perfectly legal, as the privilege had not been produced in the manner prescribed by law; and therefore the action for false imprisonment could not be supported.—Upon the above occasion a great number of the worthy fraternity attended, who expressed the utmost chagrin upon the occasion.

HIBERNIAN MAGAZINE:

O R,

Compendium of Entertaining Knowledge,

For J U N E, 1776.

Some Memoirs of Major General David Wooster. (With an elegant Engraving.)

THIS gentleman was born at New-haven, in the province of Connecticut in New-England, in the year 1711. As his father was a man of property, and this was his only son, he received a very liberal education, but his early disposition to a military life, made him enter the army when he was about twenty years old, where he signalized himself on every occasion that offered. In the war before last he commanded a company in general Pepperell's regiment of foot, and was present not only at the taking of Cape Breton, in which that corps had a very considerable share, but also in every action in America that war. When that regiment was reduced in the year 1749, captain Wooster's father being dead, he succeeded to his estate, and being captivated with the charms of Miss Boroughs, a young heiress of considerable property at Rehoboth, near Providence, he married her, resolving to dedicate the rest of his days to domestic tranquillity; and therefore he went on the half-pay list, on which he continued till the beginning of the present year, when he was struck off for accepting his present post in the continental army.

On the beginning of the troubles in America, as the congress knew they would be opposed by men of great experience and valour, they resolved to employ officers who should be eminently qualified in both these requisites. They soon turned their eyes on captain Wooster, desiring him to assist his native country in her present calamities. Although the captain was declined in years, and had long tasted the sweets of retirement, he did not refuse their call; he embraced their offers, and was appointed a major general in the service of the congress; in that post he hath confirmed the propriety of their choice, by a conduct answerable to their expectations, and on the defeat of general Montgomery before Quebec, the 31st of last December, general Wooster was ordered to march to the assistance of the besiegers, and by the last accounts received from that place, he was continuing the blockade of that important garrison.

General Wooster has two children, one, Mr. Thomas Wooster, a young gentleman of twenty-five years of age, and a daughter who is now in her twenty-second year. The son was educated as became the heir of a good estate, and sent over to Britain for his further improvement. He came lately to Ireland, where indulging himself too much in some youthful expenses, and the troubles in America preventing a punctuality of remittances, he became indebted for more than he could immediately answer, and was for some time confined in the Four Courts Marshalsea. His continuation

there

there was greatly lengthened by a piece of cruelty, which political caution could scarcely warrant. The letters between him and his father, although they contained nothing but what related to his own private affairs, were intercepted and suppressed, and consequently the payment of his debts, and the young gentleman's release greatly retarded: at length, means of intercourse being found through another channel, he received a considerable supply of money, and left this country. His father's injunctions were to remain in England, and not return to America, at least till the event of the troubles was known; but he could not reconcile to himself shrinking from any danger to which his father was exposed, and therefore he resolved to disobey his orders in this one point, and be present to assist him, or share his peril; for that purpose when he left Ireland, he went to the continent, to take the first opportunity of a passage to join the American army, and in all probability is now on his way thither.

An Account of an American Publication, entitled, Common Sense, with copious Extracts from that Pamphlet.

BY the date annexed to the introduction to this piece, [which since its importation hath engrossed much of the public attention] it appears to have been published at Philadelphia, the 14th of last February. The author is not named, though it has been ascribed to the pen of Mr. Hancock; but whoever was the compiler, it does not appear to contain the sentiments of one man only, but rather those of a majority of the continental congress; and seems as designed to prepare the minds of the Americans for an entire renunciation of British authority.

The writer sets out with a disquisition into the origin and design of government in general, which contains little more than hath been said by others, who have treated on that important subject. He next proceeds to make some remarks on the English constitution, on which he says, "it was noble for the dark and slavish times in which it was erected. When the world was over-run with tyranny the least remove therefrom was a glorious rescue. But that it is imperfect, subject to convulsions, and incapable of producing what it seems to promise, is easily demonstrated.

"Absolute governments [though the disgrace of human nature] have this advantage with them, that they are simple;

if the people suffer, they know the head from which their sufferings spring, know likewise the remedy, and are not bewildered with a variety of causes and cures. But the constitution of England is so exceedingly complex, that the nation may suffer for years together without being able to discover in which part the fault lies, some will say in one and some in another, and every political physician will advise a different medicine.

"I know it is difficult to get over local or long standing prejudices, yet if we will suffer ourselves to examine the component parts of the English constitution, we shall find them to be the base remains of two ancient tyrannies, compounded with some new republican materials.

"First.—The remains of monarchical tyranny in the person of the king.

"Secondly.—The remains of aristocratical tyranny in the persons of the peers.

"Thirdly.—The new republican materials, in the persons of the commons, on whose virtue depends the freedom of England.

"The two first, by being hereditary, are independent of the people; wherefore in a constitutional sense they contribute nothing towards the freedom of the state.

"To say that the constitution of England is an union of three powers reciprocally checking each other, is farcical; either the words have no meaning, or they are flat contradictions.

"To say that the commons is a check upon the king, presupposes two things.

"First.—That the king is not to be trusted without being looked after, or in other words, that a thirst for absolute power is the natural disease of monarchy.

"Secondly.—That the commons, by being appointed for that purpose, are either wiser or more worthy of confidence than the crown.

"But as the same constitution which gives the commons a power to check the king by withholding the supplies, gives afterwards the king a power to check the commons, by empowering him to reject their other bills; it again supposes that the king is wiser than those whom it has already supposed to be wiser than him. A mere absurdity!

"There is something exceedingly ridiculous in the composition of monarchy; it first excludes a man from the means of information, yet empowers him to act in cases where the highest judgment is required. The state of a king shuts him from the world, yet the business of a king requires him to know it thoroughly; wherefore the different parts, unnaturally opposing and destroying each other, prove the whole character to be absurd and useless.

"Some writers have explained the English constitution thus; the king, say they, is one, the people another; the peers are an house in behalf of the king; the commons in behalf of the people; but this hath all the distinctions of an house divided against itself; and though the expressions be pleasantly arranged, yet when examined they appear idle and ambiguous; and it will always happen, that the nicest construction that words are capable of, when applied to the description of some thing which either cannot exist, or is too incomprehensible to be within the compass of description will be words of sound only, and though they may amuse the ear, they cannot inform the mind, for this explanation includes a previous question, viz. How came the king by a power which the people are afraid to trust, and always obliged to check? Such a power could not be the gift of a wise people, neither can any power, which needs checking, be from God; yet the provision, which the constitution makes, supposes such a power to exist.

"But the provision is unequal to the task; the means either cannot or will not accomplish the end, and the whole affair is a felo de se: for as the greater weight will always carry up the less, and as all the wheels of a machine are put in motion by one, it only remains to know which power in the constitution has the most weight, for that will govern; and though the others, or a part of them, may clog, or, as the phrase is, check the rapidity of its motion, yet so long as they cannot stop it, their endeavours will be ineffectual; the first moving power will at last have its way, and what it wants in speed is supplied by time.

"That the crown is this overbearing part in the English constitution needs not be mentioned, and that it derives its whole consequence merely from being the giver of places and pensions is self-evident, wherefore, though we have been wise enough to shut and lock a door against absolute monarchy, we at the same time have been foolish enough to put the crown in possession of the key.

"The prejudice of Englishmen, in favour of their own government by king, lords, and commons, arises as much or more from national pride than reason. Individuals are undoubtedly safer in England than in some other countries, but the will of the king is as much the law of the land in Britain as in France, with this difference, that instead of proceeding directly from his mouth, it is handed to the people under the most formidable shape of an act of parliament. For the Fate of Charles the First, hath only made kings more subtle—not more just.

"Wherefore, laying aside all national pride and prejudice in favour of modes and forms, the plain truth is, that it is wholly owing to the constitution of the people, and not to the constitution of the government that the crown is not as oppressive in England as in Turkey.

"An inquiry into the constitutional errors in the English form of government is at this time highly necessary; for as we are never in a proper condition of doing justice to others, while we continue under the influence of some leading partiality, so neither are we capable of doing it to ourselves while we remain fettered by any obstinate prejudice. And as a man, who is attached to a prostitute, is unfitted to choose or judge of a wife, so any prepossession in favour of a rotten constitution of government will disable us from discerning a good one."

After these remarks, the author considers monarchy and hereditary successions, which he censures as contradictory to religion, reason and the natural rights of mankind; monarchy he looks upon as an evil, and a degradation and lessening of ourselves, and hereditary succession as an insult and imposition on posterity. His arguments occupy no less than fifteen pages, and can tend only to make men disgusted with their situation under a monarchy, whether absolute or limited. As such is the situation of this kingdom, we forbear to transcribe this part since it could answer, here no one desirable end.

The next part of this work contains, Thoughts on the present state of American affairs; here his remarks are very free, he says:

"The sun never shined on a cause of greater worth. 'Tis not the affair of a city, a county, a province, or a kingdom, but of a continent—of at least one eighth part of the habitable globe. 'Tis not the concern of a day, a year, or an age; posterity are virtually involved in the contest, and will be more or less affected, even to the end of time, by the proceedings now. Now is the seed time of continental union, faith and honour. The least fracture now will be like a name engraved with the point of a pin on the tender rind of a young oak; the wound will enlarge with the tree, and posterity read it in full grown characters.

"By referring the matter from argument to arms, a new æra for politics is struck; a new method of thinking hath arisen. All plans, proposals, &c. prior to the nineteenth of April, i. e. to the commencement of hostilities, are like the almanacks of the last year; which, though proper then, are superseded and useless now. Whatever was advanced by the advocates on either side of the question then, terminated in one and the same point, viz. a union with Great Britain; the only difference between the parties was the method of effecting it; the one proposing force, the other friendship; but it hath so far happened that the first hath failed, and the second hath withdrawn her influence.

"As much hath been said of the advantages of reconciliation, which, like an agreeable dream, hath passed away and left us as we were, it is but right, that we should examine the contrary side of the argument, and inquire into some of the many material injuries which these colonies sustain, and always will sustain, by being connected with, and dependent on Great Britain. To examine that connexion and dependence, on the principles of nature and common sense, to see what we have to trust to, if separated, and what we are to expect, if dependent.

"I have heard it asserted by some, that as America hath flourished under her former connexion with Great-Britain, that the same connexion is necessary towards her future happiness, and will always have the same effect. Nothing can be more fallacious than this kind of argument. We may as well assert, because a child has thriven upon milk, that it is never to have meat; or that the first twenty years of our lives is to become a precedent for the next twenty. But even this is admitting more than is true, for I answer roundly, that America would have flourished as much, and probably much more, had no European power had any thing to do with her. The commerce by which she had enriched herself are the necessities of life, and will always have a market while eating is the custom of Europe.

"But she has protected us, say some. That she hath engrossed us is true, and defended the continent at our expence as well as her own is admitted, and she would have defended Turkey from the same motive, viz. the sake of trade and dominion.

"Alas, we have been long led away by ancient prejudices, and made large sacrifices to superstition. We have boasted the protection of Great-Britain, without considering, that her motive was interest not attachment; that she did not protect us from our enemies on our account, but from her enemies on her own account, from those who had no quarrel with us on any other account, and who will always be our enemies on the same account. Let Britain wave her pretensions to the continent, or the continent throw off the dependence, and we should be at peace with France and Spain were they at war with Britain. The miseries of Hanover last war ought to warn us against connexions.

"It hath lately been asserted in parliament, that colonies have no relation to each other but through the parent country, i. e. that Pennsylvania and the Jerseys, and so on for the rest, are sister colonies by the way of England; this is certainly a very round-about way of proving relationship, but it is the nearest and only true way of proving enmityship if I may so call it. France and Spain never were, nor perhaps will be ever our enemies as Americans, but as our being the subjects of Great Britain.

"But Britain is the parent country, say some. Then the more shame upon her conduct. Even Brutes do not devour their young, nor savages make war upon their families; wherefore the assertion, if true, turns to her reproach; but it happens not to be true, or only partly so, and the phrase parent or mother country hath been jesuitically adopted by the — and his parasites, with a low papistical design of gaining an unfair bias on the credulous weakness of minds. Europe, and not England, is the parent country of America. This new world hath been the asylum for the persecuted lovers of civil and religious liberty from every part of Europe. Hither have they fled, not from the tender embraces of the mother, but from the cruelty of the monster; and it is so far true of England, that the same tyranny which drove the first emigrants from home, pursues their descendants still.

"In this extensive quarter of the globe, we forget the narrow limits of three hundred and sixty miles (the extent of

of England) and carry our friendship on a larger scale ; we claim brotherhood with every European christian, and triumph in the generosity of the sentiment.

“ It is pleasant to observe by what regular gradations we surmount the force of local prejudice, as we enlarge our acquaintance with the world. A man born in any town in England divided into parishes, will naturally associate most with his fellow parishioners (because their interests in many cases will be common) and distinguish him by the name of neighbour ; if he meet him but a few miles from home, he drops the narrow idea of a street, and salutes him by the name of townsman ; if he travels out of the county, and meet him in any other, he forgets the minor divisions of street and town, and calls him countryman, i. e. countyman ; but if in their foreign excursions they should associate in France or any other part of Europe, their local remembrance would be enlarged into that of Englishmen. And by a just parity of reasoning, all Europeans meeting in America, or any other quarter of the globe, are countrymen ; for England, Holland, Germany, or Sweden, when compared with the whole, stand in the same places on the larger scale, which the divisions of street, town, and county do on the smaller ones ; distinctions too limited for continental minds. Not one third of the inhabitants, even of this province, are of English descent. Wherefore I reprobate the phrase of parent or mother country applied to England only, as being false, selfish, narrow and ungenerous.

“ But admitting that we were all of English descent, what does it amount to ? Nothing. Britain, being now an open enemy, extinguishes every other name and title : And to say that reconciliation is our duty, is truly farcical. The first king of England, of the present line (William the Conqueror) was a Frenchman, and half the peers of England are descendants from the same country ; wherefore by the same method of reasoning, England ought to be governed by France.

“ Much hath been said of the united strength of Britain and the colonies, that in conjunction they might bid defiance to the world. But this is mere presumption ; the fate of war is uncertain, neither do the expressions mean any thing ; for this continent would never suffer itself to be drained of inhabitants to support the British arms in either Asia, Africa, or Europe.

“ Besides, what have we to do with setting the world at defiance ? Our plan is commerce, and that, well attended to, will secure us the peace and friendship of all Europe ; because it is the interest of all Europe to have America a free port. Her trade will always be a protection, and her barrenness of gold and silver secure her from invaders.

“ I challenge the warmest advocate for reconciliation to show a single advantage that this continent can reap, by being connected with Great Britain. I repeat the challenge, not a single advantage is derived. Our corn will fetch its price in any market in Europe, and our imported goods must be paid for by them where we will.

“ But the injuries and disadvantages we sustain by that connection, are without number ; and our duty to mankind at large, as well as to ourselves, instruct us to renounce the alliance : Because, any submission to, or dependence on Great Britain, tends directly to involve this continent in European wars and quarrels ; and sets us at variance with nations, who would otherwise seek our friendship, and against whom we have neither anger nor complaint. As Europe is our market for trade, we ought to form no partial connection with any part of it. It is the true interest of America to steer clear of European connexions, which she never can do, while by her dependence on Britain, she is made the make-weight in the scale of British politics.”

The main design now appears, which is to throw off the British yoke and assert American independence. The arguments employed for that purpose are these :

“ Europe is too thickly planted with kingdoms to be long at peace, and whenever a war breaks out between England and any foreign power, the trade of America goes to ruin, because of her connexion with Britain. The next war may not turn out like the last, and should it not, the advocates for reconciliation now will be wishing for separation then, because, neutrality in that case, would be a safer convoy than a man of war. Every thing that is right or natural pleads for separation. The blood of the slain, the weeping voice of nature cries, 'Tis time to part. Even the distance at which the Almighty hath placed England and America, is a strong and natural proof, that the authority of the one, over the other, was never the design of Heaven. The time likewise likewise at which the continent was discovered, adds weight to the argument, and the manner in which it was peopled encreases the force of it. The reformation was preceded by the discovery of America, as if the Almighty graciously meant to open a sanctuary to the persecuted in future years, when home should afford neither friendship nor safety.

"The authority of Great-Britain over this continent, is a form of government, which sooner or later must have an end: And a serious mind can draw no true pleasure by looking forward, under the painful and positive conviction, that what he calls "the present constitution" is merely temporary. As parents, we can have no joy, knowing that this government is not sufficiently lasting to ensure any thing which we may bequeath to posterity: And by a plain method of argument, as we are running the next generation into debt, we ought to do the work of it, otherwise we use them meanly and pitifully. In order to discover the line of our duty rightly, we should take our children in our hand, and fix our station a few years farther into life; that eminence will present a prospect, which a few present fears and prejudices conceal from our sight.

"Though I would carefully avoid giving unnecessary offence, yet I am inclined to believe, that all those who espouse the doctrine of reconciliation, may be included within the following descriptions. Interested men, who are not to be trusted; weak men who cannot see; prejudiced men who will not see; and a certain set of moderate men, who think better of the European world than it deserves; and this last class by an ill-judged deliberation, will be the cause of more calamities to this continent than all the other three.

"It is the good fortune of many to live distant from the scene of sorrow; the evil is not sufficiently brought to their doors to make them feel the precariousness with which all American property is possessed. But let our imaginations transport us for a few moments to Boston, that seat of wretchedness will teach us wisdom, and instruct us for ever to renounce a power in whom we can have no trust. The inhabitants of that unfortunate city, who but a few months ago were in ease and affluence, have now no other alternative than to stay and starve, or turn out to beg. Endangered by the fire of their friends if they continue within the city, and plundered by the soldiery if they leave it. In their present condition they are prisoners without the hope of redemption, and in a general attack for their relief, they would be exposed to the fury of both armies.

"Men of passive tempers look somewhat lightly over the offences of Britain, and, still hoping for the best, are apt to call out, "Come we shall be friends again for all this." But examine the passions and feelings of mankind. Bring the doctrine of reconciliation to the touchstone of nature, and then tell me, whether you can hereafter love, honour, and faithfully serve the power that hath carried fire and sword into your land? If you cannot do all these, then are you only deceiving yourselves, and by your delay bringing ruin upon posterity. Your future connection with Britain, whom you can neither love nor honour, will be forced and unnatural, and being formed only on the plan of present convenience, will in a little time fall into a relapse more wretched than the first. But if you say, you can still pass the violations over, then I ask, hath your house been burnt? Hath your property been destroyed before your face? Are your wife and children destitute of a bed to lie on, or bread to live on? Have you lost a parent or a child by their hands, and yourself the ruined and wretched survivor? If you have not, then are you not a judge of those who have. But if you have, and can still shake hands with the murderers, then are you unworthy the name of husband, father, friend, or lover, and whatever may be your rank or title in life, you have the heart of a coward, and the spirit of a hypocrite.

"This is not inflaming or exaggerating matters, but trying them by those feelings and affections which nature justifies, and without which, we should be incapable of discharging the social duties of life, or enjoying the felicities of it. I mean not to exhibit horror for the purpose of provoking revenge, but to awaken us from fatal and unmanly slumbers, that we may pursue determinately some fixed object.

"It is repugnant to reason, to the universal order of things, to all examples from the former ages, to suppose, that this continent can longer remain subject to any external power. The most sanguine in Britain does not think so. The utmost stretch of human wisdom cannot, at this time compass a plan plan short of separation, which can promise the continent even a year's security. Reconciliation is now a fallacious dream. Nature hath deserted the connexion, and art cannot supply her place. For, as Milton wisely expresses, "never can true reconciliation grow where wounds of deadly hate have pierced so deep."

"Every quiet method for peace hath been ineffectual. Our prayers have been rejected with disdain; and only tended to convince us, that nothing flatters vanity, or confirms obstinacy in kings more than repeated petitioning—and nothing hath contributed more than that very measure to make the kings of Europe absolute: Witness Denmark and Sweden. Wherefore since nothing but blows will do, for God's sake, let us come to a final separation, and not leave the next generation to be cutting throats, under the violated unmeaning names of parent and child.

"To say, they will never attempt it again is idle and visionary, we thought so at the repeal of the stamp act, yet a year or two undeceived us; as well we may suppose that nations, which have been once defeated, will never renew the quarrel.

"As to government matters, it is not in the power of Britain to do this continent justice: The business of it will soon be too weighty, and intricate, to be managed with any tolerable degree of convenience, by a power, so distant from us, and so very ignorant of us; for if they cannot conquer us, they cannot govern us. To be always running three or four thousand miles with a tale or a petition, waiting four or five months for an answer, which when obtained requires five or six more to explain it in, will in a few years be looked upon as folly and childishness—There was a time when it was proper, and there is a proper time for it to cease.

"Small islands not capable of protecting themselves, are the proper objects for kingdoms to take under their care; but there is something very absurd, in supposing a continent to be perpetually governed by an island. In no instance hath nature made the satellite larger than its primary planet, and as England and America, with respect to each other, reverse the common order of nature, it is evident they belong to different systems: England to Europe, America to itself.

"I am not induced by motives of pride, party, or resentment to espouse the doctrine of separation and independence; I am clearly, positively, and conscientiously persuaded that it is the true interest of this continent to be so; that every thing short of that is mere patch-work, that it can afford no lasting felicity,—that it is leaving the sword to our children, and shrinking back at a time, when, a little more, a little farther, would have rendered this continent the glory of the earth.

"As Britain hath not manifested the least inclination towards a compromise, we may be assured that no terms can be obtained worthy the acceptance of the continent, or any ways equal to the expence of blood and treasure we have been already put to."

From hence the author, who hath returned as he proceeded, grows rather too hot for us to follow him, consistent with prudence. He descends to personalities, in which our sovereign is not spared, either as a king or a man: at length he discloses the intended plan of government, which he thinks proper to be pursued in America. It is this:

"The colonies have manifested such a spirit of good order and obedience to continental government, as is sufficient to make every reasonable person easy and happy on that head. No man can assign the least pretence for his fears, on any other grounds, than such as are truly childish and ridiculous, that one colony will be striving for superiority over another.

"Where there are no distinctions there can be no superiority, perfect equality affords no temptation. The republics of Europe are all (and we may say always) in peace. Holland and Switzerland are without wars, foreign or domestic: Monarchical governments, it is true, are never long at rest: the crown itself is a temptation to enterprising ruffians at home; and that degree of pride and insolence ever attendant on regal authority, swells into a rupture with foreign powers, in instances, where a republican government, by being formed on more natural principles, would negotiate the mistake.

"Let the assemblies be annual, with a president only. The representation more equal. Their business wholly domestic, and subject to the authority of a continental congress.

"Let each colony be divided into six, eight, or ten, convenient districts, each district to send a proper number of delegates to congress, so that each colony send at least thirty. The whole number in

in congress will be at least 390. Each congress to sit and to choose a president by the following method. When the delegates are met, let a colony be taken from the whole thirteen colonies by lot, after which let the whole congress choose (by ballot) a president from out of the delegates of that province. In the next congress, let a colony be taken by lot from twelve only, omitting that colony from which the president was taken in the former congress, and so proceeding on till the whole thirteen shall have their proper rotation. And in order that nothing may pass into a law but what is satisfactorily just, not less than three fifths of the congress to be called a majority.—He that will promote discord, under a government so equally formed as this, would join Lucifer in his revolt.

“But as there is a peculiar decency, from whom, or in what manner, this business must first arise, and as it seems most agreeable and consistent, that it should come from some intermediate body between the governed and the governors, that is between the congress and the people, let a Continental Conference be held, in the following manner, and for the following purpose.

“A committee of twenty-six members of congress, viz. two for each colony. Two members for each house of assembly, or Provincial convention; and five representatives of the people at large, to be chosen in the capital city or town of each province, for, and in behalf of the whole province, by as many qualified voters as shall think proper to attend from all parts of the province for that purpose; or, if more convenient, the representatives may be chosen in two or three of the most populous parts thereof. In this conference, thus assembled, will be united, the two grand principles of business, knowledge and power. The members of congress, assemblies, or conventions, by having had experience in national concerns, will be able and useful counsellors, and the whole, being empowered by the people, will have a truly legal authority.

“The conferring members being met, let their business be to frame a Continental Charter, or charter of the united colonies: (answering to what is called the Magna Charta of England) fixing the number and manner of choosing members of assembly, with their date of sitting, and drawing the line of business and jurisdiction between them: [Always remembering, that our strength is continental, not provincial:] Securing freedom and property to all men, and above all things the free exercise of religion, according to the dictates of conscience; with such other matter as is necessary for a charter to contain. Immediately after which, the said conference to dissolve, and the bodies which shall be chosen conformable to the said charter, to be the legislators and governors of this continent for the time being: Whose peace and happiness, may God preserve, Amen.

“But where, say some, is the king of America? I'll tell you, friend, he reigns above, and doth not make havock of mankind like the royal — of Britain. Yet that we may not appear to be defective even in earthly honors, let a day be solemnly set apart for proclaiming the charter; let it be brought forth placed on the divine law, the word of God, let a crown be placed thereon, by which the world may know, that so far as we approve of monarchy, that in America the law is king. For as in absolute governments the king is law, so in free countries the law ought to be king; and there ought to be no other. But lest any ill use should afterwards arise, let the crown at the conclusion of the ceremony be demolished, and scattered among the people whose right it is.

“A government of our own is our natural right: And when a man seriously reflects on the precariousness of human affairs, he will become convinced, that it is infinitely wiser and safer, to form a constitution of our own in a cool deliberate manner, while we have it in our power, than to trust such an interesting event to time and chance. If we omit it now, some *Massanello may hereafter arise, who laying hold of popular disquietudes, may collect together the desperate and the discontented, and by assuming to themselves the powers of government, may sweep away the liberties of the continent like a deluge. Should the government of America return again into the hands of Britain, the tottering situation of things will be a temptation for some desperate adventurer to try his fortune; and in such a case, what relief can Britain give? Ere she could hear the news the fatal business might be done; and ourselves suffering like the wretched Britons under the oppression of the conqueror. Ye that oppose independence now, ye know not what ye do; you are a door to eternal tyranny, by keeping vacant the seat of government. There are thousands and ten thousands, who think it glorious to expel from the continent, that barbarous and hellish power which hath stirred up the Indians and Negroes to destroy us, the cruelty hath a double guilt, it is dealing brutally by us, and treacherously by them.

“To talk of friendship with those in whom our reason forbids us to have faith, and our affections wounded through a thousand pores instruct us to detest, is madness and folly. Every day wears out the little remains of kindred between us and them, and can there be any reason to hope, that as the relationship expires, the affection will increase, or that we shall agree better, when we have ten times more and greater concern to quarrel over than ever?”

“Ye that tell us of harmony and reconciliation, can ye restore to us the time that is past? Can ye give to prostitution its former innocence? Neither can you reconcile Britain and America. The last cord now is broken, the people of England are presenting addresses against us. There are injuries which nature cannot forgive; she would cease to be nature if she did. As well can the lover forgive the ravisher of his mistress, as the continent forgive the murders of Britain. The Almighty hath implanted in us these unextinguishable feelings for good and wise purposes. They are the guardians of his image in our hearts. They distinguish us from the herd of common animals. The social compact would dissolve, and justice be extirpated the earth, or have only a casual existence were we callous to the touches of affection. The robber and the murderer, would often escape unpunished, did not the injuries which our tempers sustain, provoke us into justice.

“O ye that love mankind! Ye that dare oppose, not only the tyranny, but the tyrant, stand forth! Every spot of the old world is over-run with oppression. Freedom hath been hunted round the globe. Asia, and Africa, have long expelled her.—Europe regards her like a stranger, and England hath given her warning to depart! O! receive the fugitive, and prepare in time an asylum for mankind.”

Having thus proposed the plan, the June, 1776.

author's next enquiry is into the present ability of America, on this point he argues: “It is not in numbers but in unity, that our great strength lies; yet our present numbers are sufficient to repel the force of all the world. The continent hath, at this time, the largest body of armed and disciplined men of any power under Heaven; and is just arrived at that pitch of strength, in which no single colony is able to support itself, and the whole, when united can accomplish the matter, and either more, or less than this, might be fatal in its effects. Our land force is already sufficient, and as to naval affairs, we cannot be insensible, that Britain would never suffer an American man of war to be built while the continent remained in her hands. Wherefore we should be no forwarder an hundred years hence in that branch, than we are now; but the truth is, we should be less so, because the timber of the country is every day diminishing, and that which will remain at last, will be far off and difficult to procure.

“Were the continent crowded with inhabitants, her sufferings under the present circumstances would be intolerable. The more sea port towns we had, the more should we have both to defend and to lose. Our present numbers are so happily proportioned to our wants, that no man need be idle. The diminution of trade affords an army, and the necessities of an army create a new trade.

“Debts we have none; and whatever we may contract on this account will serve as a glorious memento of our virtue. Can we but leave posterity with a settled form of government, an independent constitution of its own, the purchase at any price will be cheap. But to expend millions for the sake of getting a few vile acts repealed, and routing the present ministry only, is unworthy the charge, and is using posterity with the utmost cruelty; because it is leaving them the great work to do, and a debt upon their backs, from which they derive no advantage. Such a thought is unworthy a man of honor, and is the true characteristic of a narrow heart and a peddling politician.

“The debt we may contract doth not deserve our regard if the work be but accomplished. No nation ought to be without a debt. A national debt is a national bond; and when it bears no interest, is in no case a grievance. Britain is oppressed with a debt of upwards of one hundred and forty millions sterling, for which she pays upwards of four millions interest. And as a compensation for her debt, she has a large navy; America is without a debt, and without a navy; yet for the twentieth part of the English national debt, could have a navy as large again. The navy of England is not worth, at this time, more than three millions and an half sterling."

"No country on the globe is so happily situated, so internally capable of raising a fleet as America. Tar, timber, iron, and cordage are her natural produce. We need go abroad for nothing. Whereas the Dutch, who make large profits by hiring out their ships of war to the Spaniards and Portuguese, are obliged to import most of the materials they use. We ought to view the building a fleet as an article of commerce, it being the natural manufactory of this country. It is the best money we can lay out. A navy when finished is worth more than it cost. And is that nice point in national policy, in which commerce and protection are united. Let us build; if we want them not, we can sell; and by that means replace our paper currency with ready gold and silver.

"In point of manning a fleet, people in general run into great errors; it is not necessary that one-fourth part should be sailors. The Terrible privateer, captain Death, stood the hottest engagement of any ship last war, yet had not twenty sailors on board, though her complement of men was upwards of two hundred. A few able and social sailors will instruct a sufficient number of active land-men in the common work of a ship. Wherefore, we never can be more capable to begin on maritime matters than now, while our timber is standing, our fisheries blocked up, and our sailors and shipwrights out of employ. Men of war of seventy and eighty guns were built forty years ago in New-England, and why not the same now? Ship-building is America's greatest pride, and, in which, she will in time excel the whole world. The great empires of the east are mostly inland, and consequently excluded from the possibility of rivalling her. Africa is in a state of barbarism; and no power in Europe, hath either such an extent of coast, or such an internal supply of materials. Where nature hath given the one, she has withheld the other; to America only hath she been liberal of both. The vast empire of Russia is almost shut out from the sea; wherefore, her boundless forests, her tar, iron, and cordage are only articles of commerce.

"In almost every article of defence we abound. Hemp flourishes even to rankness, so that we need not want cordage. Our iron is superior to that of other countries. Our small arms equal to any in the world. Cannon we can cast at pleasure. Saltpetre and gunpowder we are every day producing. Our knowledge is hourly improving. Resolution is our inherent character, and courage hath never yet forsaken us. Wherefore, what is it we want? Why is it that we hesitate? From Britain we can expect nothing but ruin. If she is once admitted to the government of America again, this Continent will not be worth living in. Jealousies will be always arising, insurrections will be constantly happening; and who will go forth to quell them? Who will venture his life to reduce his own countrymen to a foreign obedience? The difference between Pennsylvania and Connecticut, respecting some unlocated lands, shews the insignificance of a B—sh government, and fully proves, that nothing but Continental authority can regulate Continental matters.

"Another reason why the present time is preferable to all others, is, that the fewer our numbers are, the more land there is yet unoccupied, which instead of being lavished by the king on his worthless dependents, may be hereafter applied, not only to the discharge of the present debt, but to the constant support of government. No nation under heaven hath such an advantage as this.

"The infant state of the Colonies, as it is called, so far from being against, is an argument in favor of independence. We are sufficiently numerous, and were we more so, we might be less united. It is a matter worthy of observation, that the more a country is peopled, the smaller their armies are. In military numbers, the ancients far exceeded the moderns: and the reason is evident, for trade being the consequence of population, men become too much absorbed thereby to attend to any thing else. Commerce diminishes the spirit, both of patriotism and military defence. And history sufficiently informs us, that the bravest achievements were always accomplished in the non-age of a nation. With the increase of commerce, England hath lost its spirit. The city of London, notwithstanding its numbers, submits to continued insults with the patience of a coward. The more men have to lose, the less willing are they to venture. The rich are in general slaves to

to fear, and submit to courtly power with the trembling duplicity of a spaniel.

“ Youth is the seed time of good habits, as well in nations as in individuals. It might be difficult, if not impossible, to form the Continent into one government half a century hence. The vast variety of interests, occasioned by an increase of trade and population, would create confusion. Colony would be against colony. Each being able might scorn each other's assistance : and while the proud and foolish gloried in their little distinctions, the wise would lament that the union had not been formed before. Wherefore; the present time is the true time for establishing it. The intimacy which is contracted in infancy, and the friendship which is formed in misfortune, are, of all others, the most lasting and unalterable. Our present union is marked with both these characters : we are young, and we have been distressed ; but our concord hath withstood our troubles, and fixes a memorable æra for posterity to glory in.

“ The present time, likewise, is that peculiar time, which never happens to a nation but once, viz. the time of forming itself into a government. Most nations have let slip the opportunity, and by that means have been compelled to receive laws from their conquerors, instead of making laws for themselves. First, they had a king, and then a form of government ; whereas, the articles or charter of government, should be formed first, and men delegated to execute them afterward : but from the errors of other nations, let us learn wisdom, and lay hold of the present opportunity—To begin government at the right end.

“ As to religion, I hold it to be the indispensable duty of all government, to protect all conscientious professors thereof, and I know of no other business which government hath to do therewith. Let a man throw aside that narrowness of soul, that selfishness of principle, which the niggards of all professions are so unwilling to part with, and he will be at once delivered of his fears on that head. Suspicion is the companion of mean souls, and the bane of all good society. For myself I fully and conscientiously believe, that it is the will of the Almighty, that there should be diversity of religious opinions among us : It affords a larger field for our christian kindness. Were we all of one way of thinking, our religious dispositions would want matter for probation ; and on this liberal principle, I look on the various denominations among us, to be like children of the same family, differing only, in what is called their Christian names.

“ To conclude, however strange it may appear to some, or however unwilling they may be to think so, matters not, but many strong and striking reasons may be given, to shew, that nothing can settle our affairs so expeditiously as an open and determined declaration for independence. Some of which are,

“ First.—It is the custom of nations, when any two are at war, for some other powers, not engaged in the quarrel, to step in as mediators, and bring about the preliminaries of peace : but while America calls herself the subject of Great Britain, no power, however well disposed she may be, can offer her mediation. Wherefore, in our present state we may quarrel on for ever.

“ Secondly.—It is unreasonable to suppose, that France or Spain will give us any kind of assistance, if we mean only to make use of that assistance for the purpose of repairing the breach, and strengthening the connection between Britain and America ; because, those powers would be sufferers by the consequences.

“ Thirdly.—While we profess ourselves the subjects of Britain, we must, in the eye of foreign nations, be considered as rebels. The precedent is somewhat dangerous to their peace, for men to be in arms under the name of subjects ; we on the spot, can solve the paradox : but to unite resistance and subjection, requires an idea much too refined for common understanding.

“ Fourthly.—Were a manifesto to be published, and dispatched to foreign courts, setting forth the miseries we have endured, and the peaceable methods we have ineffectually used for redress ; declaring, at the same time, that not being able, any longer to live happily or safely under the cruel disposition of the British court, we had been driven to the necessity of breaking off all connection with her ; at the same time assuring all such courts of our peaceable disposition towards them, and of our desire of entering into trade with them : Such a memorial would produce more good effects to this Continent, than if a ship were freighted with petitions to Britain.

“ Under our present denomination of British subjects we can neither be received nor heard abroad : The custom of all courts is against us, and will be so, until, by an independence, we take rank with other nations.

“ These proceedings may at first appear strange and difficult ; but, like all other steps which we have already passed over, will in a little time become familiar and agreeable ; and, until an independence is declared, the Continent will feel itself like a man who continues putting off some unpleasant business from day to day, yet knows it must be done, hates to set about it, wishes it over, and is continually haunted with the thoughts of its necessity.

To the second edition is added an appendix more flaming than the work itself.

Edwald and Ellen, an Heroic Ballad In two Cantos. By Mr. Thistlethwaite; entire. (Sold in London for 1s. 6d.)

Quis, talia fando,
Temperet a lachrymis ?

Virgil.

CANTO I.

DEEP in a desert's lonely wild,
Far from the devious paths of man,
A hapless youth,—Misfortune's child,
To solitude and silence ran.

No silver hairs emboss'd his head,
By furrow'd time as trophies hung ;

Age had not yet its honours spread,
Nor marr'd the music of his tongue.

Him, bounteous nature's lavish hand,
With choicest gifts profusely blest ;

His frame by boundless wisdom plan'd,
The justest symmetry confest.

The radiant lustre of his eyes
Outshone the sparkling orbs of night,
Who's splendid beams at once surprize,
And captivate the gazer's sight.

Sorrow, in reason's robe array'd,
Broke the romantic dream of pride ;
And all his actions virtue sway'd,
For virtue ever was his guide.

Yet discontent, corrosive foe,
Despotic triumph'd in his soul ;

Imbitter'd infant thought with woe,
And bade affliction's billows roll.

Health, blushing like the eastern sky,
Remote fled rapid from his face ;

His cheek display'd a fainter dye,
His eye beam'd forth a fainter grace.

So borne on pleasure's gaudy wing,
Youth's flow'ry path of life is past ;

And each enchanting scene of spring
Gives way to winter's chilling blast.—

If haply meditation's aid
Calm'd the fierce tumult of his breast ;

And lenient patience,—Heav'n-born maid !
Compos'd his throbbing heart to rest :

Stretch'd on the lowly bed of earth,
Resign'd he'd lay his sorrows down ;

Despise the pageantry of birth,
Nor dread a madd'ning monarch's frown.

Yet sleep—sweet comfort of distress !
Would oft withhold its healing balm ;

But seldom would his wishes bleis
And give his cares a transient calm.

Full oft' his overburthen'd heart,
By frequent sighs a cure would seek ;
Full oft' the pregnant tear would start,
And slowly wander o'er his cheek.

“ O once the herald of my fame, “ Sweet morn—(he cry'd)—come sooth my grief !”

On drowsy wing the morning came ;
It came, but brought him no relief !—

Long eye the thirsty God of day
Had sip'd the silver-tinctur'd dew ;

Or had with animating ray
Call'd into life the barren view ;

Swift from his couch with rushes wild,
O'er distant heaths he took his way ;

Where desolation sickly smil'd
Beneath the curse of horror's sway.

No flow'ret grac'd th' aspiring hill ;
No grateful herbage crown'd the vale ;

Nor the sweet thistle's melting thrill
E'er harmoniz'd the pensive dale.

But ruin with gigantic stride
Wav'd the black plumage of her crest ;

And saw despair with barb'rous pride
Assail the gates of virtue's breast.

Beneath a rock all rudely rent,
Which nature in convulsions tore ;

Forlorn with woe, his feet he bent,
Where rough the rapid rivers roar.

There in a cell's sequester'd shade,
From care a short recess he sought,

To heal the wounds his sorrows made,
And vent his pond'rous load of thought.

Here whilst he pour'd forth all his soul,
And the big drop impearl'd his eye,

Confirming echo wail'd the whole,
Gave groan for groan and sigh for sigh.

“ Ye powers ! (he cry'd) at whose command
“ We bend beneath affliction's rod ;

“ The weight of whose correcting hand
“ Proclaims the Being of a God ;

“ 'Tis not for me to ask the cause
“ From whence this reprobation came ;

“ For me, to scrutinize the laws
“ That link this universal frame.

“ 'Tis not for me, with impious pride,
“ To murmur at the will divine :

“ For O, what mortal can decide
“ The boundless depths of Heaven's design !

“ Too well I know the latent spring
“ Eludes the reach of human art :

“ Escapes the sight of fancy's wing,
“ And mocks each impulse of the heart.

“ Yet sure the wretch whom laws severe,
“ (Severe tho' just) have doom'd to dye ;

“ To life may sacrifice a tear,
“ May ease his bosom with a sigh !

“ Did e'er I slight the widow's plaint,
“ Withhold my morsel from the poor ;

“ Refuse assistance to the faint,
“ Or spurn them hopeless from my door ?

“ Deaf to the friendless orphan's cry,
“ Say, did I steel my stubborn breast ;

“ Provoke the tear from virtue's eye,
“ Or mock the wants of worth distress'd ?

“ Am I so curs'd ?—Let conscience speak,
“ Arm'd with its sharp envenom'd sting ;

“ If so, let guilt transform my cheek,
“ And shame obstruct each vital spring !

“ But

" But ah !—No coward guilt I know,
 " No conscious shame o'er spreads my face ;
 " Vice, potent vice, I stamp'd my foe,
 " And shelter'd virtue from disgrace !
 " When merit asked superior praise,
 " Ne'er did my heart with envy pine ;
 " Nor did I consecrate the bays
 " To vicious grandeur's flow'ry shrine.
 " One only wish my bosom knew ;
 " One only wish my soul possess'd ;
 " A friend I ask'd, devoutly true,
 " To share the secrets of my breast.
 " But ah !—a faithless friend I found—
 " —O mercy !—wast my pray'r to heaven,
 " Nor let remembrance rend the wound,
 " Which base ingratitude hath giv'n !
 " In one short hour's contracted space
 " My peace endur'd its final blow ;—
 " In humid mazes o'er my face,
 " Ye briny tears, for ever flow !
 " Sincere myself, ah too sincere !
 " I fondly thought each breast the same ;
 " 'Till falsehood, gend'ring black despair,
 " Damp'd the pure glow of friendship's flame.
 " O friendship ! heav'nly spark refin'd,
 " In what fair region do'st thou dwell ?
 " Fled from ambition's fond mind,
 " Say, do'st thou seek the hermit's cell ?
 " Ah no !—Escap'd this narrow earth,
 " Thou scorn'st the low abodes of men ;
 " From Heaven thou first receiv'st thy birth,
 " And back to Heav'n art gone again !
 " Erst, hov'ring o'er thy sacred shrine,
 " Soar'd dove-ey'd peace with vestal wing ;
 " There the sweet muse, with note divine,
 " On sapphire plumage deign'd to sing ;
 " But now, forlorn thy altars stand,
 " No soft'ning hand repairs thy urn ;
 " Peace, with the muses, flies the land,
 " Never, ah never to return !
 " Say Albert, faithless, perjur'd youth,
 " What demon led thy heart astray ;
 " Allur'd thee from the path of truth,
 " To tread in vice's broader way ?—
 " O thou, the base of virtue's throne,
 " To thee, bright candour, I appeal ;—
 " Felt I a joy to him unknown ?
 " Or he a pain I did not feel ?
 " With me he shared each varied scene,
 " Fraught with soft pleasure's balmy gale ;
 " What time content with look serene,
 " Effulgent glanc'd along the dale.
 " Firm on his brow with manhood warm,
 " Sat nervous strength and beauty join'd ;
 " Ah pity such an angel form,
 " Should e'er in shrine so base a mind !
 " Peace, tranquil as the summer sky,
 " Mild in his bosom seem'd to dwell ;
 " Perpetual joy illum'd his eye,
 " And smooth'd his accents as they fell.
 " But lo !—mature in fraudulent wiles,
 " Ingratitude possess'd his heart ;
 " Deception revel'd in his smiles,
 " And tainted every vital part.
 " O thou, the darling heir of hell,
 " Deceit, mean monarch of the mind ;
 " Bound in thine universal spell,
 " What various ills assail mankind !

" Within thy temple's spacious bound,
 " Where falsehood grasps her ebon lance ;
 " What prostrate multitudes are found !
 " What myriads weave the subtle dance !
 " Abject to thee, they bow the head,
 " To thee, the votive altar rear ;
 " For thee, the Parian floor they spread,
 " For thee, the mystic rites prepare.
 " Unmindful of each moral tie,
 " E'en age beguiles unwary youth ;
 " All, all the paths of candour fly,
 " And treach'ry triumphs over truth !"
 He said !—Responsive to his tale,
 The pitying echo made reply ;
 And softly breathing to the gale,
 Evinc'd her vocal sympathy.—
 So wreck'd upon some barren coast,
 Where the bleak winds incessant blow ;
 High from a rock in Æther loit,
 The pensive seaman looks below.
 In vain with penitential eyes,
 To earth, to Heav'n his griefs he tells ;
 In vain are breath'd his ardent sighs ;
 In vain 'gainst fate his tongue rebels.
 His sighs by passion fully fraught,
 Float fruitless on the desert air ;
 And terror, strong upon the thought,
 Engraves the portrait of despair.
End of the First Canto.

C A N T O II.

N O W madly o'er the sterile scene,
 Bright Phœbus shot his flaming ray ;
 Whilst no pure zephyr's breath serene,
 Allay'd the sultry heat of day.
 When forth emerging from the cave,
 The mansion dire of endless night ;
 Expressive emblem of the grave ;
 Again he fac'd the realms of light ;
 And stretch'd on nature's simple bed,
 A youthful warrior caught his sight ;
 Pale sorrow hov'ring o'er whose head,
 Hurl'd calm contentment down to night.
 Bound in a silk-enabled band,
 Unspent his quiver'd arrows hung ;
 And distant from his trembling hand
 Neglected lay his bow unstrung.
 Vanish'd was each celestial grace,
 That in his smiles was wont to lye ;
 And fallow was his beauteous face ;
 And languid was his moist'ned eye.
 The golden tresses of his hair,
 Luxuriant wanton'd down his back ;
 Not Alpine snows, though passing fair,
 Excelled the whiteness of his neck :
 Till tyrant love, to peace a foe,
 O'er youth's ripe roses spread his veil ;
 And bade the gushing torrent flow,
 And bade the coral lip grow pale.
 As when old Nilus, Egypt's pride,
 Swells with his waves the thirsty soil ;
 The peasant long to labour tried,
 Well pleas'd suspends his arduous toil ;
 High on some cloud aspiring hill,
 Amaz'd he sees the billows rise ;
 Nor strives his wonder to conceal,
 Nor seeks his transports to disguise.
 So eager gaz'd this kindred pair,
 Grief for a while resign'd her seat ;

E'en peace resum'd her empire there,
 Whilst pleasure gambol'd at her feet.
 But loon, on pallid pinnions borne,
 Dull care resum'd her tyrant sway :
 Reflection hasten'd her return,
 And banish'd pleasure far away.
 A while surprize, in antic vest,
 Their speech in filken fetters bound,
 Till first with throbbing anxious breast,
 The stranger thus his utterance found.
 "Saw, gentle youth, whose lonely feet
 "Eccentric tread this pensive plain ;
 "Whose presence cheers this sad retreat,
 "And mollifies the powers of pain :
 "Does pity, Heav'n-descended maid,
 "Affect thy heart at other's woe ?
 "Say, does her sympathetic aid,
 "Enforce thy artless tears to flow ?
 "Elie why those chrystal gems so clear,
 "That quiver in thy glossy eye ?
 "Else why aghast sits wild despair,
 "That prompts thy tender breast to sigh ?
 "See pleasure's flow'ry feet advance ;
 "She wreaths the chaplet for thy brow :
 "She counts thy footsteps to the dance ;
 "She fondly breathes her am'rous vow :
 "Go where her steps invite thy tread,
 "See love and rapture swell her train ;
 "For thee, her magic path is spread,
 "To lure thee from the desert plain.
 "To me, whom grief has long embrac'd,
 "Whom deep affliction well has tried ;
 "To me resign this dreary waste,
 "Replete with horrors multiplied.
 "So shalt thou join the blissful scene,
 "Where jocund spring with vernal bloom,
 "Bears on her downy wings serene
 "The fragrant sweets of ripe perfume.
 "When Eve with dewy fingers cold,
 "Enwraps the world in sullen night :
 "When silence stills the distant fold,
 "And the pale stars withhold their light ;
 "Here, contemplation's sober charms
 "Shall animate my tortur'd breast ;
 "Till nature, dead to life's alarms,
 "Shall find its cure in balmy rest."
 He ceas'd—suspended on the ear,
 Awhile his mournful accents hung ;
 Till thus reply'd his sad compeer,
 As artless truth inspir'd his tongue.
 "O thou, by wayward fortune cross'd,
 "In grief behold a rival here ;
 "To whose sad mind e'en hope is lost,
 "Sunk in the vortex of despair.
 "No vulgar birth obscures his fame,
 "Young Edwald owns no churlish fire :
 "From ancient kings he boasts his name,
 "From kings whose souls were form'd of fire.
 "See through this vein's etherial blue,
 "The crimson current swiftly course ;
 "From Gods it stole its matchless hue,
 "From Gods deriv'd its genuine source.
 "But ah ! nor birth, nor blood can charm,
 "When stern misfortune hurls her dart ;
 "Her hand no pray'r could e'er disarm,
 "Or find admittance to her heart !
 "Train'd to the glorious love of arms,
 "To draw the bow, and rear the shield ;
 "My bosom beat at war's alarms,
 "And early urg'd me to the field.
 "There midst the carnage of the plain,
 "Where death lay wallowing gorg'd with food ;
 "Whilst pity wept to view the slain,
 "And mad ambition swam in blood.
 "A youth I saw of Godlike mold
 "Go forth united foes to seek ;
 "To found his fame all praise were cold,
 "To sing his valour, words too weak,
 "Gainst legions I beheld him stand,
 "They fell like leaves before the blast ;
 "Revenge inspir'd his fatal hand,
 "E'en horror, trembling, stood aghast ;
 "O had you seen his furious ire,
 "When fast he grasp'd a bladeless hilt ;
 "His eye-balls flash'd with living fire,
 "And hope upon despair he built.
 "Like Mars, disarm'd, with matchless
 grace,
 "Awhile he proudly stood elate ;
 "O'erpower'd he fell,—I sought the place,
 "And snatch'd him fainting from his fate.
 "When time, whose salutary breath
 "Reanimates life's dying flame ;
 "Safe from the gloomy cave of death,
 "Had brought the hero back to fame.
 "I strain'd him to my eager arms,
 "I made him partner of my breast ;
 "I told him too, how Ellen's charms
 "Had triumph'd over Edwald's rest.
 "Attentive to the tender tale,
 "His bosom heav'd a frequent sigh ;
 "Whilst sympathy afloat the gale,
 "Bade the full torrent swell the eye.
 "Go then, I cry'd, my Albert, go,
 "Commend me to the gentle maid,
 "And tell her how my wishes glow,
 "And tell her all my love hath said.
 "But ah,—take heed, fond youth,—beware,
 "And guard thy heart from each surprize ;—
 "In every glance suspect a snare,
 "In every glance of Ellen's eyes.
 "Swift as the arrow's trackless force,
 "When desperation wings its flight ;
 "Swift as the gilded meteors course,
 "Across the starry realms of night :
 "To Severn's banks he bent his way,
 "Whose dashing waters roar along ;
 "Where tunes the bard his rustic lay,
 "As simple nature aids the song.
 "There love and Ellen rul'd the plain,
 "No fond disguise, no specious art,
 "Could damp the glow of candour's reign,
 "Or mar the virtues of her heart.
 "When war had broke his murd'rous spear,
 "And peace her myrtle crown display'd ;
 "When present joy had conquer'd care,
 "I flew transported to the maid.
 "I found,—ah, fancy if you can,
 "What speechless rapture fill'd my mind !
 "I found—the highest bliss of man—
 "My Albert true—my Ellen kind !
 "O have you seen the Summer sky
 "Diversified with glowing red ?
 "Such was the bright immortal dye,
 "That on her virgin cheek was spread.

"But

" But ah!—to rightly paint the whole,
 " Description's florid tongue defies,—
 " Truth sat triumphant in her soul,
 " And flash'd conviction from her eyes.
 " With anxious hope, by passion warm'd,
 " I claim'd the promise of her charms;
 " The gen'rous maid my hopes confirm'd,
 " And yielded to my eager arms.
 " Shine forth, I said, in all thy pride,
 " Bright orb, and lend thy friendly aid;
 " Breathe soft, ye foit'ring gales, I cried,
 " And lo, the sun and gale obey'd!
 " The priest the golden censer rear'd,
 " The flaming incense curl'd on high,
 " Doubt, like an idle dream appear'd,
 " And all was wrapt in ecstasy.
 " But ah, how soon the unfetter'd winds
 " The ocean's tranquil face deform!
 " How soon the tempest's rage combines
 " To rock creation in a storm!
 " For now the sable wing of night
 " Had rob'd the world in pitchy stole;
 " No star appear'd to shed its light,
 " But potent darkness rul'd the whole.
 " When Albert, in whose treach'rous mind
 " Ingratitude—(ah pity!)—sway'd;
 " With lust, to faith and friendship blind,
 " Convey'd away my peerless maid.
 " Swift as the eagle's tow'ring speed,
 " I sought the wood;—but sought in vain:
 " To senseless rocks declar'd the deed,
 " The senseless rocks but mock'd my pain!
 " O curse on fortune's partial spite,
 " That, jealous, fail'd to intervene!
 " And doubly curs'd the conscious night,
 " Whose sable eye survey'd the scene!
 " Say in that black, that fatal hour,
 " When treachery wav'd his iron rod,
 " When pale deceit, with giant pow'r,
 " Brav'd the slow vengeance of a God:
 " Say then, thou fust unerring cause,
 " Whose wisdom rules this giddy sphere;
 " Whose word gave birth to nature's laws,
 " Which trembling worlds obey and fear:
 " Where was thy wonted justice fled?
 " Thy red-hot hoard of light'nings where?
 " To strike the base betrayer dead,
 " And snatch a victim from despair!"
 As when rude Boreas sounds his horn,
 And bids the rising tempest rage;
 O'er the white wave resistless borne,
 Huge barks unequal combat wage,
 So by affliction's billows tost,
 Fierce rag'd the tumult in his soul;
 Sense, reason, patience, all were lost,
 Nor left an atom of the whole!
 Entranc'd in thought, his wond'ring mate,
 Trac'd each event with anxious pain;
 Reflection caught the clue of fate,
 And fix'd her empire in the brain:
 Soft as the glance of pity's eye,
 And tuneful as the voice of spring;
 And gentle as the evening's sigh,
 That plays upon the linnet's wing;
 He spake, whilst urg'd by mem'ry, ran
 The full big tears fast down his cheeks—
 " Look up, look up, thou wond'rous
 man,
 " It is, it is—thy Ellen speaks!

" Tho' force and fraud with Albert join'd,
 " My faith, my constancy to prove:—
 " Yet still no fraud could change my mind,
 " No force could gain thy Ellen's love.
 " But heav'n, to whom my griefs I told,
 " Wak'd the loud whirlwind from its bed;
 " The light'ning flash'd, the thunders roll'd,
 " And fell on Albert's guilty head.
 " Six times the moon with borrow'd light,
 " Hath shewn the world her ripen'd form;
 " Since thus disguis'd I've dar'd the night,
 " Despis'd the wind, and brav'd the storm.
 " With care and watchings, faint and sore,
 " My spirits broke, my strength decay'd;
 " Soon shall my toil of life be o'er,
 " And all my ills in dust be laid.
 " Yet e'en in death to thee I'll give " The frail memorial of a sigh;—
 " O could I choose, with thee I'd live,
 " Or not to live with thee—I'd die!
 " Then hear me, Edwald, by thy love,
 " I charge thee hear my last request;—
 " Nor let confirm'd despair remove
 " The seat of reason from thy breast,
 " For what avails unbounded grief,
 " Pour'd forth at sorrow's sable shrine?
 " 'Tis wisdom only brings relief,
 " Then, Edwald, be that wisdom thine!"
 But ere the fond injunction came,
 Grim death had shot his icy dart;
 Diminish'd Edwald's vital flame,
 And reign'd convulsive at his heart.
 " Wilt thou then die?" fair Ellen cry'd,
 " And must my Edwald yield his breath?
 " Yet stay awhile, for lo, thy bride
 " Shall join thy image e'en in death!"
 So spake,—On hope's swift pinion's blue,
 Her ardent soul forsook her breast.—
 Earth lost two lovers fond and true,
 And heav'n, well pleas'd, two saints possess'd.

The Life of Mrs. Margaret, alias Caroline Rudd. (Concluded from p. 316.)

DANIEL, who himself was pleased with gaiety, and of an ambitious turn, did not dislike this splendid mode, not in the least imagining that he was to be the dupe to satisfy the demands of such grandeur, as he looked upon Mrs.
 Rudd to have great dependence on her pretended parent, the pretender, whose daughter she affirmed she was by the sister of lord Dundee.

Though Mrs. Rudd was thus lavishly extravagant, yet it sometimes arose to even an absurd and wanton method of flinging away her money. As her complexion was exceedingly pale, she did not fail of making use of art to supply the defects of nature, and was deemed one of the most complete visage plaiters- ers of her time, laying on the rouge, carmine, flake, &c. so dexterously, and giving her features such proper tints, that art was often mistaken even by an accurate inspection for natural beauty. One day when she had borrowed (for that was her method of getting money from Daniel) seventy pounds, she carelessly wrapt her paint up in it, which being partly used, she threw it towards the fire, but fortunately the paper fell under the grate, where it was found afterwards by Mrs. Hart, a servant to Mrs. Rudd, who returned it to her mistress.

Mr. Daniel Perreau hitherto could not be accused of any particular criminal act, but Mrs. Rudd's ambition still increasing, Mr. P. was persuaded to take a larger house, and furnished it very elegantly. It was there Mrs. Rudd passed for his wife, and it was there such heavy expences were incurred, that extraneous methods were obliged to be used to support the extravagance of their living, which closed in such a fatal end.

Thus far then, Mr. Printer, have I traced this noted lady through the most remarkable circumstances of her life, down to her removal into Harley-Street; I would go farther, till the death of Mr. Dan. Perreau, but as those particulars have been so repeatedly and universally handed about in the newspapers, their cases, trials, &c. that there is not the least doubt but most of your readers are acquainted with them. It would therefore be only tautology and tedious to insert them. I shall conclude with a short reflection on this unhappy affair.

We have seen through the life of this woman, how fatal the too implicit confidence a man may place in the disgraceful part of her sex may prove. The strong affection Mr. P. had for her, blinded his discernment, and prevented his seeing or taking proper notice of her faults although exposed openly to view. His love made him the dupe to her artifices, and the ruin of his fortune was the effect of his hopes to reclaim her, and his endeavours to keep her solely to himself, by indulging her in every extravagant desire. If we look into her actions merely with a view to her talents, we find the most consummate policy joined with an abundant share of sense, which had they been turned into another channel, would have made her an ornament to the female sex, whereof now she is the disgrace. So much the more contemptible and wicked as her abilities are greater. Mr. D. Perreau, though condemned by his country, and to all appearances guilty, yet deserves the tear of pity, as he fell a sacrifice to the craft of a woman he loved, by indulging her in all her extravagance: though he fell by an ignominious death, yet it should be remembered he is not the first man that has been the fatal dupe to female artifices; even Mrs. R. herself, in her case acknowledges his love, his fidelity, his goodness to her and her little ones. Never father was fonder of his children, she says, nor never could man behave better to a woman than he did, till that unfortunate note. Can it then be thought that he could suddenly turn cruel? no man is wicked all at once: time is required to form the villain; vice and virtue has its degrees, and though it may be truly said, he had been for some time increasing in the crime of forgery, yet from his behaviour to the woman, let us look upon the unfortunate dead in the most favourable light, and brand with living shame the female, whose life has been one continued scene of craft, extravagance and debauchery.

Singular Manner of Marrying in China.

A Man cannot live unmarried to the age of twenty in China, without becoming the object of ridicule: but then the consent of the parties is never asked. Their parents or guardians enter into a contract when the boy and girl are infants, and when they arrive at years of maturity, the young gentleman sends the lady a present suitable to her quality; a splendid cavalcade is made; the bride is conveyed to the house of her spouse, who never sees her till she enters his doors; then he unlocks the chair that brings her; and if he does not like her, he is at liberty to return her to her friends that moment, provided he is willing to lose the presents that have been made her, with which he may be said to purchase his wife; for he never receives any fortune with her. The lady, however has not the like option:—if her husband will keep her, she is not allowed to retreat, how much soever he proves to be her aversion, and though he may have several other wives and concubines.

When the man has once received his wife, he cannot turn her off, unless it be for adultery, or some notorious crime: but in these cases he may sell her, and purchase another for the money. As to the common people, they seem to be so much ashamed of living single, after the age at which the custom of their country allows them to marry; or they have such a strong propensity towards matrimony, that they will sometimes consent to become slaves, on condition that they may have a slave in the family for a wife, when they are not in circumstances to purchase one. The Life of Dr. George Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury.

DR. GEORGE ABBOT, archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of James I. was the son of Maurice Abbot, of Guilford, in Surry, in which town he was born in the year 1562, and educated in grammar-learning at the free-school there. While his mother was pregnant with him, she is said to have had a dream, which being thought to be an omen, really proved a means of his advancement: she was told in her sleep, that if she could eat a pike, the child she had conceived would be a son, and arise to great preferment. Not long after this, in taking a pail of water out of the river Wey, which ran by her house, she accidentally caught a pike, which she accordingly eat. The story being reported to some gentlemen in the neighbourhood, they offered to stand sponsors for the child, and afterwards shewed him many marks of favour, both while at school, and at the university. Young Abbot was removed, in 1578, to Baliol-college, in Oxford. Having completed his course of academical learning, and taken his degrees in arts and divinity, he was, in 1599, installed dean of Winchester. The next year he was chosen vice-chancellor of the university of Oxford, which high office he afterwards executed at two different times with the greatest applause. In 1609 he was consecrated bishop of Litchfield and Coventry; and, about a month after, translated to the bishopric of London; and from thence, April 9, 1611, to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury. On the 23d of June following he was sworn of the privy-council.

He was indebted for his advancement to the recommendation of George Hume, earl of Dunbar; though lord Clarendon represents him as very unfit for the see of Canterbury at that time, when the Calvinists and Nonconformists grew so formidable to the established church: since Abbot "considered the Christian religion no otherwise than as it abhorred and reviled popery, and valued those men most who did that the most furiously; whereas, for the strict observation of the discipline of the church, or the conformity to the articles or canons of it, he made little inquiry, and took less care: and having made very little progress in the ancient and solid study of divinity, he adhered only to the doctrine of Calvin, and for his sake did not think so ill of the discipline as he ought to have done: but if men forbore a public reviling and railing at the hierarchy and ecclesiastical government, let their opinions and private practice be what it would, they were not only secure from any inquisition of his, but acceptable to him, and, at least, equally preferred by him." But whatever exceptions might be made to the archbishop on this account, his zeal for the protestant cause, over Europe in general, induced him, upon the elector palatine's being chosen king of Bohemia, in 1619, to exert all his interest with the court of England for supporting that election.

In July 1721, a calamitous accident befel him in lord Zouch's park at Bramzill, in Hampshire: as he was shooting at a deer with a cross-bow, the keeper coming up unwarily too forward, was struck with the arrow under his left arm, and died about an hour after. The king being informed of this misfortune, and apprehensive that scandal might ensue, wrote a letter to several bishops, judges, and others, to examine the case, who were of opinion, that a restitution, or dispensation, might be given to the archbishop, to prevent any exceptions to his character, which was accordingly granted him. However, this shocking accident made so deep an impression upon his grace, that he ever after fasted once a month, viz. on a Tuesday, the day on which it happened, and settled an annuity of twenty pounds upon the widow of the unhappy man.

The archbishop's political conduct and principles had long rendered him obnoxious to the court, which at last ended in his disgrace; for on the 9th of October, 1627, he was sequestered from his office and jurisdiction, and his authority transferred to Mountain, bishop of London, Neile, bishop of Durham, Buckeridge, bishop of Rochester, Howson, bishop of Oxford, and Laud, bishop of Bath and Wells; and himself was confined to his house at Ford. The occasion of this rigour towards him, was his refusal to licence a sermon, preached by one Dr. Sibthorp, at the assizes at Northampton, wherein it was asserted, that the king only had the power of making laws; and that when princes command things which their subjects cannot perform, because they are inconsistent with the laws of God or Nature, or impossible, yet they are bound to undergo the punishment, without either resisting, or railing, or reviling, and yield a passive obedience, where they cannot exhibit an active one: and that there was no other case but one of these three, wherein a subject can excuse himself with passive obedience, since in all others he is bound to active obedience. 'This doctrine Mr. Collier himself observes to be "arbitrary enough in all conscience; and were it pursued thro' its consequences, would make Magna Charta, and the other laws for settling property, signify little." However, Sibthorp was by some courtiers commended for his loyalty, and his sermon reported to the king as a serviceable discourse. Upon this his majesty sent it to the archbishop, with a command to license it; who being shocked with the passages above cited, besides other exceptions, refused to comply. This highly exasperated the king, who immediately ordered him to be suspended; but in the latter end of the year 1628, he was restored to his liberty and jurisdiction, being sent for to court, and received from his barge by the archbishop of York and the earl of Dorset, and by them solemnly introduced to the king, who gave him his hand with a particular countenance of favour, bidding him not fail the council-table twice a week. He died at his palace of Croydon, on the 4th of August, 1633, in the seventy-first year of his age, and was interred in Trinity-church at Guilford.

Lord Clarendon describes him in very severe terms, as a man of very morose manners, and a very sour aspect, which in that time was called gravity, and totally ignorant of the true constitution of the church of England, and the state and interest of the clergy. But Dr. Welwood represents him to much greater advantage, as a person of wonderful temper and moderation, who in all his conduct shewed an unwillingness to stretch the act of uniformity beyond what was absolutely necessary for the peace of the church; or the prerogative of the crown, any further than conduced to the good of the state. However, not being well formed for a court, tho' otherwise of considerable learning and genteel education, he either could not, or would not, stoop to the humour of the times; and sometimes, by an unseasonable stiffness, gave occasion to his enemies to represent him as not well inclined to the prerogative, or too much addicted to a popular interest, and therefore not fit to be employed in matters of government. He was extremely averse to the doctrines of the Arminians, which will account for a very injurious character which he wrote of the great Hugo Grotius, one of their ablest patrons.

"Archbishop Abbot, says Mr. Gran-ger, recommended himself to king James by his prudent behaviour in Scotland, in relation to the union of the churches of that kingdom; and by his Narrative of the Case of Sprot, who was executed in 1608, for having been concerned in the Gowry conspiracy. As the reality of that dark design had been called in question, he endeavoured, by this Narrative, to settle the minds of the people in the belief of it. He was a prelate of great learning and piety, but was esteemed a puritan in doctrine, and, in discipline, too remiss for one placed at the head of the church. He had a considerable hand in the translation of the New Testament now in use." He wrote an Exposition of the Prophet Jonah, a brief Description of the whole World, and several other tracts.

The Life of Dr. Robert Abbot.

Dr. Robert Abbot, elder brother to the former, and in learning much his superior, was born at Guilford in 1560, and educated at Baliol college in Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts and divinity. Upon the accession of king James I. he was appointed chaplain in ordinary to that prince. In 1609, he was made master of Baliol-college, and, about three years after, Regius professor of divinity in the university of Oxford. Here he signalized himself by his lectures upon the king's supreme power, which he defended against Bellarmine and Suarez; a service which was so acceptable to his majesty, that he raised him in 1615 to the see of Salisbury. He applied to the duties of his function with great diligence and assiduity, visiting his whole diocese in person, and preaching every Sunday; but his sedentary life, and close application to his studies, brought on him the gravel and stone, of which he died on the 2d of March, 1617, in the fifty-eighth year of his age.

The most celebrated of his writings which are controversial, was his book De Antichristo. King James commanded his own Paraphrase on the Apocalypse to be printed with the second edition of this work, a compliment which his majesty never paid to any other author in the nation. Abbot also wrote an answer to Eudæmon Johannis's Apology for Henry Garnet; the Mirror of Popish Subtilties; the true ancient Roman Catholic; a Treatise on the Sacrament, and other works. His brother, Maurice Abbot, was lord mayor of London in 1638.

The Life of Mr. John Abernethy.

John Abernethy, an eminent dissenting minister, son of Mr. John Abernethy, a dissenting minister in Cole-raine, was born on the 19th of October, 1680. At the age of nine years he was separated from his parents, his father being obliged to attend some public affairs in London; and his mother, to shelter herself from the mad fury of the Irish rebels, retiring to Derry: a relation who had him under his care, having no opportunity of conveying him to her, took him with him to Scotland, by which means he escaped the hardships he must have suffered at the siege of Derry, where Mrs. Abernethy lost all her other children. He afterwards studied at the university of Glasgow, till he took the degree of master of arts; and in 1708, was chosen minister of a dissenting congregation at Antrim, where he continued about twenty years, till he was chosen minister of the congregation in Wood-street, Dublin, where his preaching was much admired. He was distinguished by his candid, free, and generous sentiments, and died of the gout in December 1740, in the sixtieth year of his age. He published a volume of Sermons on the Divine Attributes; and after his death the second volume was published by his friends, which was succeeded by two other volumes on different subjects: all of which have been greatly admired.

The Life of Sir Thomas Adams.

Sir Thomas Adams distinguished himself by his prudence and piety, his acts of munificence, his loyalty, and his sufferings. He was born at Wem, in Shropshire, in 1586, educated in the university of Cambridge, and bred a draper in London, and by his wisdom and integrity was gradually raised to the highest offices in the city, and was frequently returned a burgess in parliament; but being a loyalist, was not permitted to sit there. He was lord mayor in 1645, when his house was searched with the expectation of finding king Charles I. and the next year he was committed close prisoner to the Tower, where he continued several years.

During the exile of king Charles II. he lent him ten thousand pounds; and in the seventy-third year of his age was deputed by the city their commissioner to Breda, whither he went with general Monk, to congratulate and attend king Charles to England. In consideration of his signal services, that king conferred on him the honour of knighthood; and a few days after his restoration, advanced him to the dignity of a baronet of England.

Sir Thomas gave his house at Wem, in Shropshire, for a free-school, which he liberally endowed. He founded an Arabic professorship at Cambridge, with a salary of forty pounds per annum, and was at the expence of printing the Gospels in the Persian language, and transmitting them to that kingdom. His beneficence appeared on a variety of occasions, he being always ready to relieve the distressed. This worthy magistrate died Feb. 24, 1667, in the eighty-second year of his age. After his death a stone was extracted from his bladder, which weighed above twenty-five ounces, and is still preserved in the laboratory of Cambridge.

The Life of the Rev. Dr. Lancelot Addison.

Dr. Lancelot Addison the son of a clergyman of the same name, was born at Mouldismeaburne, in the parish of Crosby Ravensworth, in Westmoreland, in the year 1633. He was educated at Queen's-college, Oxford, and at the restoration of king Charles II. was appointed chaplain of the garrison of Dunkirk; but that fortress being delivered up to the French in 1662, he returned to England, and was soon after made chaplain to the garrison of Tangier, where he remained seven years, and was greatly esteemed: in 1670 he returned to England, and was made chaplain in ordinary to the king; but his chaplainship of Tangier being taken from him on account of his absence, he found himself straitened in his circumstances, when he seasonably obtained the rectory of Millston, in Wiltshire, worth about one hundred and twenty pounds per annum. He afterwards became a prebendary of Sarum, took his degree of doctor of divinity at Oxford, and in 1683 was made dean of Litchfield, and the next year archdeacon of Coventry. His life was exemplary; his conversation pleasing and greatly instructive; and his behaviour as a gentleman, a clergyman, and a neighbour, did honour to the place of his residence. He wrote, 1, A Short Narrative of the Revolutions of the Kingdoms of Fez and Morocco: 2, The present History of the Jews: 3, A Discourse on catechising : 4, A modest Plea for the Clergy : 5, An Introduction to the Sacrament : 6, The first State of Mahometism ; and several other pieces.

This worthy divine died on the 20th of April, 1703, and left three sons, 1st, Joseph, whose life we shall give in the next article : 2d, Gulton, who died while governor of Fort St. George : 3d, Lancelot, master of arts, and fellow of Magdalen college in Oxford ; and one daughter, first married to Dr. Sartre, prebendary of Westminster, and afterwards to Daniel Combes, Esq.

The Life of Joseph Addison, Esq.

Joseph Addison, Esq; who was a very great ornament to the age and country he lived in, and to the cause of polite literature in general, was the son of the Rev. Lancelot Addison, and was born at Milston, near Ambresbury, in the county of Wilts, of which place his father was the rector, on the first of May 1672, and not being thought likely to live, was baptized on the same day, as appears from the church register.

He was early sent to school under the care of the Rev. Mr. Nailh, at Ambresbury. He was afterwards removed to a school at Salisbury, taught by the Rev. Mr. Taylor ; and after that to the Charter-house, where he was under the tuition of the learned Dr. Ellis, and where he contracted an intimacy with Mr. Steele, afterwards Sir Richard, which continued inviolable till his death.

He was not above fifteen when he went to the university of Oxford, where he was entered of Queen's college, in which his father had studied. He applied himself at this time with such diligence to classical learning, that he acquired an elegant Latin style before he arrived at that age in which lads usually begin to write good English.

A paper of his verses in that tongue accidentally fell, in the year 1687, into the hands of Dr. Lancaster, dean of Magdalen college, who was so well pleased with them, that he immediately procured their author's election into that house, where he took his degrees of bachelor and master of arts.

His Latin poetry, in the course of a few years, was exceedingly admired in both the universities, and justly gained him the reputation of a great poet before his name was so much as known in London.

They were eight in all, but very probably they are not placed in the order of time in which they were written.

1. Pax Gulielmi Auspiciis Europæ reddita, 1697 ; i. e. Peace under the Auspices of William restored to Europe. 2. Barometri Descriptio ; i. e. A Description of the Barometer. 3. ΠΥΓΜΑΙΟΤΕΡΑΝΟΜΑΧΙΑ, sive Prælium inter Pigmeos & Grues commissum ; i. e. A Battle between the Pigmies and the Cranes. 4. Resurrectio delineata ad altare Coll. Magd. Oxon. i. e. A Poem upon the Resurrection, being a Description of the Paintings over the Altar in Magdalen college at Oxford. 5. Sphæristerium ; i. e. the Bowling-green. 6. Ad D. D. Hannes insignissimum Medicum & Poetam ; i. e. To Dr. Hannes, an excellent Physician and Poet, an Ode. 7. Machinæ gesticulantes, Anglice, A Puppet-show. 8. Ad insignissimum Virum D. T. Burnetum, Sacræ Theoriæ Telluris Authorem ; i. e. To the celebrated Dr. Thomas Burnet, Author of the Theory of the Earth, an Ode. These poems have been translated into English by Dr. George Sewell, of Peterhouse, Cambridge ; Mr. Newcomb, and Nicholas Amhurst, Esq. both of Oxford.

He was twenty-two years of age before he published any thing in the English language, and then came abroad a copy of verses addressed to Mr. Dryden, which procured him immediately, and that very deservedly, from the best judges in that nice age, a great reputation, being as correct and perfect as any thing which even himself afterwards produced.

Some little space intervening, he sent into the world a translation of the fourth Georgic of Virgil (omitting the story of Aristæus) exceedingly commended by Mr. Dryden. He wrote also that discourse on the Georgics which is prefixed to them, by way of preface, in Mr. Dryden's translation, and is allowed to be one of the justest pieces of criticism in our own, or in any other language.

Among all our author's poems, there is not one which is more properly an original, than the account of the greatest English poets, to Mr. Henry Sacheverell ; nor will a judicious reader find more pleasure in reading any of his works, than in perusing this. The judgment of a great poet on the writings of his predecessors, written in the dawn of his days, when he, doubtless, spoke more freely than he would afterwards have done, must always be considered as a curiosity.

Towards the conclusion of the poem, he says :

Congreve,

Congreve, whose fancy's unexhausted store
Has given already much, and promis'd
more;
Congreve shall still preserve thy fame alive,
And Dryden's Muse shall in his friend survive.

I'm tir'd with rhyming, and would fain give o'er,
But justice still demands one labour
more;

The noble Montagu remains unnam'd,
For wit, for humour, and for judgment
fam'd;

To Dorset he directs his artful muse
In numbers, such as Dorset's self might use.

How negligently graceful he unreins
His verse, and writes in loose familiar strains;

How Nassau's godlike acts adorn his lines,
And all the hero in full glory shines!
We see his armies set in just array,
And Boyne's dy'd waves run purple to the sea.

Nor Simois, choak'd with men, and arms,
and blood,

Nor rapid Xanthus' celebrated flood,
Shall longer be the poet's highest themes,
Tho' gods and heroes fought promiscuous in their streams:

But now to Nassau's secret councils
rais'd,

He aids the hero whom before he prais'd.

Two remarks may be made on these lines: the first, that Mr. Congreve, about this time, had introduced Mr. Addison to the acquaintance of the chancellor of the Exchequer, as Sir Richard Steele informs us; the other, that Mr.
Sacheverell had not yet any qualms about the Revolution, otherwise his friend would not have wrote to him in these terms. This is very honourable for our author, since it makes it clear, that, when he differed afterwards with this gentleman, he did not differ from himself, but adhered to those principles which Sach-everell had deserted.

The following year he began to have higher views, which discovered themselves in a poem to king William, on one of his campaigns, addressed to the lord-keeper Sir John Somers.

That judicious statesman received this mark of a young author's attachment with great humanity; took Mr. Addison thenceforward into the number of his friends, and gave him, upon all occasions, signal proofs of a sincere esteem.

He had been frequently solicited, while at the university, to enter into holy orders, which he seem'd once resolv'd on, probably in respect to his father; but his great modesty inclining him to doubt of his own abilities, he receded from his choice; and, having shewn an inclination to travel, his patron, out of zeal for his country, as well as respect to Mr.

Addison, procur'd him from the crown an annual pension of three hundred pounds, which enabled him to make a tour to Italy in the latter end of 1699.

In 1701, Mr. Addison wrote from Italy an epistolary poem to Montagu, lord Halifax. This was most justly admired as a finished piece of its kind; and indeed some have pronounced it the very best of Mr. Addison's performances.
It may be observ'd, that the opening of this poem is peculiarly graceful, and alike honourable, for the writer and the patron.

While you, my lord, the rural shades
admire,

And from Britannia's public posts retire;
Nor longer, her ungrateful sons to please,

For their advantage sacrifice your ease;
Me into foreign realms my fate conveys,
Through nations fruitful of immortal
lays;

Where the soft season, and inviting clime, Conspire to trouble your repose with ryme.

In that year lord Halifax had been impeached by the commons in parliament, for procuring exorbitant grants from the crown to his own use; and farther charged, with cutting down and wasting the timber in his majesty's forests, and with holding several offices in the Exchequer, that were inconsistent, and designed as checks upon each other.
The commons had likewise address'd the king, to remove him from his councils and presence for ever.

These were the causes of his retiring, and Mr. Addison's address at this time is a noble proof of his gratitude, as the manner of it will be a lasting monument of his good sense. In four lines he has handled a topic the nicest that could be;
and in four more makes a transition to his subject naturally, and without precipitation.

On his return, he published an account of his travels, which he dedicated to his patron the lord Somers.

He would have returned to England earlier than he did, had he not been thought of as a proper person to attend prince Eugene, who then commanded

for

for the emperor in Italy, which employment he would have been well pleased with; but the death of king William intervening, caused a cessation of his pension, and his hopes.

He remained at home a considerable space of time [his friends being then out of the ministry] before any occasion offered, either of his farther displaying his great abilities, or of his meeting with any suitable reward, for the honour his works had already done his country. He was indebted to an accident for both.

In the year 1704, the lord-treasurer Godolphin complained to lord Halifax, that the duke of Marlborough's victory at Blenheim had not been celebrated in verse in the manner it deserved; intimating, that he would take it kindly, if his lordship, who was the patron of the poets, would name a gentleman capable of writing upon so elevated a subject.

Lord Halifax said, he was well acquainted with such a person, but that he would not name him; adding, That he had long seen with indignation, men of no merit maintained in pomp and luxury, at the expence of the public, while persons of too much modesty, with great abilities languished in obscurity. The treasurer said very coolly, That he was sorry his lordship had reason to make such an observation; and that, for the future, he would take care to render it less just than it might be at present; but that in the mean time, he would pawn his honour, whoever his lordship should name, might venture upon this theme without fear of losing his time. Lord Halifax thereupon named Mr. Addison, but insisted that the treasurer himself should send to him, which he promised.

He therefore prevailed upon Mr. Boyle, afterwards lord Carlton, chancellor of the Exchequer, to go, in his name, to Mr. Addison, and communicate to him the business; which he accordingly did, in so obliging a manner, that he readily entered upon the task.

The lord-treasurer Godolphin saw the poem before it was finished, when the author had written no farther than the famous simile of the angel; and was so well pleased with it, that he immediately made him a commissioner of appeals, in the room of Mr. Locke, who had been just promoted to the board of trade.

His poem, intituled The Campaign, was received with loud and general applause: it is addressed to the duke of Marlborough, and contains a short view of the military transactions in the year

1704, with a very particular, as well as poetical description, of the two great actions at Schellemburg and Blenheim.

In 1705, Mr. Addison attended the lord Halifax to Hanover; and, in the succeeding year, was appointed under-secretary to Sir Charles Hedges, then secretary of state. In the month of December, in the same year, the earl of Sunderland succeeding Sir Charles in that office, continued Mr. Addison in the post of under-secretary.

Operas being, at this time, much in vogue, many people of distinction and true taste importuned Mr. Addison to make a trial, whether sense and sound were really so incompatible as some admirers of the Italian pieces would represent them. He was at last prevailed upon to comply with their requests, and composed his inimitable Rosamond.

This piece was inscribed to the duchess of Marlborough; and, though it did not succeed on the stage, it has been, and everlastingly will be, applauded in the closet. The many looked upon it as not properly an opera, and the few joined them in their opinion: for having considered what a number of miserable things had borne that title, they were scarce satisfied that so excellent a piece should appear by the same.

About the same time Mr. Addison assisted Sir Richard Steele in his play called The Tender Husband, to which our author wrote a humorous prologue. Sir Richard, whose gratitude was equal to his wit, surprized him with a dedication, which may be considered as one of the few monuments of praise, not unworthy of him to whose honour it was erected.

In 1709, the marquis of Wharton being appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, nominated our author secretary for that kingdom. Her majesty was also pleased, as a mark of her peculiar favour, to augment the salary annexed to the place of keeper of the records in that kingdom, and to bestow it upon him.

While he was in Ireland, his friend, Sir Richard Steele, published the Tatler, which appeared, for the first time, on the twelfth of April, 1709. Mr. Addison discovered the author by an observation on Virgil, which he had communicated to him. This discovery led him to farther assistances, insomuch, that, as the author of the Tatlers well expressed it, he fared by this means like a distressed prince who calls in a powerful neighbour to his aid: that is, he was undone by his auxiliary. Such was the superiority of of Mr. Addison's genius, and so true a taste the town then had of correct and fine writing.

Immediately after the Tatler was finished, Sir Richard Steele formed the project of the Spectator; the plan of which he concerted with Mr. Addison.

The first paper appeared on the first of March, 1711; and in the course of that celebrated work, Mr. Addison furnished the greater part of those papers which were most admired. It was finished on the sixth of September, 1712; and Mr. Addison, to prevent any disputes, which might otherwise have happened, took care to distinguish his papers, throughout the whole, by some letter in the name of the muse CLIO.

The Guardian, a paper in the same taste, and, which is saying much more, in the same spirit, entertained the town in the years 1713 and 1714. Mr. Addison had a large share in that publication, and his papers were particularly relished: and he also wrote once or twice in the Lover.

It was necessary to speak of these performances together, which has carried us somewhat out of our ordinary road. Let us return therefore to the year 1713, in which appeared his famous Cato.

He formed the design of writing a tragedy on that subject when he was very young; he actually wrote it while he was on his travels; however, he retouched it while he was in England, without any intention of bringing it on the stage; but some friends of his believing that it might be advantageous to the cause of liberty, he was prevailed on to adapt it to the stage.

On its first appearance it was gazed on as a wonder; all parties applauded it; it ran thirty-five nights without interruption; and what was more to the author's reputation, the best judges declared in its favour, when they read it, with the same passion the pit had done when it was first seen. Mr. Pope wrote the prologue, which is sublime. Dr. Garth the epilogue, which is humorous. It was recommended by many excellent copies of verses prefixed to it; among which, the sincerity of Mr. Steele, and the genius of Mr. Eusden, deserve to be distinguished.

This tragedy was translated more than once into French, obtained two Italian versions, and has been either translated or imitated in the German language. But the greatest honour that ever was done thereto, was the putting the soliloquy of Cato, which is perhaps the noblest thing in our language, into a Latin dress, which might have been read with admiration, even by the critics in the court of Augustus. Fame has attributed this to the late bishop Atterbury, and as it was superlatively fine, the world thought fame in the right, and so it proved.

Her majesty queen Anne was not the last in doing justice to our author, and his performance. She was pleased to signify an inclination of having it dedicated to her; but the author published it without a dedication, because, as it is said, he had proposed to dedicate it elsewhere, and by this method he thought to avoid offending either his duty or his honour. If in the subsequent part of his life his leisure had been greater, we are told he would have written another tragedy, intitled, The Death of Socrates. But the honours due to what he had already performed, deprived posterity of this promised labour.

Upon the death of queen Anne, the lords justices appointed Mr. Addison their secretary, which took him off from a design he had formed, of composing an English Dictionary, on the plan of a famous Italian one. There was some thoughts of making him secretary of state at that time, but he was anxious to decline it, and accepted a second time, under the earl of Sunderland, the post of secretary to the lord-lieutenant of Ireland: he held it, however, but a very little time; for on the earl's being removed, he was made one of the lords of Trade.

In 1716, he married the countess of Warwick; and on the first breaking out of the rebellion, he published the Freeholder, which is a kind of political Spectator.

There were just fifty-five papers in all; the first was published on the twenty-third of December, 1715, and the last on the twenty-ninth of June, 1716. In April 1717, his majesty king George I. was pleased to appoint our author one of his principal secretaries of state. His health, which had been impaired by an asthmatic disorder, suffered exceedingly by an advancement so much to his honour, being also attended with very great fatigue. He bore it, however, with great patience, till finding, or rather suspecting, that it might be prejudicial to the public business, he resigned his office. Having thus procured for himself a vacancy from business, he grew better, and his friends were in hopes that his health would have been thoroughly re-established.

ed. In his leisure moments he applied himself steadily to a religious work, which he had begun long before, the first part of which, scarce finished, is preserved and printed in his works. He likewise intended to have paraphrased some of the Psalms of David; but a long and painful relapse broke all his designs, and deprived the world of this excellent person, on the seventeenth of June 1719, when he was entering the forty-eighth year of his age. He died at Holland-house, near Kensington, and left behind him an only daughter, by the countess of Warwick.

Since his death the following pieces have been ascribed to our author: Dissertatio de insignioribus Romanorum poetis, i. e. A Dissertation upon the most eminent Roman poets, A Discourse on ancient and modern Learning; to these we must add, The Old Whig, No. 1. and 2, pamphlets written in defence of the Peerage bill, 1719.

As a writer, we need not say any more of Mr. Addison: as a man it is impossible to say too much: he was in every respect truly valuable. In private life he was amiable, in public employment honourable; a zealous patriot; faithful to his friends, and steadfast to his principles: and the noble sentiments which every where breathe through his Cato, are no more than emanations of that love for his country, which was the constant guide of all his actions. But last of all let us view him as a christian, in which light he will appear still more exalted than in any other. And to this end nothing, perhaps, can more effectually lead us, than the relating an anecdote concerning his death, in the words of a celebrated writer, who, in a pamphlet written almost entirely to introduce this little story, speaks of him in the following manner: "After a long and manly, but vain struggle with his distemper, he dismissed his physicians, and with them all hopes of life: but with his hopes of life he dismissed not his concern for the living, but sent for a youth nearly related, and finely accomplished, but not above being the better for good impressions from a dying friend: he came; but life now glimmering in the socket, the dying friend was silent. After a decent and proper pause, the youth said, "Dear Sir! you sent for me: I believe, and I hope, that you have some commands; I shall hold them most sacred."—May distant ages (proceeds this author) not only bear but feel the reply! Forcibly grasping the youth's hand, he softly said, "See in what peace a Christian can die."

—He spoke with difficulty, and soon expired." The pamphlet from which this is quoted is entitled, Conjectures on Original Composition; and although published anonymous, was written by Dr. Edward Young. Nor can I with more propriety close my character of Mr. Addison, than with this gentleman's observations on the just mentioned anecdote. After telling us that it is to this circumstance Mr. Tickell refers in these lines,

He taught us how to live; and, oh!
too high

A price for knowledge, taught us how to die.

Dr. Young thus proceeds: "Had not this poor plank been thrown out, the chief article of his glory would probably have been sunk for ever, and later ages had received but a fragment of his fame. —A fragment glorious indeed, for his genius how bright! but to commend him for composition, though immortal, is detraction now, if there our encomium ends. Let us look farther to that concluding scene, which spoke human nature not unrelated to the divine. To that let us pay the long and large arrear of our greatly posthumous applause."

A little farther he thus terminates this noble encomium: If powers were not wanting, a monument more durable than those of marble, should proudly rise in this ambitious page to the new and far nobler Addison, than that which you and the public have so long and so much admired: not this nation only, for it is Europe's Addison as well as ours; though Europe knows not half his titles to her esteem, being as yet unconscious that the dying Addison far outshines her Addison immortal.

The minutest particulars relative to so great a man as Mr. Addison, are interesting to the reader, we have therefore procured his last will and testament, extracted from the Registry of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury.

IN the name of God, amen. I Joseph Addison, now of the parish of Kensington, in the county of Middlesex, Esq; being of sound and disposing mind and memory, yet considering the uncertainty of this mortal life, do think it necessary to make and ordain this my last will and testament, which is as followeth. Imprimis: I give and bequeath unto my dear and loving wife, the countess of Warwick and Holland, her heirs, executors, and assigns, all and singular my real and personal estate, whatsoever, and wheresoever, of which which I am now seized or possessed, or intitled unto, upon this condition, that my said dear wife shall, out of my said estate, pay, within half a year after my decease, the sum of five hundred pounds to my sister, Mrs. Combes; and the yearly sum of fifty pounds to my mother, now living at Coventry, during her life, by half-yearly payments, viz. at Michaelmas and Lady-day; the first of the said payments to be made at the first of the said feasts that shall happen next after my decease: and I do make and ordain my said dear wife executrix of this my last will; and I do also appoint her to be guardian of my dear child, Charlotte Addison, until she shall attain her age of one and twenty, being well assured that she will take due care of her education and maintenance, and provide for her, in case she live to be married. Item: I do hereby revoke all former wills by me made. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this fourteenth day of May, in the fifth year of the reign of our sovereign lord king George, and in the year of our lord one thousand seven hundred and nineteen.

JOSEPH ADDISON.

Signed, sealed, published, and declared by the said Joseph Addison, to be his last will, in the presence of us, who have, in his presence, and by his order subscribed our name as witnesses thereunto.

L E T T E R V.

On Adultery—The Salic Law—Female Succession—On the Degrees of Restraint imposed on married Women—On Chastity.

WHERE wives are purchased, and polygamy is indulged, adultery can scarce be reckoned a crime in the husband; and where there are a plurality of wives, found sense makes it but a venial crime in any one of them. But, as men are the lawgivers, the punishment of female adultery, where polygamy takes place, is generally too severe. It is however more or less severe in different countries, in proportion as the men are more or less prone to revenge. The Chinese are a mild people, and depend more on locks and bars for preventing adultery, than on severity; the punishment being only to sell an adulteress for a slave. The same law obtains in the kingdom of Laos, bordering upon China. An adulteress among the ancient Egyptians was punished with the loss of her nose. In ancient Greece, a pecuniary penalty was inflicted on an adulterer. An adulteress was probably punished more severely. Among the Negroes, who have very little delicacy, adultery is but slightly punished, except in the kingdom of Benin. There an adulteress, after a severe whipping, is banished; and the adulterer forfeits his goods, which are bestowed on the injured husband. Among the ancient Germans, a grave and virtuous people, adultery was extremely rare. An adulteress was deprived of her hair, expelled from her husband's house, and whipped through the village. In Japan, where the people are remarkably fierce, female adultery is always punished with death. In Tonquin, a woman guilty of adultery is thrown to an elephant to be destroyed. By the law of Moses, an adulteress is punished with death, as also the adulterer. Margaret of Burgundy, Queen to Lewis Hutin King of France, was hanged for adultery; and her lovers were flea'd alive. Such were the savage manners of those times. There is an old law in Wales, that for defiling the prince's bed the offender must pay a rod of pure gold, of the thickness of the finger of a ploughman who had ploughed nine years, and in length from the ground to the prince's mouth when sitting.

Matrimony between a single pair, for mutual comfort, and for procreating children, implies the strictest mutual fidelity. Adultery, however, is a deeper crime in the wife than in her husband: In him it may happen occasionally, with little or no alienation of affection; but the superior modesty of the female sex is such, that a wife does not yield, till unlawful love prevails, not only over modesty, but over duty to her husband. Adultery therefore in the wife is a breach of the matrimonial engagement in a double respect: It is an alienation of affection tion from the husband, which unqualifies her to be his friend and companion; and it tends to bring a spurious issue into the family, betraying the husband to maintain and educate children who are not his own.

The gradual advance of the female sex to an equality with the male sex is visible, in the laws of female succession that have been established at different times, and in different countries. It is not probable, that in any country women were early admitted to inherit land: They are too much despised among savages for so valuable a privilege. The fierceness and brutality of the ancient Romans, in particular, unqualified the women to be their companions: It never entered their thoughts, that women should inherit land, which they cannot defend by the sword. But women came to be regarded in proportion as the national manners refined. The law prohibiting female succession in land, established in days of rusticity, was held to be rigorous and unjust when the Romans were more polished. Proprietors of land, such of them as had no sons, were disposed to evade the law, by ample provisions to their daughters, which rendered land of little value to the collateral heir-male. To reform that abuse, as termed by the Veterans, the 'lex Voconia' was made, confining such provisions within moderate bounds: And this regulation continued in force, till regard for the female sex broke through every legal restraint, and established female succession in land, as formerly in moveables. The barbarous nations who crushed the Roman power were not long in adopting the mild manners of the conquered: They admitted women to inherit land, and they exacted a double composition for injuries done to them. By the Salic law among the Franks, women were expressly prohibited to inherit land; but we learn from the Forms of Marculfus, that this prohibition was in time eluded by the following solemnity: The man who wanted to put his daughter upon a footing with his sons carried her before the Commissary, saying 'My dear child, an ancient and impious custom bars a young woman from succeeding to her father: But, as all my children equally are given me by God, I ought to love them equally; therefore, my dear child, my will is, that my effects shall divide equally between you and your brethren.' In polished states, women are not excluded from succeeding even to the Crown. Russia and Britain afford examples of women capable to govern, in an absolute as well as in a limited monarchy.

What I have said regards those nations only where polygamy is prohibited. I take it for granted, that women are not admitted to inherit land where polygamy is lawful: They are not in such estimation as to be intitled to a privilege so illustrious.

Among the Hurons in North-America, where the regal dignity is hereditary, and great regard paid to the royal family, the succession is continued through females, in order to preserve the royal blood untainted. When the chief dies, his son succeeds not, but his sister's son; who certainly is of the royal blood, whoever be the father: And, when the royal family is at an end, a Chief is elected by the noblest matron of the tribe. The same rule of succession obtains among the Natches, a people bordering on the Mississippi; it being an article in their creed, That their royal family are children of the sun. On the same belief was founded a law in Peru, appointing the heir of the crown to marry his sister; which, equally with the law mentioned, preserved the blood of the sun in the royal family, and did not encroach so much upon the natural order of succession.

Female succession depends in some degree on the nature of the government. In Holland, all the children, male and female, succeed equally. The Hollanders live by commerce, which women are capable of as well as men. Land at the same time is so scanty in that country, as to render it impracticable to raise a family by engrossing a large estate in land; and there is nothing but the ambition of raising a family that can move a man to prefer one of his children before the rest. The same law obtains in Hamburg, for the same reasons. Extensive estates in land support great families in Britain, a circumstance unfavourable to younger children. But probably in London, and in other great trading towns, mercantile men take care to prevent the law, by making a more equal distribution of their effects among their children.

After traversing a great part of the globe with painful industry, will not one be apt to conclude, that originally females were every-where despised, as they are at present among the savages of America; that wives, like slaves, were procured by barter; that polygamy was universal; and that divorce depended on the the whim of the husband? Such conclusion however would be rash; for, upon a more accurate scrutiny, an extensive country is discovered, where polygamy never was in fashion, and where women were from the beginning courted and honoured as among the most polished nations.

We proceed now to a capital article in the progress of the female sex; which is to trace the different degrees of restraint imposed upon married women in different countries, and at different times in the same country; and to assign the causes of these differences. Where luxury is unknown, and where people have no wants but what are suggested by uncorrupted nature, men and women live together with great freedom, and with great innocence. In Greece antiently, even young women of rank ministered to men in bathing:

‘While these officious tend the rites divine,

The last fair branch of the Nestorean line,
Sweet Polycaste, took the pleasing toil
To bathe the prince, and pour the fragrant oil.

Men and women among the Spartans bathed promiscuously, and wrestled together stark-naked. Tacitus reports, that the Germans had not even separate beds, but lay promiscuously upon reeds or heath along the walls of the house. The same custom prevails even at present among the temperate Highlanders of Scotland, and is not quite worn out in New England. A married woman is under no confinement, because no man thinks of an act so irregular as to attempt her chastity. In the Caribbee islands adultery was unknown, till European Christians made settlements there. At the same time, there scarce can be any fuel for jealousy, where men purchase their wives, put them away at pleasure, and even lend them to a friend. But when by ripening sensibility a man puts a value on the affections of his wife, and on her attachment to him, jealousy commences; jealousy of a rival in her affections. Jealousy accordingly is a symptom of an increasing esteem for the female sex; and that passion is visibly creeping in among the natives of Virginia. It begins to have a real foundation, when inequality of rank and of riches takes place. Men of opulence study pleasure: Married women become objects of a corrupted state, and often fall a sacrifice, where morals are imperfect, and the climate favourable to animal love. Greece is a delicious country, the people handsome; and, when the ancient Greeks made the greatest figure, they were extremely defective in morals. They became jealous of their honour and of rivals; which prompted them, according to the rough manners of those times, to exclude women from society with men. Their women accordingly were never seen in public; and, if my memory serve me, an accidental interview of a man and a woman on the public street brings on the catastrophe in a Greek tragedy. In Hecuba, a tragedy of Euripides, the Queen excuses herself for declining to visit Polycestor, saying, ‘that it is indecent for a woman to look a man in the face.’ In the Phœnissæ of Euripides, Antigone is permitted by her mother Jocasta to take a view of the Argian army from a high tower: An old man who accompanies her, being alarmed at seeing some females pass that way, and afraid of censure, prays Antigone to retire; ‘for,’ says he, ‘women are prone to detraction; and to them the merest trifle is a fruitful subject of conversation.’ Spain is a country that scarce yields to Greece in fineness of climate; and the morals of its people, in the dark ages of Christianity, were not more pure than those of Greece. By a law of the Visigoths in Spain, a surgeon was prohibited to take blood from a free woman, except in presence of her husband or nearest relations. By the Salic law, he who squeezed the hand of a free woman shall pay a fine of fifteen golden shillings. In the fourteenth century, it was a rule in France, that no married woman ought to admit a man to visit her in absence of her husband. Female chastity must at that time have been extremely feeble, when so little trust was reposed in the fair sex.

To treat a woman in that manner may possibly be necessary, where they are in request for no end but to gratify animal love. But where they are intended for the more elevated purposes, of being friends and companions, as well as affectionate mothers, a very different treatment is proper. Locks and spies will never answer; for these tend to debase their minds, to corrupt their morals, and to render them contemptible. By gradual openings in the more delicate senses, particularly in all the branches of the moral sense, chastity, one of these branches, acquires a commanding influence over females, and, when they are treated with humanity, becomes their ruling principle. In that refined state, women are trusted with their own conduct, and may safely be trusted : They make delicious companions, and incorruptible friends ; and that such at present is generally their case in Britain, I am bold to affirm. Anne of Britany, wife to Charles VIII. and to Lewis XII. Kings of France, introduced the fashion of ladies appearing publicly at court. This fashion was introduced much later in England ; even down to the revolution, women of rank never appeared in the streets without a mask. In Scotland, the veil, or plaid, continued long in fashion, with which every woman of rank was covered when she went abroad. That fashion has not been laid aside above forty years. In Italy, women were much longer confined than in France ; and in Spain the indulging them with some liberty is but creeping into fashion at present. In Abyssinia polygamy is prohibited ; and married women of fashion have by custom obtained the privilege of visiting their friends, though not much with the good-will of many husbands. It were to be wished, that a veil could be drawn over the following part of their history. The growth of luxury and sensuality, undermining every moral principle, renders both sexes equally dissolute : Wives in that case deserve to be again locked up ; but the time of such severity is past. Then indeed it becomes indecent for the two sexes to bathe promiscuously. The men in Rome, copying the Greeks, plunged into the same bath, and became such proficients in assurance, that men and women did the same. Hadrian prohibited that indecent custom. Marcus Antoninus renewed the prohibition ; and Alexander Severus, a second time ; but to so little purpose, that even the primitive christians made no difficulty to follow the custom : Such appetite there is for being ‘ nudus cum nuda,’ when justified by fashion. This custom withstood even the thunder of general councils, and was not dropt till people became more decent, in appearance at least.

Histories of the Tete-a-Tete annexed ; or, Memoirs of Kitley and Elfrida.

A Correspondent has favoured us with the following memoirs, with some sketches of the portraits annexed ; and we flatter ourselves our readers will not be displeased with their insertion,

Kitley was the son of an eminent tradesman of this metropolis, who finding him to be a lad of genius, placed him at Westminster-school, where having gone through the different forms, he was sent to the university of Cambridge, and took his degrees, being designed for the church ; but whether he was not hypocrite enough to engage in a profession which he thought required a conduct more rigid than he judged he could command, or whether a natural propensity for the stage prevailed ; instead of declaiming in the pulpit, he took the dramatic walk, and soon became a very capital actor. His person was tall, genteel and graceful ; his countenance open, manly, and expressive ; his voice clear and sonorous. With these personal accomplishments, added to his learning and judgment, he could scarce fail of appearing as a dramatic performer to great advantage.

He made his first appearance at Covent-Garden theatre, in the character of Theodosius in the Force of Love, and gave such a specimen of his theatrical abilities, as strongly prepossessed the town in his favour, and each night of his performance he gained repeated plaudits and additional reputation. He played most of the capital parts in tragedy and genteel comedy, and was soon considered as not inferior to any actor upon the stage, except Mr. Garrick. He particularly excelled in the part of Kitley, for which reason we have delineated him in that character.

Kitley had not long been upon the stage before he particularly attracted the attention of a lady of rank and family, nearly related to a noble lord who has made, and still makes much noise in the political world. After a short acquaintance they were united in a matrimonial way, and lived together as an example and an ornament to the connubial state : nevertheless, her relations thought it a dishonour for her to be so allied, to what they stiled a stage-player, though her fortune was so small that it would not have enabled her to live in such affluence as she did after her matrimonial connexion.—These reproaches meeting Kitley’s ears, he wrote to her brother, and informed him, if he would make him an allowance equal to what he gained by acting, he would quit the theatre for ever ; but this proposal not being agreed to, he continued his pursuits upon the stage, where he incessantly gained such additional applause, that in many parts they put him in competition with Roscius.

Some years passed with great felicity, for his lady had not the least reason to complain of his behaviour to her in any respect ; respect; on the contrary, his attentions and assiduities to her bespoke more the lover than the husband; every female envied her happiness, and admired the conduct of Kately. At length, however, the inexorable tyrant separated this amiable pair, which for some time rendered him inconsolable.

He resumed his theatrical functions, and the commerce of the world dissipated the gloom which had hung over him. Having recovered his wonted cheerfulness, he appeared in his comic characters to more advantage than before, and, upon a change of managers, his salary was increased, and the number of his parts augmented. Indeed, they were well acquainted with his merits, and knew he was the only performer at that house who could, in any degree, counterpoize the powers of a Garrick.

Kately's genteel behaviour, on and off the stage, has justly entitled him to the appellation of the gentleman, and as such he has access to the politest circles, and is caressed by the first nobility. His classic knowledge, added to his natural good sense, qualify him also for the company of the scholar and the philosopher; and even these court his company, and admire his conversation. In the course of such acquaintance he must necessarily meet with some females who could not view so agreeable and so accomplished a man without a degree of partiality. A lady of uncommon good sense, and an ample fortune, was struck with his merit and appearance. An eclaireissement ensued, and soon after he offered her his hand in an honourable way. It were needless to add they were not forbidden, or that he made as good a husband to his second as he did to his first fair mate.

Upon some disagreement among the managers, and some changes in the dramatic cabinet, Kately quitted Covent Garden, and repaired to the head-quarters of Roscius. There he shone in greater splendor than ever; for, notwithstanding the near approaches he had made towards that great actor's excellence, there still remained some nice tints in that capital master's colouring which had escaped our hero; but he was not too proud to receive information, which raised him at least one degree higher in the dramatic scale.

We should, to have avoided an anachronism in date, have mentioned that ere he quitted Covent-Garden stage, Elfrida made her appearance there in that character, when he performed Edgar. She was tall, genteel, and uncommonly beautiful; eyes that seemed with blifs, and lips that forced a wish from every male beholder. Such a figure in such a character, failed not to make the house ring with plaudits, not only of her acting, but her personal charms, and every one envied the too happy Edgar. They performed together in a variety of parts, and in such tender situations, that Kately must have been more or less than mortal not to have felt those sensations which a man must be sensible of in enfolding so much beauty in his arms.

Elfrida was the daughter of a gentleman, who upon his death left his family rather in distress. She was then at the age of maturity, and was addressed by a person whose situation in life secured her, at least, a certain maintenance. Prudence influenced her conduct, and she gave him her hand.

Her figure, her conversation, her education, justly entitled her to a number of admirers; but the men of this age are, in general, so avaricious, that all the charms of beauty cannot blind them to the want of fortune. In this respect she was deficient; and therefore her admirers, many of whom were men of rank, planted their batteries against her virtue, but did not once hint they meant to give their hands in an honourable way. A certain old lord found means to be introduced to Elfrida, and, after passing many encomiums upon her charms, told her he could not live without her:—"No! my lord—then you must first get a divorce," she replied. "Why so, my dear? (he answered) you know that a wife is a mere domestic being, that is never thought of or conversed with but at meals." "Then, my lord, that very domestic being must I become, before any man shall bed or board with me."

His lordship finding her inexorable, quitted his pursuit, and met with a certain opera singer not quite so squeamish, who does him the honour of playing piquet with him in the forenoon, whilst she hums her airs and his lordship, for which she receives 20 guineas a week.

Soon after Elfrida came upon the stage, her beauty was so extolled, that she was crowded in all public places, like the celebrated Gunnings upon their first appearance here. At Ranelagh, at Vauxhall, she could not enter without its being immediately buzzed about, "There goes Elfrida:" the echo no sooner

fooner vibrated than she was surrounded with a group of gazers, if not admirers. To this cause may be ascribed the memorable Vauxhall affray, of which she was the protected heroine, by a gentleman who has repeatedly shewn his resolution and bravery, and who, upon this occasion, acquitted himself with such remarkable heroism, that no less than three gentlemen celebrated for their courage were compelled to yield him the palm.

It may reasonably be imagined that if whilst Elfrida was in a private station, she could captivate the hearts of peers, when she made her public appearance in this and other first rate characters, in which the excellence of the actress gave additional powers to the charms of the female, that she was not destitute either of admirers or proposals; but coronets and settlements had no charms for her. All the artifices and machinations of intrigue were put in motion to allure her; but she had fortitude enough to evade their schemes, and still remain immaculate.

It may be asked, upon what grounds then we bring together Kately and Elfrida? When two of the finest figures upon the stage are often cast in the most amorous parts, and act them with a kind of enthusiasm that borders upon extasy, the Green room will whisper, and this whisper will get abroad, and gain ground; especially if the parties should happen to make a summer excursion together, and accidentally meet at the same inn.

We shall not pretend to give any farther proofs of this alliance; and shall only add, that we are happy to find that Kately retains, or rather increases all his dramatic powers, and that although we may, probably, after this season lose Roscius, we shall still find in our hero an excellent actor and complete gentleman.

Duke of Kingston's Will, extracted from the Registry of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury.

In the Last Will and Testament of the Most Noble Evelyn Pierrepont, late Duke of Kingston, deceased, bearing date the 5th day of July, 1770, and now remaining in the said Registry, amongst other things therein contained is as follows, to wit,

WHEREAS by certain Indentures of Lease and Release, bearing date, respectively, the tenth and eleventh days of July, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-nine, the release being quadrupartite, and made between me the said Evelyn duke of Kingston and Elizabeth duchess of Kingston, my wife, of the first part; the most noble Augustus Henry, duke of Grafton, and the right honourable lord Monson, of the second part; the right honourable William Wildman Barrington, viscount Barrington, of the kingdom of Ireland, and James Laroche, Esquire, of the third part; Thomas Heron and Richard Heron, Esquires, of the fourth part: All those my manors or lordships, or reputed manors or lordships, of Laxton, Laxton-Moor house, Kneeshall, Little Crophthill, otherwise Crowthall, and Buther; and all and every my manors, rectories, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, situate and being within the fields, precincts, and territories of Laxton, Laxton-Moor-house, Kneeshall, Ampton, Little Crophthill, otherwise Crowthall, Buther, and Lowdham, in the county of Nottingham; and also all those my manors or lordships, or reputed manors or lordships, of Beighton and Callall, otherwise Calow; and the rectory, tithes, and glebe-lands of Beighton aforesaid; and all other my manors, lands, rectories, tithes, tenements, hereditaments, and premises, situate, being, or arising within the towns, parishes, fields, precincts, or territories of Beighton, Callall, otherwise Calow, Owlcotes, otherwise Ulcotts, Southall, Waterthorpe, Edlington, Eckrington, and Sutton, in the county of Derby, and also all that my manor or lordship, or reputed manor or lordship of Adwicke upon Dorne; and all my lands, tenements, and hereditaments in the towns, fields, precincts, or territories of Adwicke upon Dorne, Moxborough, Scorn-ton, Watch Bolton upon Dorne, and Barnburgh, in the county of York, with their and every of their rights, members, and appurtenances; do among other things, stand limited to the use of me the said Evelyn duke of Kingston, for my life, with remainder to the use and intent that Elisabeth duchess of Kingston, my wife, in case she survives me, may receive thereout the annual sum, or yearly rent charge, of four thousand pounds for her life, for her jointure, and in bar of dower, with certain remedies and power for the better securing and answering the due payment, and the recovery of the said yearly rent charge. Now I do by this my will ratify and confirm the settlement made by me by the said last-mentioned indentures of the said annual sum, or yearly rent charge, of four thousand pounds pounds on my said wife, as aforesaid; and all remedies, powers, and authorities, by the said indenture of release given to or vested in my said wife, or her said trustees, for the better securing the same, or for the recovery thereof: And I hereby direct, that my said wife, and her assigns, shall be intitled to have and receive the said yearly rent charge during her life, according to the form and true intent and meaning of the said indentures. And, subject to the said annual sum, or yearly rent charge, of four thousand pounds, so settled upon, and hereby ratified and confirmed to, my said wife, for her life, I hereby give and devise all my said manors, lands, and hereditaments so, by virtue of the said last-mentioned indentures of lease and release, charged with, and subjected to, the payment of the said annual sum, or yearly rent charge, of four thousand pounds, to my said wife, unto, and to the use of, John Mackie Ross, of Wimpole-street, in the parish of Saint Mary-le-Bone, in the county of Middlesex, Esquire, and Daines Barrington, of the Inner-Temple, London, Esquire, and their heirs, during the natural life of my said wife, upon the trusts: Nevertheless, and for the several intents and purposes herein after expressed, concerning the same premises, and from and after the decease of my said wife, my will is, that the reversion, fee simple, and inheritance of the said last mentioned premises, shall belong, go, and remain unto, and be for the benefit of the several persons herein after mentioned: And I do by this my will give and devise all those my manors, or reputed manors or lordships, of Hadworthingham, Basingthorpe Cum Westby, Kirk Langton, otherwise Upper Langton, and Nether Langton, otherwise Humlock Langton, and also the rectory of Basingthorpe, in the said county of Lincoln, and all glebelands, tithes, and hereditaments, to the said rectory belonging, or appertaining; and also the advowson of the vicarage of the church of Basingthorpe; and also two third parts, and the moiety of the other third part, of the rectory of the church of Kirk Langton, in the said county of Lincoln; and the advowson of the vicarage of the church of Kirk Langton, otherwise Upper Langton, otherwise Langton near Wragbie, in the said county of Lincoln, and all other messuages, rectories, advowsons, farms, lands, tenements, tithes, rents, and hereditaments, whatsoever, whereof, or wherein, I am, or any person or persons, in trust for me, is, or are seized; or whereunto I am, or any person or persons in trust for me, is, or are, intitled for any estate of freehold, or inheritance, in possession, remainder, or reversion, or over which I have any power to dispose, situate, lying, and being, or arising, within the towns, parishes, fields, precincts, or territories, of Hadworthingham, Basingthorpe Cum Westby, and Kirk Langton, otherwise Upper Langton, and Nether Langton, otherwise Humlock Langton, with their and every of their rights, members, and appurtenances, unto Richard Heron, of Lincoln's Inn, in the county of Middlesex, Esquire, and William Field, of the Inner Temple, London, Esquire, their executors and administrators, for, and during, and unto, the full end and term of one thousand years, without impeachment of or for any manner of waste upon the trusts: Nevertheless, herein after mentioned and declared of, and concerning the said term, and from and after the expiration, or other sooner determination of the said term of one thousand years, and, in the mean time, subject thereto, and to the trusts thereof, I do, by this my will, give and devise the said manors or lordships, or reputed manors or lordships, messuages, rectories, advowsons, farms, lands, tithes, hereditaments, and premises, comprized in the said one thousand years term, and also all those my manors or lordships, or reputed manors or lordships, of Home, Pierrepont, Thoresby, Clifton upon the Hill, Sneeton, Widmerpoole, Ratcliffe upon Trent, Lamcote, Orston, Screveton, Courton, Bleasley, Godling, Stoke, Bardolph, Paletthorp, Bonbuske, Holbeck, Halbeck, Woodhouse, Weston, Fledburgh, otherwise Fledborough, and Eakring, with their and every of their rights, members, and appurtenances, in the said county of Nottingham, and also all that my capital messuage, or manor-house, called Thoresby, in the said county of Nottingham, and the park called Thoresby Park, and all my messuages, rectories, advowsons, farms, lands, tithes, hereditaments, and premises, in the said county of Nottingham; and also all those my manors or lordships, or reputed manors or lordships, of Crowle, Nubell, otherwise Newbell, East Langworth, otherwise Langwith, Burgh, otherwise Borough, in the Marsh, Hemmingsby, Afterby, Stainsby, and Kirk, with their and every of their rights, members, and appurtenances, in the said

said county of Lincoln; and all other my messuages, rectories, advowsons, farms, lands, tithes, and hereditaments, in the said county of Lincoln; and also all those my manors, or reputed manors or lordships of Bradford, Great Trowle, Little Trowle, and Trowbridge Dawntsfay, with their and every of their rights, members, and appurtenances, in the county of Wilts; and all my messuages, rectories, advowsons, farms, lands, tithes, and hereditaments, in the said county of Wilts; and also all those my manors or lordships, of Bath and Widcombe, with their rights, members, and appurtenances, in the county of Somerset; and all my messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, in the said county of Somerset; and also all and singular my other mansion-houses, parks, messuages, cottages, lands, tenements, woods, underwoods, parsonages, rectories, advowsons, tithes, mills, gardens, orchards, rents, hereditaments, and real estate whatsoever in the said counties of Nottingham, Lincoln, Derby, York, Wilts, and Somerset, or in any of them, or elsewhere, in the kingdom of Great Britain, whereof or wherein I am seized, or whereof or wherein any other person, or persons, in trust for me, is, or are, seized, or whereunto I am, or any other person or persons, in trust for me, is, or are, intitled for any estate of inheritance, or for any estate of freehold, in possession, remainder, or reversion, save and except the said manors, lands, and hereditaments, by the said indentures of lease and release, charged with, and made subject to the payment of the said annual sum, or yearly rent charge of four thousand pounds, to my said wife, during her life, and which I have before devised to the said John Mackie Rofs and Daines Barrington, during the life of my wife, as aforesaid, unto, and to the use of the said Elisabeth duchess of Kingston, my wife, and her assigns, for and during the term of her natural life, in case she so long continues my widow, and unmarried, and no longer. And my will is, and I hereby declare and direct, that the said John Mackie Rofs and Daines Barrington, to whom I have so devised the said several manors, lands, and hereditaments, which, by virtue of the said indentures of lease and release, do stand charged with, and are made subject to, the payment of the said annual sum, or yearly rent charge, of four thousand pounds, to my said wife, for her life;

and their heirs shall stand seized of the said premises, during the life of my said wife, in trust, to permit my said wife, and her assigns, during her widowhood, to receive, and take the whole yearly rents, and profits, of all the said manors, lands, and hereditaments, so hereby devised to the said John Mackie Rofs and Daines Barrington, and their heirs, during the life of my said wife, in lieu and in full satisfaction, recompense, and discharge of, and for so much of the said annual sum, or yearly rent charge of four thousand pounds, as shall grow due during the said widowhood: But, in case my said wife shall determine her widowhood during her life, then the said John Mackie Rofs and Daines Barrington, and their heirs, shall, during the residue of her life, but subject to, and charged with the said last mentioned yearly rent charge, stand seized of the said manors, lands, and hereditaments, so hereby to them devised, for the benefit of the persons, and for the same tates, as the reversion of the said premises are devised, or shall stand liable by virtue of this my will, and subject the said several devises, so by me made to, and in favour of, or in trust for, my said wife, during her widowhood, as to, for, and concerning, the reversion and inheritance after my wife's decease, of all my said manors, lands, and hereditaments, comprized in the said indentures of lease and release, and thereby charged with, or made subject to, the payment, during the life of my said wife, of the said annual sum, or yearly rent charge, of four thousand pounds.

Also I give and bequeath to my said wife, Elisabeth Duchess of Kingston, all my furniture, pictures, plate, jewels, china, arrears of rent, and all other my effects, and personal estate, of what nature or kind soever, for her own proper use, absolutely, and as and for her own goods, chattels, and effects, for evermore.

Proved at London the 26th day of October, 1773, before the Worshipful Peter Calvert, Doctor of Laws, and Surrogate, by the oath of the Most Noble Elisabeth, Duchess-dowager of Kingston, the relict, and sole executrix, to whom administration was granted, having been first sworn duly to administer.

Present

THE trade of New-England consists of various articles. At the mouth of the river Penobscot there is a mackarel fishery, from which the inhabitants supply Barbadoes, and other British islands in America. They likewise fish for cod in winter, which they dry in the frost. Their salt works are upon the improving hand; and, it is said, they will soon have salt enough to serve themselves. Rich mines of iron, of a most excellent kind and temper, have been discovered in New-England, and, if improved, in a short time they may supply Great-Britain, without having recourse to the northern nations for that commodity; especially as the parliament, to encourage the undertaking, allows both pig and bar-iron to be imported duty free. Besides mackarel and cod, they send to Surinam and Curassoa, belonging to the Dutch, and to Barbadoes the other British islands, biscuit, salt, provisions, sometimes cattle, horses, planks, hoops, shingles, staves, butter, cheese, grain, oil, tallow, turpentine, bark, calf-skins, tobacco, apples, cyder, and onions; and of these merchandizes, Barbadoes takes annually to the value of 100,000l. sterling. From Barbadoes, and the other islands, they bring in return sugar, cotton, ginger, and various other commodities. From Europe they import wine, silks, woollen cloth, toys, hardware, linen, ribbands, stuffs, laces, paper, household furniture, husbandry tools of all kinds, cordage, hats, stockings, shoes, and India goods, to the value of above four hundred thousand pounds sterling. In short, there is no British manufacture that serves the purpose of luxury or ornament, which the people of New-England do not import. They also send ships to the bay of Honduras for logwood, which they transport to Europe; as they do sugar from the West-Indies, and fish from Newfoundland. Their money is chiefly paper currency, or what they call province bills, which is attended with many inconveniencies. The two last wars with France and Spain introduced abundance of hard money.

Their inland trade, besides masts, yards, and provisions of all kinds, consists chiefly of furs, and the skins of beavers and martens. The furs and skins are brought in by the Indians, especially those on the rivers Penobscot and John; the former bringing bear and elk skins, and the latter beaver and otter skins. Both also send in marten skins; those of the former, one year with another, three thousand, and those of the latter double that number. Before the year 1743, their shipping is said to have consisted of a thousand sail, besides fishing smacks. Ship-building, as we noted before, is likewise very advantageous to this colony, and continually increases with their trade.

Their manufactures are chiefly coarse linen, and woollen cloth for their own use, hats, paper, sugar baking, and distilling.

With regard to religion, before the year 1740, the province of Massachusetts's bay contained an hundred English congregations, besides thirty assemblies of Indian christians; but of all these congregations, not above three or four followed the forms of the church of England. Every particular society among them is independent of all other ecclesiastical jurisdiction; nor does there lie any appeal from their punishments or censures. Their church government admits of synods; but those synods have no power to enforce their own acts, or to establish any thing coercive. All they can do is to deliberate on general matters, which are to be laid before the several churches, who have authority to reject or approve of them, as they see proper. The magistrates have power to call a synod upon any particular exigency, and even to give their opinion in it. The ministers of Boston depend entirely on the generosity of their hearers for support; a voluntary contribution being made for them, by the congregation, every time divine service is celebrated. Every town of fifteen families is obliged to maintain a school for reading or writing, and, of an hundred families, a grammar school for the instruction of youth; besides which, there are four colleges. They have no holidays, but that of the annual election of the magistrates of Boston, and the commencement at Cambridge. Though the independents who first transported themselves hither, rather than to conform the church of England, complained of the government here for not allowing a toleration, yet they permitted no other sect or denomination of christians but themselves, to have any share of the governments they erected there; and were so far from allowing a toleration to those that differed from them, that they hanged several quakers. It is not long since they suffered any member of the church of England to have a share in the magistracy, or to be elected a member of the commons, or house of representatives; and there are not more than two or three admitted at this day into their councils. Those of the church of England do not amount to a fourth part of the inhabitants of this colony.

With respect to the government of New-England, it is observed by Mr. Dummer, that by the new charter granted to the Massachusetts by king William III. the appointment of a governor, lieutenant governor, secretary, and all the officers of the admiralty, is vested in the crown; that the power of the militia is wholly in the hands of the governor, as captain general; that all judges, justices, and sheriffs, to whom the execution of the law is intrusted, are nominated by the governor, with the advice of the council; and that the governor has a negative on the choice of counsellors, peremptory and unlimited; and that he is not obliged to give a reason for what he does in this particular, or refrained to any number; that authentic copies of the several acts passed by this colony, as well as others, ought to be transmitted to the court of England for the royal approbation; but if the laws of this colony are not repealed within three years after they are presented, they are not repealable by the crown after that time; and that no laws, ordinances, elections of magistrates, or acts of government whatsoever, are valid, without the governor's consent in writing.

Notwithstanding this, the people have still the greatest share of the power in this colony; for they not only chuse the assembly, but this assembly, with the governor's concurrence, chuse the council, equivalent to our house of lords: but whether the governor still depends on the assembly, as he did not many years ago, for his annual support, we cannot say; it is probable he does not, otherwise Sir Francis Bernard, a late governor, would have been obliged to study popularity more than he did.

There were originally three sorts of governments established by the English on the continent of America, viz. royal governments, charter governments, and proprietary governments.

A royal government is properly so called, because the colony is immediately dependent on the crown, and the king remains sovereign of the colony: he appoints the governor, council, and officers of state, and the people only elect the representatives, as in England: such are the governments of Virginia, New-Hampshire, New-York, New Jersey, and both Carolinas; though the Carolinas were once proprietary governments.

A charter government is so called because the company, incorporated by the king's charter, were in a manner vested with sovereign authority, to establish what sort of government they saw proper; and these charter governments have generally thought fit to transfer their authority to the populace; for in these governments, or rather corporations, the freemen do not only chuse their representatives, but annually chuse their governor, council, and magistrates, and makelaws, without the concurrence, and even without the knowledge of the king; and are under no other restraint than this, that they enact no laws contrary to the laws of England; if they do, their charters are liable to be forfeited. Such are the governments of Rhode-Island and Connecticut, in New England, and such was that of the Massachusetts formerly; but from what has been said above, it appears now to be different from, or rather a mixture of both.

The third kind of government is the proprietary, properly so called, because the proprietor is invested with sovereign authority: he appoints the governor, council, and magistrates, and the representatives are summoned in his name, and by their advice he enacts laws, without the concurrence of the crown: but, by a late statute, the proprietor must have the king's consent in the appointing a governor when he does not reside in the plantation in person, and of a deputy-governor when he does; and all the governors of the plantations are liable to be called to an account for mal-administration by the court of King's Bench. The only proprietary governments now in being are those of Maryland and Pennsylvania.

The general assembly of New England, in concurrence, impose taxes, make grant, enacts laws, and redress public grievances of every kind. It consists of the magistrates, and a certain number of representatives, who form two chambers, so nearly resembling our lords and commons, that the concurrence of the majority of both is necessary before any bill can be presented to the governor for his assent. Every town, if it contains thirty-two burgeses, can send two representatives to parliament; if twenty, twenty, one ; but Boston nominates four.

The laws of the greatest consequence in this colony are those specified by Mr. Dummer. " There has been, says he, from the beginning, an office erected by law in every county, where all conveyances of land are entered at large, after the granters have acknowledged them before a justice of peace : by which means no person can sell his estate twice, or take up more money upon it than it is worth. Provision has likewise been made for the security of life and property, in the election of juries, who are not returned by the sheriff of the county, but are chosen by the inhabitants of the towns ; and this election is under the exactest regulation that human prudence can suggest for preventing corruption." The same author observes, " That sheriffs in the plantations are comparatively but little officers, and therefore not to be trusted like ours." Redress in the New England courts of law is very quick and cheap, all processes are in English, and no special pleadings and demurrers are admitted ; but the general issue is always given, and special matters brought in evidence, which save time and expence ; and in this case a man is not liable to lose his estate for a defect in form, nor are the merits of the cause made to depend on the niceties of clerkship. By a law of the country, no writ may be abated for a circumstantial error, such as a slight misnomer, or any informality ; and by another law it is enacted, that every attorney taking out a writ from the clerks-office, shall indorse his surname upon it, and be liable to pay the adverse party his costs and charges, in case of non-prosecution and discontinuance, or that the plaintiff be non-suited, or judgment passed against him : and it is provided in the same act, that if the plaintiff shall suffer a non-suit by the attorney's mislaying the action, he shall be obliged to draw a new writ without a fee, in case the party should see fit to receive the suit. For the quicker dispatch of causes, declarations are made parts of the writ, in which the case is particularly set forth. If it be a matter of accompt, the accompt is annexed to the writ, and copies of both left with the defendant, which being done fourteen days before the sitting of the courts, he is obliged to plead directly, and the issue is then tried. Nor are the people of New England oppressed with the infinite delays and expence that attend proceedings in Chancery. But, as in all other countries, England only excepted, ius et æquum are held the same, and never divided ; so it is here, a power of chancery being vested in the judges of the courts of common law as to some particular cases, and they make equitable constructions in others. The fees of officers of all sorts are settled by acts of assembly at moderate prices."

The laws here are very severe against quakers. To bring one in, is a forfeiture of an hundred pounds ; to conceal one forty shillings an hour ; to go to a quaker's meeting, ten shillings ; to preach there, five shillings. If a quaker be not an inhabitant he is subject to banishment, and if he returns, death. Vagrant quakers to be whipped, branded with the letter R on the left shoulder, and banished ; if they return, death. No person can be arrested if there are any means of satisfaction ; nor imprisoned, unless there be a concealment of effects. Adultery is death to both parties.

More than twenty years ago it was computed that New England contained about three hundred thousand souls ; of which about sixty thousand were effective men, from sixteen to sixty years of age ; that of these, the Massachusetts Bay in particular, contained thirty thousand ; the colony of Connecticut, fourteen thousand ; Rhode-Island and Providence Plantation, seven thousand ; New Hampshire, five thousand ; and the province of Maine, four thousand. Their militia forms a considerable body of men ; that of the Massachusetts only consisting of six regiments of foot, and fifteen troops of horse, of an hundred men in each troop. In the year 1748, the colony of New England raised, armed, and transported to Cape Breton four thousand men, who took Louisbourg, which proved an equivalent, at the peace of Aix-le-Chapelle, for all the successes of the French upon the continent of Europe ; and in the late war they contributed considerably to that extension of territory in North America, that will in time make the crown of Great Britain, if it has not already, the most powerful of any in the world. In the whole colony are twenty-seven fortified places, upon eleven navigable rivers ; but the conquest of Canada, and the forts among the Indians, garrisoned by his majesty's troops, will render these less necessary than formerly.

The Massachusetts colony received its name from the Indians, who inhabited these parts when the English first came hither. Its boundaries are, the colonies of Connecticut and New York on the west; the ocean on the east and south; and Merrimack river on the north. It is subdivided into the provinces of Plymouth, Massachusetts Proper, and Maine.

The province of Plymouth, which is the most southerly, runs along the coast an hundred miles, from Cape Cod to Cape Manchester, and is near fifty broad, from Monument Bay to Scituati. It is divided into the counties of Bristol, Plymouth, and Barnstable, taking their names from the chief towns of each, of which Bristol is large and populous, having a commodious harbour, and the best trade in New England next to Boston.

On the coast of this province lie several other islands, particularly Rhode-Island, Elizabeth Island, Martha's or Martin's Vineyard, and Nantucket, in which are several towns or villages of christianized Indians.

Massachusetts Proper is bounded by New York on the west; by Plymouth and Connecticut on the south; New Hampshire on the north; and by Massachusetts Bay on the east, and contains the counties of Suffolk, Middlesex, and Essex, all of them situate on Massachusetts Bay. The capitals of those three counties are Boston, Cambridge, and Salem.

Boston is not only the chief town of the county of Middlesex, but of all New England, and even of the whole British empire in America.

Cambridge stands on the north branch of Charles River, six or seven miles north-west from Boston. Here is a sort of an university, consisting of two colleges, called Harvard College and Slough-ton Hall, which is pretty well endowed, and has a tolerable library, with a president, five fellows, and two professors, one of mathematics, and another of divinity.

Salem stands on a plain between two rivers, on each of which it has a harbour, eighteen miles north of Boston. It is noted for building ships, especially fishing-smacks, and drives a good trade to Barbadoes and the Sugar Islands.

The province of Maine, which constitutes the third province of the Massachusetts colony, is but of a small extent, compared to the other two. The inland part of it is mountainous and barren, but near the coast and rivers it is tolerably fruitful in corn and pasture. New York is the most considerable place in it. There are several other considerable towns in the Massachusetts colony, besides those we have mentioned.

The government of New Hampshire is bounded by Kennebeck river on the east; Merrimack on the west; Massachusetts Bay on the south-east; Canada on the north-west; and Nova Scotia on the north-east. The most considerable towns in it are Portsmouth, Dover, Piscataque, Exeter, and Hampton, all lying on the river Piscataque. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in building of ships, and the fishery.

The colony of Connecticut is bounded on the west by New York; by Rhode-Island on the east, with part of the Massachusetts colony, which last it has also on the north; and on the south is separated from Long Island by an arm of the sea. It is said to be about one hundred miles in length, and about seventy in breadth. Connecticut river, which is one of the largest in New-England, runs through the heart of the province, and is navigable above forty miles for large vessels, and much farther for small ones. This colony abounds in metals, and naval stores, especially timber, and has many good ports. Upwards of forty years ago the inhabitants were computed at thirty thousand. The colony is divided into four counties, and its chief towns are Newhaven, Hertford, and New London.

Newhaven stands upon the coast, and has a college for academical learning, called Yale Hall, pretty well endowed, and furnished with a good library.

Hertford is a handsome populous town, situated on the banks of Connecticut river.

New London is a town of good trade, situated on the west side, and near the mouth of the river, called Thames.

The colony of Rhode-Island comprehends, besides the island, a district on the continent, called Providence Plantation. The island, which is about fifteen or sixteen miles long, and about four or five broad, is called the Paradise of New England, for the fruitfulness of the soil, and the temperateness of the climate. A great trade is carried on in it to the sugar colonies with butter, cheese, horses, sheep, beef, pork, tallow, &c. The chief town is Newport, situated on the south-west part of it, having a good harbour, defended by a regular fort.

Providence Plantation, which lies opposite to Rhode-island, and is about twenty twenty miles square, has two large thriving towns, near the mouth of the river Patuxel; one of which is called Providence, and the other Warwick.

*Philander and Eloisa. A Moral Tale.

ELOISA was a woman of wit and beauty, but of an ambitious turn of mind.—In her twentieth year she married Philander, a person of about the same age, and of an exceedingly agreeable disposition. No couple ever lived happier than Philander and Eloisa; their time passed in tranquility and peace; their felicity was mutual, and providence quickly blessed them with a son—sweet as the bloom of spring.

Philander now thought himself doubly happy; but alas! how evanescent are all sublunary joys!—In about six months time he was parted from his dear Eloisa, through the failure of one in the family. Reduced to the lowest ebb of poverty, he retired to London, where, being a person of some learning, he soon got employment for his pen.

Eloisa, in the mean time, with a deal of persuasion, got his consent, though with great reluctance, to put the child to board, and to let her go in the capacity of nursery maid to a lady in town. Her beauty, and her imprudently passing for a single woman, gained her many admirers. The flattery of coxcombs pleased her ear, and in a short time alienated her affections, in a great measure, from her husband. Philander, who seldom could have access to her, soon discovered a coldness and reserve in her behaviour, which pierced his heart.

“I do not deserve this treatment, my dear Eloisa,” said Philander, one evening. “It is seldom I can see you, and then you hurry me away unhappy. Let us by all means live together.—We can live frugally, and I doubt not but Providence will assist our honest endeavours.” This proposal was rejected.

“If we live together,” replied Eloisa, “our family will increase, and we shall always be poor. No, Philander, we are both now getting money, and indeed I cannot think of coming to you till we are enabled to live as before.”

In fine, that she might not be troubled with his importunities, she retired from her place, and kept it a secret where she resided.

Philander, almost distracted with this piece of cruelty and ingratitude, for some time took to the bottle.—He drank to forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more.

This way of life, however, did not agree with the disposition of Philander. His conscience told him he was doing wrong.—“What have I been doing?” said he to himself one morning, as he lay on his bed. “I am ruining myself soul and body—for what?—for a woman who certainly has no regard for me. Let heaven revenge my wrongs; I will continue this way of life no longer.”—He from that time refrained excesses, and Providence, who ever looks with compassion on virtue wrestling with distress, prospered all his undertakings. He soon retrieved his affairs, and lived much happier than before.

We must now return to Eloisa, who had for near four years acted the coquet, and had hitherto, it must be owned, kept her chastity inviolate:—but now the time was come, when she was going to swift destruction, had not Providence interposed. Chastity is a precious jewel, but soon lost. “We carry this rich treasure,” as the apostle says, “in earthen vessels; and we carry it on slippery ground.” It is like a fine mirror, beautiful to behold, but sullied with the least breath. No one can say they will go so far, and no farther. This was the case with Eloisa. She had so far forgot her husband and child, as to agree to elope with a gentleman, who, taking her for a single woman, had for some time paid his addresses to her. But the night before this iniquitous scheme was to be put in practice, she was seized with a violent fever. Conscience, that awful judge within our breast, which had long been torpid, now began to upbraid her with cruelty and ingratitude to the tenderest of husbands. The crime, which she was about to perpetrate, appeared in all the horrors guilt could paint it.—The anxiety of her mind was visible to all present; but none knew the cause till she became delirious, when the terrors of guilt discovered all.

“Hark! what voice is that!” cried she, starting from her pillow, with distraction in her face.—“It is my husband calls! Poor injured man! O hide me from his presence.”

“O Mrs. Goodwill! said she, when she came to her senses next morning, “what shall I do? I shall certainly die, and what will become of me I know not.”

The good nurse desired her to be comforted.

“Be comforted!” replied she; “from

“from whence can such a wretch as I expect comfort, who have basely abandoned, and I know not but have been the death of a husband, whose only fault was loving me too well?—My poor child too! who knows what is become of him?—Perhaps at this instant he is weeping with hunger, and complaining, of my cruelty and ingratitude, to the God of heaven.—O that I could but see my husband!—It would be a great alleviation to my misery.—But that is impossible—nor do I deserve so much mercy.—How often have I forced him from me, when his heart was almost bursting with anguish through my cruelty!”

The family, alarmed at her situation, inserted an advertisement in the paper, which happily came to her husband’s perusal, who immediately took horse, and arrived at the house the same evening.

When he entered the room, she was in a doze.—“Eloisa,” said he, stroaking her cheek, “do you not know me?” She looked up, clasped her arms round his neck, screamed, and fainted.

“My dear husband, said she, coming to herself, “can you forgive my past conduct? Indeed I have never violated my chastity—but God knows—”

“I do forgive you,” said he, pressing her to him in the tenderest manner, whilst a tear of pity, and forgiveness stole down his cheek, “I do forgive you. Live and be happy.”

To conclude, she soon recovered her health, and is now a pattern of conjugal fidelity and love.

The History of Abdallah, the Son of Aboan.

AB D A L L A H, the son of Aboan, was born in the fertile plains of Arabia Felix, not far from that city where lies interred the prophet, whose tomb all good Mussulmen think themselves obliged to visit, at least once in their lives.—Aboan had all his life strictly adhered to the precepts of the Koran:—the sparkling of that intoxicating liquor, that fills with fumes the heads of the debauched inhabitants of the West, could never tempt him to violate the law. He walked all his days in uprightness, and when he was called on by the angel of death, obeyed with resignation, and left his son Abdallah possessed of immense riches, which the father of the faithful had bestowed upon him in recompence of his virtue and integrity.

Abdallah at the death of his father, was but three and twenty years of age: his constitution was florid and vigorous, and all his passions strong and ungovernable. Seeing himself possessed of so much wealth, he was flushed with an over-weening joy, and immediately resolved to repair to Bagdad, the centre of magnificence and pleasure, where only he could hope for enjoyments adequate to his desires. Thus determined he set out with the caravan, and soon arrived at the end of his journey. Being arrived at Bagdad in the cool of the evening, he took a short repast of fruit, and then retiring into a garden, where flowers of the gayest hues conspired to delight the eye, he sat down in an arbour, and underneath an embowering myrtle-shade began to meditate what plan of life he should pursue, in order to avail himself of his wealth. After he had continued a few moments wrapt up in contemplation, a youth appeared to him, whose figure excited his wonder: nothing could equal the lustre of his eyes, which rolled with the utmost volubility, and were not a moment fixed upon the same object. On his head he wore a sort of diadem, and over it plumes of feathers of a variety of colours. The garment he wore was party-coloured, and sparkled with diamonds, and in his hand he held a sort of perspective glass, by one end of which all agreeable objects, such as the joys of love, the pleasures of social intercourse, festivity, health, magnificence, &c.—were brought nigh the beholder: and every thing that could excite grief or uneasiness, such as want, sickness, and death, appeared at a great distance, by applying the other end to the eye.—“Abdallah,” said this youth, addressing himself to our traveller, “I am a genie, and from my assistance and protection mortals derive their chief felicity. My name is Hope; suffer yourself to be guided by me, and I will lead you from goal to goal, in a constant career of diversified pleasure.”

Abdallah, whose sanguine temper conspired with that of the genie, without hesitation accepted the offer, and was from that time directed in every thing by his suggestions. So well did the genie acquit himself, that Abdallah was only embarrassed with the choice of pleasures. His tables were loaded with all the delicacies that Asiatic luxury could afford: the finest women of the East were subservient to his pleasures.

His evenings were passed in various amusements; the sprightly dance, formed ed by the most beautiful damsels of Bagdad, and youths of the greatest activity and elegance of shape, exhilarated his spirits: and the harmony of soft music lulled him to repose. Abdallah, thus living in a round of pleasures, soon found that happiness and pleasure are distinct. His magnificent halls, whose roofs were of fretted gold, and where the skill of the workman eminently displayed itself on every side, were often invaded by a monster of a haggard mien, who seemed a burthen to herself, and communicated her languor to every body she approached.

This monster was of a fallow hue, and wore a sort of veil to conceal her deformity. Her intrusions were frequent, and the very methods taken by Abdallah to prevent her from troubling him, made her repeat her importunity, and torment him with reiterated murmurs.

The name of this monster was Satiety; her chief delight was to intrude upon the great and opulent, and by her baleful presence poison all their joys. The frequency of her visits soon rendered Abdallah's life insupportable to him. He began to grow weary of his existence, and at last meditated about laying violent hands upon himself. In a transport of despair he drew a poniard, and would have plunged it into his breast, when he found his arm held by a personage of a jovial countenance, who addressed him in these terms:—"Abdallah, the absurdity of your design is equal to its rashness; let wretches that groan beneath all the oppressions of life throw away that which is a burthen to them; but you, that are possessed of wealth, that great source of every gratification, should endeavour to avail yourself of it. If your efforts hitherto have been unsuccessful, it is because you have not had recourse to the sure means of attaining true felicity.—Man, who knows himself a prey to death, is by nature prone to despondence and anxiety; it is wine alone that can dispel his cares, and make him taste on earth the joys of Paradise."

Abdallah, from whose breast the seeds of a virtuous character were not yet totally banished, at first discovered some repugnance to follow this advice; alledging, in support of his refusal, that such a conduct was expressly forbidden by the precepts of the Koran. But the genie, whose name was Ebriety, artfully insinuated that the poor alone were bound to the observance of that law, as they could not otherwise fulfil their task of daily drudgery; but that the rich and opulent were privileged to violate it. These artful suggestions staggered the resolution of Abdallah;—whereupon the genie, striking the ground with a wand, entwined with vine leaves, which he held in his hand, a table rose up, upon which there stood a golden goblet, crowned with a wreath of flowers; and over its brim sparkled the richest wine which Anatolia's fertile plains produce. Abdallah drank large draughts of the intoxicating liquor, and finding his heart elated with joys unknown before, he from that time gave himself up to his new director.—He soon became profuse beyond measure, and his delirium of joy continuing, he plunged every day into new expences, and entirely neglected all care and œconomy. His mind was, however, every now and then, overcast with a gloominess which he could not account for: but how great was his surprise and affliction, when he received information from his steward, that of all his immense wealth, there scarce remained five hundred pieces! Thunderstruck with this intelligence, he walked in the utmost dejection to a neighbouring wood, where, after having rambled a considerable time in the greatest inquietude conceivable, he threw himself down upon the grass, and being quite harrassed with lassitude and grief, fell into a profound sleep. As soon as he awoke, he saw before him an old man, whose appearance was rather forbidding than venerable. His face was long, meagre, and wrinkled; his nose sharp, and his hollow piercing eyes seemed strangers to repose. "My son," said he to Abdallah, "I am highly concerned that your youth should have been twice imposed upon by fraudulent genie. The former assumed the name of Hope, but his real name is Presumption; the latter passed upon you for Festivity, but Ebriety is his true appellation.—My name is Prudence; when I dwell with mortals, they are secure from every kind of danger.—Do but follow my directions; I will teach you to avail yourself in such a manner of the small sum you have left, that you will have no occasion to regret the wealth you have lost."

Men in despair are glad to accept of any assistance. Abdallah, after making many acknowledgments to the sage for his kind offer, turned merchant according to his advice, and by indefatigable industry, to which he was spurred on by the old man, in a few years raised a sum sum upon which he might have lived, if not in his former splendor, yet with a tranquillity far more desirable. But whenever he remitted any thing of his diligence, the old man did not fail to load him with the bitterest reproaches, and setting before his eyes all the horrors of poverty, terrified him with apprehensions of being again reduced to his former indigence.—Alarmed by these fears, Abdallah attached himself to commerce, with an application which was little better than servitude, and though he dreaded the importunities of his director, he every day repaid to him for advice.—Feeling, however, that his anxiety increased with his wealth, he, at last, concluded that there was no real happiness to be found on earth, and one evening, as he was taking a walk in his garden, burst into this impious exclamation—“Oh! nature! thou hast made us for thy sport! Thou surely must delight in human misery, since man in every state is doomed to be unhappy.” On a sudden the winds were hushed, the feathered race was silent, and a voice was heard which uttered words like these—“O mortal! arraign not the dispensations of Providence. All thy misfortunes spring from thyself alone: thou hast listened to the suggestions of each evil genius, because each evil genius found in thy bosom some inordinate passion to plead its cause. Thou hast by turns been enslaved by Presumption, Ebriety, and Avarice. All thy misfortunes proceed from having formed a false idea of happiness:—thou hast sought it in wealth, and the enjoyments of sense, which are not, indeed, incompatible with it, but will always be insufficient, if Virtue does not contribute her assistance. Henceforth attach thyself to her, and she will teach thee that the bliss of man consists in perfect resignation to the will of heaven.

Some Account of Sharpers.

THERE are another most dangerous set of villains called Swindlers. Many of them are French, but the greatest part are Germans. Graytrix and Sharplefs, who lately made a voyage upon this account, were but bunglers to these foreign gentry, who, though they perhaps received their existence from the loins of a shoe-black, will swear that they are nearly related to some of the princes of the blood in France, or some of the electors of the German empire. Count or Marquis are their constant titles, and an unparallel'd degree of impudence and rapacity their chief characteristics. They effect their business by taking up goods of any kind of tradesmen, which are sent by order to a genteel house or lodging. The gentleman, for one always acts as such, is sure to find fault with some article, and to send the tradesman or servant back again, either to rectify or change what is amiss. They then take this opportunity to decamp, leaving the tradesmen at his return to confer with each other upon their separate losses of goods and rent.

They may be known generally by their over-acting their parts, for they speak in so high a strain, that they easily alarm a person who has had the least experience in business.—If it is a man who serves them, they praise the neatness of the shop and goodness of the commodities: if a woman, they praise her complexion, and sacrifice their own choice to her taste, with respect to the goods. If there happens to be a woman and child, or children in the shop, they look upon their business as good as half done; for to carefs a child is a sure method of gaining the mother—and when they swear the child is the most sprightly, beautiful, and engaging child upon earth, they are sure of success, for the credulous mother, overwhelmed with joy, can refuse no credit to such civil, tender and good-humoured gentlemen, who, if the lady happens to be pregnant, clinch the whole affair, by promising that one of them will be god-father to the youngster in embryo.

Numberless depredations have of late been effected in the following manner.

A sharper genteelly dressed, goes booted and spur'd, and with a whip in his hand, to a gentleman's house, whom he has previously watched out. In a seeming hurry he enquires for the master, and being answered, as he very well knows he shall be, that he is not at home, he desires pen, ink and paper, in order to leave a note. If the maid goes out of the parlour into which he is naturally shewn, in order to fetch a pen and ink, or if that is at hand to evince her politeness by not staring at a gentleman while he is writing, he is sure to make free with any plate of easy conveyance which may happen to be in the beaufet, or any thing else which is of value or happens to lie in the way; for these gentlemen have the merit of not being over nice, as some honest people are; for if a thing is of any worth at all, they never neglect it, but are as careful of it as if it was their own.

The

The success of sharpers of this class is chiefly owing to the tattling disposition of publicans and barbers, who, if the name of a gentleman is asked of them, immediately add to their answer an account of his family, fortune, connections, and hours of out-going and in-coming. All these things the sharpers particularly notice in memory's large book, and he avails himself of them accordingly.

A greater degree of caution is therefore recommended in discoursing with strangers to publicans, barbers, and those who keep chandlers shops in genteel neighbourhoods; and to gentlemen, to particularly command their servants never to suffer any stranger, let his appearance be ever so eligible, to enter a parlour, or any place where there is moveable property, but to desire them to write a note at any neighbouring coffee-house, which they will punctually deliver to their master. As this caution is extremely necessary, none but a sharper would ever take it amiss of a servant.

A most daring kind of fraud was lately committed by some sharpers; they had observed a capital tradesman who frequented a public house, and resolved to make him their prey: he was extremely absent in mind, very avaricious, and uncommonly timorous. One of the sharpers sitting by him, one day, beg'd a pinch of snuff; the unsuspecting tradesman immediately opened his box and held it to him. As he took the pinch of snuff, he conveyed into the box half a guinea, with whose date and particular marks he was well acquainted. The sharper soon after departed, when a confederate came in and placed himself by the old gentleman; he soon pretended he missed half a guinea, and declared that he knew he had it when he entered the house. Several who were there offered to be searched; accordingly they were searched, and nothing found. The old gentleman was the only one who remained unsearched. The company declared, as his avaricious disposition was well known, that he ought to be searched as well as them, notwithstanding his property. He was searched directly, and after some little time spent in fumbling in his pocket, the half guinea was found in his snuff-box, exactly corresponding with the sharper's description. He averred his innocence in vain; he was thought guilty, and what between amazement, shame, terror, and fear, he was so far intimidated as to give the sharper twenty guineas to exempt him from a prosecution for felony.

On the Diseases incident to Infants, particularly Vomiting. By Dr. Cook.

IT is evident the first diseases of infants arise chiefly in their bowels, and no wonder, indeed, as they are in a manner poisoned by ignorant or officious nurses, with indigestible drugs, and improper diet, as soon as they come into the world.

"A common ordinary puking is salutary in infants, from whatever cause arising," says Etmuller, "except it be too great." Most commonly the milk or diet is in fault: if too troublesome, or what is cast up be discoloured, a clyster is proper, and by the mouth carminative feeds, nutmegs, and the like.

From the delicate state of children, and the great sensibility of their organs, a vomiting or looseness may be brought on by any substance that irritates the nerves of the stomach or intestines. Hence these disorders are much more common in childhood, than in the more advanced periods of life. — They are seldom, however, dangerous, and ought never to be considered as diseases, unless violent, or continuing so long as to exhaust the strength of the little patient.

Childrens' vomiting may be excited by an over quantity of food, particularly viscid windy flour pap, or any other thing that is of such a nature as to irritate the most sensible nerves of the stomach too much, or by the sensibility of the nerves being so much increased, as to render them unable to bear the stimulus of even the mildest aliment.

I lost a fine boy, by making the pap of baker's bread, that had alum in it.

When this vomiting is occasioned from too much food, it ought to be promoted, as the cure will depend upon emptying and cleansing the stomach; so if there be plenty of ferous, salt, or viscid humours lodged therein, (as that it cannot retain what they take into it) give one grain or two of the powder of ipecacuanha, as Dr. Harris directed, or a tea-spoonful of its decoction, made at the rate of one ounce to a pint of water; or the tea-like infusion; or the tincture thereof, either of which will do.

This mild and safe emetic requires not swallowing so much liquor to work it off with as other vomits do, yet clears the stomach of crudities, acids, viscidities, and other noxious humours.

A particular advantage, besides, attends this kind of emetic, that does not others; it does good, and no harm, if it works not upwards at all, for it will pass off safely downwards, or by passing into the blood, cause an agreeable breathing sweat. This renders it so serviceable to stop, both in old and young, all serious loosenesses of any standing; besides, it is a specific for the fluor albus, a grain each night for a time; and the late Dr. Akenfide recommended it much for the cure of asthmas. It came fortunately into practice along with the Jesuits bark, about 1650.

Childrens' vomitings may be cured by repeating a few grains of ipecacuanha, or causing the child, if it can, to drink freely of only luke warm water, or weak infusion of chamomile flowers. When it is owing to food of an acrid or irritating quality, the diet should be changed, and aliment of a mild kind be given.

But when vomiting proceeds from an increased degree of sensibility of the nerves of the stomach, such medicines as have a tendency to brace and strengthen that organ, and to abate its over-sensibility, should be had recourse to.—The first of these intentions may be answered by a slight infusion of the Peruvian bark, with the addition of a few grains of rhubarb in fine powder, and orange peel; and the second by the common saline draughts, to which one, two, or, at most, three drops of liquid laudanum may be occasionally added, if need be.

In obstinate vomitings, the operation of internal medicines may be assisted by aromatic fomentations, made with wine, applied warm to the pit of the stomach, or a stomach plaister, with some Venice treacle, may be laid all over that region; or a piece of bread toasted, and moistened in generous wine, and sprinkled with aromatics or spices, may be applied the same way. The very same method will answer for violent vomitings in adults also, only by increasing the dose of the medicines, according to the difference of their respective ages.

J. COOK.

Method of curing Pimples in the Face. By Dr. Cook.

TO undertake to cure by medicines internally such a partial obstruction in the small glands in the face, would be almost an endless task, as requiring much time, besides great expence and trouble; wherefore the application of a proper topical medicine, would be far preferable to the other, as it would much sooner reach the seat of the cause, and consequently open and remove that obstruction: but it must be safe and inoffensive both to sight and smell.

To this purpose then I recommend my mercurial, or quicksilver water. Let not the sound of mercury surprize, as it is, when thus prepared, most mild and safe, neat and clean, as even so much mother's milk: though of crude mercury I could not say so.

My manner of making it is no more than this: "only boil two quarts of soft water on four ounces of pure quicksilver, in a glazed pipkin, till half the water is wasted. Pour both into a bottle to be ready for use."

Shake the water and quicksilver well together first, every time of using it; then dip a rag in some of the said water, warmed, and bathe the pimples therewith night and morning, letting it dry in of itself.

Whenever more of the said medicated water is wanted, it may be made the very same way, by boiling the remaining mercury in two quarts of rain, or soft water again, as before, and which will serve for the like purpose ever so often.

I term it mine, not that I first invented it, both Helmont and Boyle having done that long before, but because I have lately brought it into common use and practice, and that successfully for several, and various disorders, both in men and cattle.

On Ladies' Dresses.

AS there are few things, I believe, to which women pay more attention than to the decorations of their persons, I have often been surprized at their not succeeding, after having taken an infinite deal of pains, and spent a considerable part of their time, in order to make themselves irresistibly charming. Certain, however, it is, that they frequently contrive, with all their strenuous efforts, to render their persons alluring, to render them less attractive, and by so doing, most unluckily frustrate their designs;—that is, they deprive themselves of all the admiration which they earnestly desire, and which they are anxiously studious to procure.

Whenever I reflect upon this mode of proceeding among a large number of my sex, I cannot help lamenting the great waste of time, occasioned by their false ideas of allurements, and am particularly sorry to see many ladies, with the

the most respectable understandings, more elaborate about the outside, than exact with regard to the inside of their heads; and who, seduced by fashion, dress not only in a very unsuitable, but also in a very unbecoming manner:—yet, I would not, by any means, in consequence of these censures be supposed to wish to see women too negligent of their appearance, nor too anxious of dressing in a style superior to their station in life, or to their fortunes.—A woman in the lowest class may, almost always, be clean, and she may, most commonly, wear what is becoming: as a handsome woman looks still handsomer if she is plainly dressed; and on the other hand, she who may be called homely, is certainly more so by being tricked out in a variety of gay colours, and a profusion of shewy ornaments.—The true art of dress is, in my opinion, and in the opinion of many others—[however singular it may seem]—to wear every thing which is suitable to the complexion, size, &c.—Yet is this art so little understood, or so inconsiderately neglected, that we frequently see very large women in short sacks and petticoats; crooked women in jackets; and others, who have long backs and thin shapes, in scanty night-gowns, which look as if they were glewed to their sides. Yet do I not in the least imagine that the people who dress in this improper manner intend to make themselves ridiculous, as it is naturally every woman's wish to be admired. I attribute all the mistakes of this kind committed in the female world, to the force of fashion, and the power of imitation, which operate like charms upon their minds, and will not suffer them to see the advantages which would result from propriety in their appearance.

I was led into this train of reflections by the various objects which I met with the other evening upon a visit.—The lady of the house was remarkably corpulent, with a broad face, uncommonly high-coloured. She was dressed in a yellow short sack and petticoat; short, in every sense of the word, as it discovered a very full bosom, a pair of thick legs, and a couple of large feet, scarcely covered with a pair of white leather shoes, tied with red shoe strings. Her cap was ornamented with bows and streamers of the same coloured ribbon, and placed upon a head dress rather beyond the breadth of the present fashion, which is, by many people, thought to be carried to an extreme.—Next to her sat a very tall emaciated figure, wan and sickly, with a long, swarthy visage, and a Roman nose.—She was in a yellow-green night-gown, with damson-coloured ribbons; and her hair, of an auburn hue, was dressed with a high peak, and no powder.—Could anything be worse imagined than the assemblage of colours in those two ladies:—but if they had changed their dresses, each of them would have appeared to more advantage: the large lady would have seemed less, and the lean one would have looked plumper.—From the form of their cloaths, as well as from the decorations with which they were accompanied, what judgment was conspicuous in the two next figures, which attracted my attention!—These females were a mother and her daughter; the former being rather clumsy, had judiciously chosen a light brown lutestring sack, trimmed with the same; she had a very small hoop, and her hair was moderately dressed and powdered, with a fashionable cap, suitable to her age, and ornamented only with white.—The daughter, one of the gentlest girls I ever saw, about sixteen, was in an almond-coloured and white shot polonese:—her fine auburn hair, dressed in the present reigning taste, had nothing in it but a small turban cap, with tufts of shaded green floss silks here and there, and a tassel.—I never saw, I think, a more elegant figure; and the simplicity of her taste in dress—exquisitely becoming—rendered her still more lovely.—These ladies were, indeed, strongly contrasted by their dress, and the great difference in their behaviour strengthened the opposition. Yet some of my readers, perhaps, will be ready to interrupt me here, and to tell me, that by their persons and their manners the mother and the daughter rendered themselves still more agreeable than by the choice of their cloaths. I am willing to allow that a pleasing person, and, particularly, an obliging carriage, are sufficient to make the most awkwardly dressed woman in the world amiable: but I only beg leave to ask, whether that woman would not be still more so, by suiting her cloaths to her make, her features, and her complexion?—Is it not a pity, that those who spend a considerable part of their time in their dressing rooms, throw away so many hours in the exhibition of a false taste, when they might, it is most probable, with far less expence and fatigue, appear with greater elegance of mien, and, of course, be infinitely more attractive.—Were our modern fine ladies truly desirous of making themselves alluring objects, they would not, it is certain, follow the fashion so closely, as to adopt its most extravagant caprices;—they would study the becoming in the strictest sense of the word, and by so doing would gain universal admiration: by so doing they would improve every beauty, and render every blemish less discernible. Let them also remember, that by a due attention to the becoming, in dress, conversation, and behaviour, they will not only be more generally admired, but stand the fairest chance of being married. Most men prefer the woman who can look well at a small expence: and for a small expence every woman with a true taste may look well if she pleases.—The large sums which many ladies squander in finery, often deter their admirers, I believe, from marrying them.—Many gentlemen, also, with very easy fortunes, or in a good way of business, desire not to see their wives dressed above their stations, even though they can afford it. This passion for over-dressing among married women, has occasioned more differences in families than people imagine.—I am, myself, acquainted with an eminent lawyer, who has a pretty estate exclusive of his profession, which is lucrative enough to enable him to keep a carriage, town and country house, &c. Upon the strength of this income, [tho' a great part of it is precarious] his lady, returning from her mercer's one morning, shewed him a piece of silk, flowered with silver and colours, which she had just purchased for a sacque. He looked at her with a good-natured smile, and said—"This is very pretty, my dear, but by no means fit for my wife.—Carry it back, my love, and change it for the best in the shop, without any silver or gold in it; neither the one nor the other is proper for you, while I carry a green-bag." The lady stood corrected, and has not been since known to commit another error in judgment of the same kind.

Anecdotes of the late Edward Wortley Montague, Esq.

THE celebrated Edward Wortley Montague, Esq; died lately on his return from Venice to England. As this gentleman was remarkable for the uncommon incidents which attended his life, the close of that life was no less marked with singularity. He had been early married to a woman, who aspired to no higher a character than that of an industrious washerwoman. As the marriage was solemnized in a frolic, Wortley never deemed her sufficiently the wife of his bosom to cohabit with her. She was allowed a maintenance. She lived contented, and was too submissive to be troublesome on account of the conjugal rites. Mr. Montague, on the other hand, was a perfect patriarch in his manners. He had wives of almost every nation. When he was with Ali Bey in Egypt, he had his household of Egyptian females; each striving who should be the happy she, who could gain the greatest ascendancy over this Anglo-Eastern Bathaw. At Constantinople, the Grecian women had charms to captivate this unsettled wanderer. In Spain, a Spanish Brunette; in Italy, the olive-complexioned female, were solicited to partake the honours of the bridal bed. It may be asked what became of this group of wives? Mr. Montague was continually shifting the place, and consequently varying the scene. Did he travel with his wives, as the patriarchs did with their flocks and herds? No such thing. Wortley, considering his wives as bad travelling companions, generally left them behind him. It happened, however, that news reached his ears of the death of the original Mrs. Montague the washerwoman. Wortley had no issue by her, and without issue male a very large estate would revert to the second son of Lord Bute. Wortley, owing the family no obligations, was determined, if possible, to defeat their expectations. He resolved to return to England and marry. He acquainted a friend with his intentions, and he commissioned that friend to advertise for any young decent woman, who might be in a pregnant state. The advertisement was inserted very lately in one of the morning papers. Several ladies answered it. One out of the number was selected, as being the most eligible object. She waited with eagerness for the arrival of her expected bridegroom; but, behold, whilst he was on his journey, Death very impertinently arrested him in his career. Thus ended the days of Edward Wortley Montague, Esq; a man who had passed through such variegated scenes, that a bare recital of them would savour of the marvellous. From Westminster school, wherein he was placed for education, he ran away three several times. He exchanged clothes with a chimney-sweeper, and he followed for some time that sooty occupation. He next joined himself to a fisherman, and cried flounders in Rotherhithe. He then sailed as a cabin-boy to Spain, where he had no sooner arrived, than he ran away from the vessel, and hired himself to a driver of mules. After thus vagabondizing it for some time, he was discovered by the consul, who returned him to his friends in England. They received him with a joy equal to that of the father of the prodigal son in the Gospel. A private tutor was employed to recover those rudiments of learning which a life of dissipation, of blackguardism, and of vulgarity, might have obliterated. Wortley was sent to the West Indies, where he remained some time, then returned to England, acted according to the dignity of his birth, was chosen a member, and served in two successive parliaments. His expences exceeded his income, he became involved in debt, quitted his native country, and commenced that wandering traveller he continued to the time of his death. Having visited most of the eastern countries, he contracted a partiality for their manners. He drank little wine; a great deal of coffee; wore a long beard; smoked much; and even whilst at Venice, he was habited in the eastern stile. He sat cross legged in the Turkish fashion, through choice. With the Hebrew, the Arabic, the Chaldaic, and the Persian languages, he was as well acquainted as with his native tongue. He published several pieces. One on the "Rise and Fall of the Roman Empire." Another an explanation of "The Causes of Earthquakes." He had great natural abilities, a vast share of acquired knowledge. He had scarcely a single vice—for he is dead. That he had virtues to counterbalance his failings, Omniscience will discover, when weighing them in the scale of merit. Infinite mercy will take care that the beam shall preponderate in favour of his future happiness.

The Wanderer; or, Letters from an English Gentleman on his Travels *.

THE author, in an introductory epistle, describes himself as a man who was soon to take an everlasting farewell of his native country, with a view of getting a little nearer to the sun, and a great way further from his

N O T E.

* Mr. Thicknesse, late Lieutenant Governor of Tilbury Fort, some time ago confined in the king's bench prison for sending a wooden gun to Lord Orwell, on his refusing to accept a challenge.

enemies; intending at the same time to employ his leisure hours abroad (where, says he, I go to see not to make the show) in communicating from time to time such remarks on men, manners, places, and pieces, as might perhaps prove acceptable to many stay at-home readers, as well as useful to those who may make the same or any part of the same tour.

I shall not (says he) consider myself as of any nation, but as an inhabitant of the wide world, and consequently I shall write with less prejudice than those who have what is called—a home to go to: It is my lot, at present, to have no such sort of incumbrance.—As I have lived long in the world, and have been conversant with a few of the first people, in more kingdoms than that in which I was born, I may perhaps be not unqualified to execute such an undertaking with some degree of propriety: This however may be depended upon, that I have too much regard for truth, to avail myself of the privilege of a traveller, so that whenever I assert any thing in the marvellous way, it should be imputed to my weakness, not my wickedness; for a lying traveller is, in my opinion, a contemptible impostor, and ought to be despised as a common cheat.—Upon the whole he observes, that he means to give the public a well seasoned olio, in which a bit may be found to please every palate.

Such is this writer's plan: and our readers will, we doubt not, be pleased with his execution of it in the subsequent letters, of which we propose to give a more distinct view than has yet been given; and we think ourselves moreover extremely fortunate in having an opportunity of making some corrections, and offering some additional illustrations, from the very obliging and friendly communications of the author.

The intrinsic merit of these epistles will be their best panegyrick. And it will soon be seen* that they are not the futile remarks of an injudicious traveller, but the observations of a man enlightened by experience, and made wise by misfortunes.

I Write this from the best inn Europe can boast of, Monf. Dessein's, L'Hotel d'Angleterre, in Calais. An Englishman, upon his first arrival at this town from Dover, (a distance not greater than from London to Windsor) must be forcibly struck by so total a change of men and manners:—At Dover he has been bullied bullied out of his money by the grossest language : At Calais he will find it extracted insensibly, as the honey is by the bee. But as a trip to this country is now become so very common, it may be necessary to give my travelling countryman a few hints how to conduct himself before he arrives here ; to which if he attends, he will save some money, keep his temper, and avoid many difficulties : For an Englishman who can travel from London to York, without much imposition, will find himself defeated on the Dover road, without some assistance, and perhaps with it ; for when he mentions Canterbury or Dover to a post-chaise keeper at Westminster bridge, the host immediately concludes he is bound to France, and is determined to begin with an imposition, which will attend the traveller closely to the very door of the house I write from. Nothing less than a shilling a mile for your chaise will suffice, if you hire it of him, nor less than four horses will draw your own, though it be ever so light. To obviate this evil, you must find a house in London which will drive you the first stage at nine-pence a mile, and the driver will then carry you to a house which will give you the ninepenny horses throughout the journey.

Upon your arrival at Dover, the mates of the packets, &c. will ply you like London watermen, and demand an unreasonable price, and it is no matter with which you treat, as they have but one purse of profit, and you will find but one by-boat, which stands upon its own bottom ; with that man you may make your own terms : the others will have their own.—Agree with these people to carry you into the harbour of Calais, and to be put on shore by their own, not a French boat, otherwise they will tell you they cannot get into the harbour, (to avoid port charges) and you are rowed on shore in a French boat, not always safe neither, for which, by a regulation of the police, each passenger is to pay three livres, whether the boat carries him three miles or three yards. You are then landed (especially if ladies are of your party) by a perpendicular ladder covered with mud, that the Frenchmen may shew their politeness to you, instead of being put on shore at stairs of an easy ascent.—If the surf runs high, upon the sandy flat shore, a dozen or more fellows run into the water, under the appearance of giving assistance, and hauling up the boat, but who in reality keep it off, that the passengers may be carried by them through the deep water, frightened, wetted, and landed : for this service they think they are never paid enough. I have seen them grumble when a crown has been given, yet they would have been content with a Frenchman's sixpence ; and it is difficult to prevail upon the packet captain to land his passengers even at high water without the unnecessary assistance of the French boat, because the captain of the quay has a share in that imposition*.

The instant the packet arrives, the servants of the public inns scuffle on board, and entreat the passengers to accompany them to the houses of their several masters. Francois, a civil fellow 'till he has been touched, and a most impertinent puppy afterwards, with irresistible address, in either the French or English language, pleads in favour of Monf. Dessen, and he generally carries the best company there, though the Silver Lion is equally as good a house ; and now Monf. Dessen is become so rich, by much also the most reasonable. You are then conducted to your hotel under a file of whiskered musqueteers, fish girls, and a troop of fellows who were so kind as to assist you in landing, and to dirty you almost as much as your landing ladder. In short, you will find your party of pleasure commence only when you are set down to a couple of Mackrell dressed by Dessen's cook, and your spirits recovered by a bottle of good wine.—Having landed you here, I will take a little time to rest you and myself, and then you shall have some further advice from A WANDERER.

P. S. Enquire on the Dover road for the old interest. Mrs. Tibbs of Canterbury, and the Cross Keys at Dover, are of that party.

N O T E.

* There is a common interest between the captains of the packets, the French quay captain, boat-men, &c. and the same friendship subsists between the custom house officers at Dover, and the captain and crew of the packets, who get information at the French custom-house, what every body whom they carry over, has that is seizable, and then communicate it to their custom-house friends at Dover. Thus they are enabled to do business that way themselves with impunity, though oftentimes to the great loss of their bountiful passengers.

(To be continued.)

Ceremony observed at the Dedication of Free-Mason's Hall, Great Queen-street, Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, May 23, 1776.

Ladies introduced into the galleries, music playing in the hall.

Masters and wardens of lodges, and private brethren, took places in the hall.

Grand officers and stewards, members of the hall committee, and their assistants, assembled in the committee room.

Grand secretary read the order of procession.

Deputy grand master recommended solemnity of behaviour.

Procession formed in the committee room, consisting only of present and past grand officers, grand stewards, members of the hall committee, and the masters of the seven oldest lodges present.

Assistants to the committee stationed in different places to attend the ladies, examine strangers, and regulate the procession.

Procession entered the hall, preceded by the grand tyler, and four other tylers carrying the lodge covered with white satin.

On the procession reaching the grand master's chair, one of the assistants proclaimed the brethren who formed the procession, according to their ranks, as they arrive at that station; and immediately, on the grand master's being proclaimed, the music played a grand piece, and the procession was continued three times round the hall.

[The lodge was placed in the center, and the grand officers, &c. repaired to their places.

The three lights, and one gold and two silver pitchers, containing corn, wine, and oil, placed on the lodge; the bible, compasses, square, and book of constitutions, on a velvet cushion, placed on the pedestal.]

Foundation stone anthem sung.

Exordium on masonry given by the grand secretary.

Ceremony of the architect surrendering to the grand officers the implements intrusted to his care at laying the foundation-stone.

Old ode on masonry sung, accompanied by the band.

Ladies then withdrew, and such of the musicians as were not masons.

Grand master ordered the lodge to be tiled.

Lodge to be uncovered.

Grand secretary informed the grand master that it was the desire of the society to have the hall dedicated to masonry.

Grand master commanded the grand officers to assist in that ceremony, during which the organ kept playing solema music.

Ceremony of Dedication.

Lodge covered.

Ladies introduced.

Grand anthem, composed for the occasion.

Oration on masonry delivered by the grand chaplain.

Coronation anthem.

Donations proclaimed.

New ode, written by a member of the royal Alfred lodge at Oxford, and set to music by Mr. Fisher, performed.

Procession being formed, went round the hall three times, preceded by tylers carrying the lodge as at entrance, during which the music continued playing a grand piece.

Procession returned to the Committee room, and the grand lodge closed in ample form.

The following Pieces, composed for the Dedication of Free Masons Hall, were performed.

The principal vocal parts by brothers Vernon, Reinhold, Norris, Du Bellamy, &c.

STROPHE.

AIR. Norris.

What solemn sounds on holy Sinai rung,
When heavenly lyres, by angel-fingers strung,

Accorded to th' immortal lay,
That hymn'd Creation's natal day.

RECITAT. accompanied. Vernon.

'Twas then the shouting sons of morn
Bless'd the great omnific word:—
“Abash'd hoarse jarring atoms heard,
Forgot their pealing strife,
And softly crowded into life.”

When order, law, and harmony, were born.

CHORUS.

The mighty Master's pencil warm
Trac'd out the shadowy form,
And bade each fair proportion grace
Smiling Nature's modest face.

AIR. Vernon.

Heaven's rarest gifts were seen to join
To deck a finish'd form divine,
And fill the sov'reign Artists plan;
Th' Almighty's image stamp'd the glow-

And seal'd him with the noblest name,
Archetype of beauty—Man!

ANTISTROPHE,

SEMI-CHORUS, and CHORUS.

Ye spirits pure, that rous'd the tuneful throng,

And loos'd to rapture each triumphant tongue,

Again with quick instinctive fire

Each harmonious lip inspire:

Again bid every vocal throat

Dissolve in tender votive strain.

AIR. Vernon.

Now, while yonder white rob'd train
Before the mystic shrine

In lowly adoration join,

Now sweep the living lyre, and swell
the melting note.

RECITATIVE. Reinhold.

Yet ere the Holy Rites begin

The conscious shrine within,

Bid your magic song impart.

AIR. Reinhold.

How within the wasted heart,

Shook by Passion's ruthless pow'r,

Virtue trimm'd her faded flow'r,

To op'ning buds of fairest fruit.

How from majestic Nature's gloomy face

*She caught each animating grace,
And planted there th' immortal root.*

What glory wins, who dares excel.

A Receipt for Dying Blond Lace Black.

TO one pound of logwood put four quarts of soft water, the logwood to be put into the water an hour before it is used; boil it a quarter of an hour, then put in your net or blond, and boil it a quarter of an hour longer.—Take it out, and put into the dye one penny-worth of green copperas, and a bit of verdigrease, both finely powdered, and when melted, put in the lace or net again, and let it boil as before, stirring it all the time with a stick.—Let it remain in the dye some hours, and then rinse it in hard water, and hang it to dry: It will be a fine jet-black. Take particular care to throw out the dye where nothing can possibly get to it, as it is a strong poison: an earthen pipken is the best to boil it in.

the music.

History

[Lord Irnham.]

AS I am just returned from Ireland, where I have attended closely to the proceedings of that Parliament, it may be expected from me to say something on the present question. I shall therefore endeavour to shew the House, whether the honourable gentleman now in my eye, [Mr. Conolly] and a member of that Parliament, as well as of this, has given you a true account of the conduct of government there, relative to the matter now before you; or whether the representation of it by the gentlemen who oppose the right honourable member's motion ought most to be relied on. The doubt to be cleared up is, what was really the meaning of government there in the message sent to both Houses of Parliament? the words of the message have been already read to you, and it has been very ingeniously, though somewhat variously explained, by the gentlemen of the treasury-bench: but the Lord Lieutenant's secretary (who as a noble Lord on that bench, and other gentlemen who hear me, and as well as his Lordship have held that office, well know is always considered as the minister in the Irish House of Commons) clearly expressed and interpreted the meaning of it; which was, that the Irish Parliament should consent to the introducing into that Country 4000 foreign Protestants, Hessians and Brunsvickers, to be paid by Great-Britain; in consideration of which, they should assure his Majesty of their readiness to spare 4000 men of the Troops on the Irish establishment for the service in America, to be likewise paid by Great-Britain; and it was expatiated upon by him and all those who spoke on the side of government, how advantageous such an offer must be, which provided equally for the safety of Ireland, as if their own troops had remained in it, and would moreover bring 80,000 pounds of English money into that kingdom. The speech was answered by addresses from both Houses—that of the Lords immediately to the King; that of the Commons to the Lord Lieutenant; in substance the same, as returning thanks for the offer, but refusing the introduction of the foreign troops; proving that they chose to defend their country, even in its present precarious situation, by the exertion of their own efforts, rather than to adopt so unconstitutional and dangerous a measure; which sentiment of theirs certainly did them honour: but at the same time they consented by address, to send to America the 4000 additional troops requested of them; both Houses understanding, however, (as it is well known) that an act should be passed to legalize the terms of the said address, as the crown had precluded itself by act of Parliament from the power of sending more than about 3100 men out of that kingdom, which number it had already exceeded. A Bill was accordingly brought in, wherein were inserted two clauses calculated to effect that purpose; but to the astonishment of the public, those clauses were thrown out in England: and an act was again passed, barring the crown from the power of sending any more troops abroad than would leave 12,000 men on that establishment for the defence of Ireland, and consequently the effect of the addresses of both Houses was thereby destroyed, whilst at that very time government declared its resolution to send those 4000 men to America, in conformity to the addresses of both Houses, and signified, that they did not consider the crown as bound by the act to which the royal assent had just been given, to keep 12,000 men in that kingdom, under pretence of its not being in the enacting part, though in the preamble of the act: but whoever reads it, will find that compact not only in the preamble, but also so strictly tied to that part of the act which grants the subsidy, (being about 450,000 pounds) that if the crown is not bound thereby, above two-thirds of the concessions from the crown to the subject by act of Parliament since magna charta, will fall to the ground, and the crown has forfeited its right to those subsidies. I remember upon this being hinted at by some members of the Irish Parliament, too sanguine for government, the law servants of the crown (men of the greatest abilities) avoided standing on that ground. As to the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, of whom many handsome things have been said by gentlemen on both sides of the House; those qualities mentioned, are, I apprehend, relative only to his private character, which merely as such, has I think, good ingredients in it: but we don't sit here to discuss private characters; his ministerial and public one is what we are to consider, and I will speak out—The talents and abilities of that minister of the crown, are by no means equal to his station. Two millions and a half of people is a trust of too great weight for him to sustain; and he has sufficiently avowed his incapacity to govern them, by delegating all his power to his secretary. To conclude, the measures pursuing there, being illegal, must displease the best and soundest part of his Majesty's subjects; and for certain purposes the ministry have this day spoken very advantageously of Ireland, should they go on in acting as they do, they will meet with the united efforts of that country in opposition to their attempts; and then, instead of panegyric, they will call out to this House for restraining and incapacitating bills, to punish that kingdom as they have done America. Let me therefore recommend to the noble Lord now at the helm, to attend whilst it is time to that alarmed part of his Majesty's most affectionate subjects, and to forgive me if I heartily intreat him to apply his utmost care to rectify the errors of government in that kingdom. In the present case now before us, the conduct of administration, relative to the message from Lord Harcourt to the Irish Parliament, has been unconstitutional and highly blamable. I am therefore to thank the Right Honourable Gentleman for the motion, and to express my hearty concurrence in it.

June, 1776.

F f t

Mr.

Mr. Fox observed, as the administrations of both kingdoms were totally unconnected, so was every individual who composed them. No two of the confidential servants of the crown who spoke, agreed in a single sentiment. Some allowed the message to import what was stated in the complaint; others acceded to a part, while a third was so modest as to contend, in defiance of every rule of rational and obvious construction, that the message meant the reverse of what, in the very face of it, it manifestly intended: but in this diversity of opinion, there was one thing too curious to pass unnoticed, that was the language used by two or three members of administration, which was describing the minister of the House of Commons in Ireland, and the Speaker, under the undefined terms of one Edmund Sexton Pery, and one Sir John Blaquiere.

Mr. Attorney General said, the motion was a party quib, not worth attending to; and that the preamble to an Irish act of Parliament did not bind the Parliament of Great Britain.

Governor Johnson said, the ministers here threw all the blame on the ministers in Ireland.

Lord North made a great encomium on the administration of Ireland, since the appointment of the present Lord Lieutenant; observing, that no better proof could be given of it, than that it was attended with uncommon success.

Mr. Conolly observed, it was no wonder the government of that kingdom should be attended with success, when 265,000l. had been raised on a ruined impoverished country. [Here he was proceeding to shew how unable the Irish were to bear such a burden; and to give a detail of the pensions that had been lately granted, the places that had been newly created, and the various means that had been employed to influence and corrupt the representatives of the people, when he was interrupted by Lord North, as applying to matters not at all relating to the subject of the present debate.]

Mr. Fox insisted, that the matter stated by his honourable relation was perfectly within order; that it grew directly out of the subject of debate; and that if his Lordship appeared to the success of administration in Ireland, as a proof of the wisdom or mildness of the government there, it was no less fair in argument, than consonant to order, to shew the true causes of this boasted success. [Here the altercation was put an end to, by the question being called for.] The question was put on Mr. Townshend's motion for a committee. The House divided; for the motion 106, against it 224.

A motion was made, and the question being put, that the votes of the House of Commons of Ireland, printed by the order of the Speaker of that House, of the dates of the 23d, 28th, and 29th of November, and the 27th of December last, be delivered in at the table and read; it passed in the negative.

A motion was made, and the question being proposed, that it is highly derogatory to the honour, and a violent breach of the privileges of this House, and a dangerous infringement of the constitution, for any person whatever to presume to pledge his Majesty's royal word to the House of Commons of the Parliament of Ireland, "That any part of the troops upon the establishment of that kingdom shall, upon being sent out of that kingdom, become a charge upon Great Britain," without the consent of this House; or for any person to presume to offer to the House of Commons of the Parliament of Ireland, without the consent of this House, "That such national troops, so sent out of Ireland, shall be replaced by foreign troops, at the expence of Great Britain;" and the question being put, that the question be now put, it passed in the negative.

Mr. Fox said, he should not trespass on the patience and good sense of the House, in recapitulating the cause of the present unhappy disputes with America. He should not develop that system, whence the measures now carrying on were supposed to originate. He should forbear to animadvert upon a system, that in its principles, complexion, and every constituent part, gave the fullest and most unequivocal proofs that its ultimate design was the total destruction of the constitution of this free form of government. These were assertions that might be disputed. People who had, or perhaps had not the best opinion of the abilities of those in power, might presume that they intended nothing ill. Others, tho' they disapproved of their general conduct, might think them the dupes of their secret supporters; and even such as thought the most indifferently of them would be disposed to look upon them rather as tools, than arraign them as principals in so unnatural and horrid a conspiracy against the liberties of their country. But what might be the secret designs of a junto, or the venal alacrity of despicable cyphers whom they employed to effect their traitorous purposes, was, he said, to be no part of the subject of enquiry this day. He did not mean to tease or insult the House with idle surmises, with floating vague suspicions, leading to partial deductions or speculative charges, conceived and spun out of his own brain; but wished to draw their attention to certain well known, indisputable, incontrovertible facts. His proposed enquiry would not be directed to ascertain the rights of Great Britain, or the subordinate claims of America, to explain the constitutional connexion between taxation and representation; what was rebellion, or what legal resistance; whether all America ought to have been punished and proscribed for the intemperate zeal or disobedience of a Boston mob. He did not even mean to dispute or controvert the expediency; nor in short, a single ministerial ground, on which the present measures respecting America were taken up, pursued, and defended. Those were all, for this day at least, to be absolutely laid aside. For argument sake he would allow, that administration had acted perfectly right; but while he granted this, he would take take up the matter from the very instant administration had agreed upon a plan of coercion. This era he fixed at the time the minister first proposed certain resolutions to the House in February 1774, as a ground of complaint, and followed it with the famous Boston port-bill. He then entered into an historical detail of the means employed to carry this plan of coercion into effect, in which he painted in the strongest colours, and held to view in the most striking lights, such a scene of folly in the cabinet, servile acquiescence in Parliament, and misconduct and ignorance in office and the field, as never before, he said, disgraced this nation, or indeed any other. He added, that our ministers wanted both wisdom and integrity, our Parliaments public spirit and discernment; and that our commanders by sea and land, were either deficient in abilities, or which was the most probable, had acted under orders that prevented them from executing the great objects of their command. No man could say but there had been mismanagement and misconduct somewhere. It was the chief object of his intended motion, to gain that species of information, which might be the means of discovering the true causes of both. Public justice demanded such an enquiry. The individuals on whom the obloquy rested, were entitled to be heard in their own defence. To withhold the information necessary to their justification, would be an insult to the nation, as well as an act of private injustice. None but the guilty could wish to evade it. No man as a soldier or sailor, be his rank ever so high, was sure of his honour a single minute, if he was to be buried under public disgrace, in order to shield, protect, or palliate the blunders and incapacity of others. If the ministers had planned with wisdom, and proportioned the force to the service: if the great officers in the several efficient departments had done all that depended on them, ably and faithfully, then it was plain, that the whole of the miscarriages that have happened may be deservedly imputed to our naval and military commanders. If, on the other hand, the latter acquitted themselves according to their instructions, and carried on their operations in proportion to the force, it was no less plain, that the cause of all the disgraces the British arms have suffered, arose from ignorance in those who planned, and incapacity and want of integrity in those to whom the carrying them into execution was in the first instance entrusted. He then recapitulated a great many circumstances to prove his general allegations, and entered into the conduct of administration respecting Canada, and repeated several arguments used at the time of the passing of the Quebec act, predicting what has since literally happened. He concluded by making the following motion:

That it be referred to a committee, to enquire into the causes of the ill success of his Majesty's arms in North-America; as also into the causes of the defection of the people of the province of Quebec.

Lord Oslory seconded the motion, and said, he could not perceive how any member in that House, who was unconnected with the ministry, and at the same time wished success to the American war, could be against it.

Lord Clare quoted the speech from the throne. He insisted, that was orthodox, and ought not to be questioned, particularly as nothing material had happened since, which could induce the House to alter its opinion. He insisted that the measure respecting the Hanover troops, was perfectly justifiable, and that the plea of necessity was never better founded than on that occasion. His lordship moved the previous question.

Right Honourable T. Townshend said, that the present motion would be a true test of what might hereafter be expected from them; for if they opposed it, it would fairly prove, that in smothering the enquiry, they intended to cover themselves from public disgrace, by a vote of that House.

Lord Mulgrave defended the naval operations: He contended, that the war was just and constitutional; that it was well conducted, and predicted that it would be happily and gloriously terminated.

Honourable Mr. Fitzpatrick replied to his Lordship, and remarked, though every thing he said was well founded, the conclusions he drew by no means followed. He insisted, that the whole of the American business, from the very beginning, had been planned in absurdity, accompanied by negligence, and executed in a manner which evidenced the very excess of ignorance, incapacity, and misconduct. That the House were called upon by the whole nation, and in vindication of their own honour; to exact an account from the servants of the crown, of the causes of the mismanagement of the American war, and to bring the authors to condign punishment, or at least to dismiss them, as no longer worthy of discharging the high and important trust delegated to them.

Sir Gilbert Elliot said, that the troubles now subsisting in America are of a much longer standing, though they had not assumed the present form, than the honourable gentlemen who spoke on the other side supposed, for they commenced ten years ago. He insisted, that if such an enquiry were at all proper, this was not the time. Several persons who would be the subject, as well as those whom it would be proper to examine in order to procure information, were at present on their proper stations in America; and others that are not employed, are not yet returned home. Taking it either way then, if no enquiry ought to be gone into, there was an end of the motion. If there ought to be an enquiry, the present motion was premature, neither the parties charged, nor those that could properly give the necessary information, being on the spot.

Mr. Dempster said, he was sorry to see such a disposition in administration to fluster and quash all enquiry. It looked as if they wanted to conceal something they were both afraid and ashamed should be brought to light. He, therefore, therefore, if ministry were not determined to confirm all the suspicions that had been entertained of them, both within and without doors, thought it was their interest, as it was their duty, to do all in their power to exculpate themselves, for he could assure them, however sure they might be of a majority, some of their best friends began to doubt the truth of their assurances, and the possibility of carrying their plans into execution. He then turned, and took a short view of the Quebec bill, and concluded by solemnly averring, that in his opinion, no Turkish emperor ever sent a more arbitrary and oppressive mandate, by a favourite bashaw, to a distant province, than that bill was, with the instructions to the governor, which accompanied it.

Right hon. Welbore Ellis said, that gentle moderate measures were unhappily pursued, when the situation of America called for the most strong and decisive. Thank God, says he, this mistaken system is now at an end: A powerful fleet, and a powerful army, are now going out, and I have not the slightest doubt that they will be sufficient to crush the rebellious Americans, and bring them back to a proper sense of their duty.

Mr. Adam said there had been very shameful neglect somewhere; that for that reason, he should be willing to go into the enquiry, and trace it to its source. That either we knew America was preparing, and failed to make the necessary preparations, or were guilty of very criminal negligence, in not procuring proper information. This he instanced in the want of convoys for the transports which failed early in the autumn.

Mr. Hey, Chief Justice of Quebec, went into the defence of the Quebec bill; gave an historical account of the place and people, their manners, customs, and disposition; said he knew them well, as he had lived among them for upwards of seven years; and by all he could ever learn, the people of Canada never wished nor expected that the Parliament should controul or superintend the King's government of that country. He then made an encomium on General Carleton; who, he said, had not been properly supported from hence.

Governor Johnston observed, that some gentlemen on the other side had insisted, if an enquiry was at all proper, it would be at the end of a war, not the beginning; for his part he was of opinion the earlier the better; nay, indeed, the first moment that the situation of affairs called for it; and he could not avoid being for it, though no other motive operated on him but the extreme reluctance shewn by several gentlemen; for where there was no guilt or conscious incapacity, there no fears could arise; said, if no enquiries had been set on foot, both in the beginning and middle of war, probably the two last would not have ended so successfully. This he shewed in the instances of Lestock, Matthews, Byng, &c. It was true, Ministers always trembled at enquiries, they were usually fatal to their power; so it happened at both the periods alluded to, and that was another reason why he was for the motion; for he was sure the present ministry were as unequal to the task of making war, as they were incapable of procuring good terms of peace or conciliation; the undertaking was too ponderous and unwieldy for them. He mentioned Lord North's attempt to negotiate with the American congress, and the contempt with which his offer was treated; stating the fact from the journal of the congress, published by their own authority.

Lord North disavowed it; declared he had never, directly nor indirectly, communicated, nor caused to be communicated, any letter or paper, to the congress. He admitted the paper published in the journal of the congress, contained his sentiments, but that was all.

General Burgoyne defended the operations of war in America.

Mr. Cruger. The honourable gentleman who opened this debate, has spoken so fully and eloquently to every part of the question, that any thing farther in support of this motion may appear unnecessary. But, Sir, when a subject of so much importance is before the House, it behoves every man to lay aside the reserve of diffidence, and express his sentiments with freedom and candour.

If there is any point in which the different interests of this House should unite, it must be in a conviction of the necessity and expediency of enquiring into the causes of the present alarming state of public affairs. By discovering what has proved ruinous in the past, we may learn at least to avoid the same pernicious steps for the future. If their measures have been conducted with justice and prudence, 'tis a duty which administration owe to their characters, to disarm, by a free examination, that censure on their conduct which may possibly arise from ignorance. But if they love darkness rather than light, "because their deeds are evil," it becomes the guardians of the nation to drag their miscarriages into open day, and expose them, with all their deformities, to public investigation.

If such an enquiry was ever necessary, the present time demands it. If we look to the past, one uniform train of disappointments and misfortunes crowd the view; if to the future, a gloomy prospect of increasing miseries, from a continuance of the same left-handed policy, and ill-projected measures.

We are involved in a war, in which success itself will be ruinous. The colonies, as if animated with one soul, are determined to perish or be free. We are told they must be subdued. We shall soon be called upon to make new exertions by force. Every thing wears the face of hostile preparations; and, as if disappointment could create confidence, we are urged to pursue the same fatal measures, by arguments drawn from their miscarriage; Nothing, 'tis now said, said, will satisfy America but independence; that the people of that country have almost universally taken up arms; they act not only on the defensive, but have endeavoured to deprive you of all Canada; an enquiry, they say, would produce a fatal procrastination; the urgency and necessity of the case demand and justify immediate vigour and execution. These must be pursued, or the government of the colonies surrendered to an ambitious congress."

Such are the reasons advanced to preclude enquiry, and to procure a hasty acquiescence in schemes of policy, on which the fate of the empire so materially depends. By such arguments as these our jealousy is excited, and our resentment inflamed against a people, who, after the most earnest endeavours to preserve their liberties from invasion by petition and remonstrance; after having repeatedly submitted their complaints (without effect) to the justice of Parliament, and laid them humbly at the foot of the Throne; after beholding the formidable preparations to divest them of their rights by the sword; after finding hostilities already commenced and fresh violence threatened, have taken up arms in their own defence, and endeavoured to repel destructive force by force.

The complexion and character of their present opposition (whether unjust or honourable) rests not on their present measures, but arises from, and must be weighed by, the causes, which have made such a conduct and such measures necessary. A free and impartial enquiry, therefore, into the leading and primary causes, is indispensably necessary to a just decision of the case. If their claims of exemption from parliamentary taxation are founded in equity and the principles of the constitution; if they have been driven by a wanton, cruel, and impolitic attack on their privileges to their present desperate defence; then, the whole guilt and censure is chargeable on those, and those alone, whose ambition, and ill-directed measures have forced them to these extremities. Thus, also, if a form of government is introduced into Canada, (breathing little of the spirit of English liberty) and intended to link the Canadians to the chain of ministerial influence; if they scrupled not to make a religion, which has so often deluged Europe with blood, an engine of their despotism to crush the Protestant colonies; if every artifice was used to seduce and employ a servile, bigoted people to subvert the liberties of America, can we wonder, can we complain, if the colonists wisely diverted the storm, and secured a country to their own alliance, the strength and arms of which were avowedly to be directed to their destruction?

When what was dearer to them than their lives—their liberties, were at stake; when their opposition to government reached no higher than petition and resolves, then they were stigmatized with want of courage. Every method was taken to irritate them.

Insults on their character as a people were added to encroachments on their rights as citizens. The pencil of confident oppression described them a herd of pusillanimous wretches, whom the appearance of martial array would terrify into submission. How unjust, how impolitic, to reduce men to the miserable alternative of being branded with the epithet of cowards, or of taking up arms to vindicate their injured honour and liberties; first to compel them to resistance, and then derive arguments of their guilt from their vigour, courage, and success. How contemptible the cause which pleads the misfortunes it has occasioned, as reasons for its support!

The arguments of administration, stripped of their false colourings, with all humility, I conceive to be these: "We have plunged Great Britain into a most expensive and ruinous contest with her colonies; we have opened the door for endless animosities, by reviving disputed questions and claims which shake the foundation of the empire. The measures we have pursued have increased the storm, and multiplied the common misfortunes. We have joined all America in a firm league against you. Your trade has been impaired; your ships insulted and taken. We have lost for you every place of strength or importance in the colonies; and have left you an army broken by sickness, fatigue, and want, and now perishing under all the mortifications, ignominy, and miseries of an inglorious imprisonment." "These," say they, "are our pleas for support; these are the recommendations of our councils. We lay before you the miscarriages and evils which our past measures have produced, to persuade you to place new confidence in our wisdom, and to give more liberal aid to our judicious schemes for the future."

These, however, are not the only blushing honours which deck the temples of administration. They have lately displayed the happy art of drawing arguments in their favour, from the misfortunes of their friends, as well as from the success of their enemies, and prove that they are as incapable of gratitude as of justice. When gentlemen in this House (influenced by motives of humanity) recommended an exemption of the friends of government in the colonies from the rigours of the late prohibitory bill, administration suddenly changed its voice; and they who just before had boasted that a majority of the Americans were friendly to their cause, and only waited an opportunity to declare it with safety, now pronounced, that no distinction could be made, for that they had preserved at best "a shameful neutrality," and deserved to be subject to the common calamity of their country. This was the liberal reward bestowed on men who espoused their cause from principle, and maintained it undaunted and unsupported, through obloquy, and the most imminent danger to their fortunes, families, and lives.

I will not at present trespass on the patience tience of the House, by entering into particulars, but I cannot forbear saying, the friends of peace and good order in the province of New York, did not deserve to be reproached with a shameful neutrality; they stood forth, and opposed, as long as they were able, the increasing current of tumult and disorder, and exposed themselves, by their endeavours to preserve their colonial constitution, to the resentment and vengeance of their incensed neighbours. In a dutiful manner they submitted their grievances to the clemency of this House, and the justice of their sovereign. I need not insist on the consequences. I shall not dwell on the contempt with which their zealous advances to a reconciliation were rejected. But this I must desire, all those who declaim on their ignominious neutrality, to remember, that administration not only neglected to aid them with a force sufficient to maintain their opposition against the zealots in their own province, and the united powers of the adjacent colonies, but withdrew to Boston the few troops under the command of Gen. Haldimand, which might have assisted in preserving order, and the freedom and impartiality of public proceedings. By such means the colony was laid open to incursions; many were obliged to secure themselves from danger, by forsaking their friends and country, and leaving their property at the discretion of their enemies, whilst a greater number waited, with silent patience, under every affliction, for the vigorous protection of Great-Britain.

Account of the Proceedings of the American Colonists, since the passing the Boston Port-Bill. Continued from p. 267.

SINCE the privilege of a free correspondence with America has been restrained, it is not easy to select from the current accounts a few pages of credit enough to fix the attention of readers who wish only to be truly informed.

Facts there are that too plainly bespeak the direful effects of that fatal contest that has divided the British empire against itself; but these facts are so differently related, that they leave a doubt in the reader to which side he ought to ascribe the greatest cruelty.

Most people believe that the late flourishing town of Norfolk, the fairest and best-inhabited sea-port in the province of Virginia, is burnt to the ground; but it is not yet certainly known on this side the Atlantic who were the incendiaries.

The first intimation the public received of this cruel and wanton conflagration, was by a letter dated Otter, off the Ruins of Norfolk, Jan. 9. in which was this memorable exultation: "The detested town of Norfolk is no more! Its destruction happened on New-Year's-day! About four o'clock in the afternoon the signal was given from the Liverpool, when a dreadful cannonading began from three ships, which lasted till it was too hot for the rebels to stand on their wharfs. Our boats now landed and set fire to the town in several places. It burnt fiercely all night and the next day, nor are the flames yet extinguished; but no more of Norfolk remains than about 12 houses that have escaped the flames.

Another letter dated Jan. 12. said to be written by a gentleman to his correspondent at London, confirms the above, and after naming the Liverpool frigate, the Otter and King-fisher sloops, with their tenders, as engaged in the cannonading, and setting fire to the different wharfs, adds, "that the rebels have since burnt the rest, and plundered the property of every supposed friend to government, wherever their effects could be found."

A third letter mentions the burning of a Liverpool ship at the same time, namely, the Molly, Capt. Collins, commander.

A fourth letter, dated Ship Dunmore, Jan. 15. assigns the cause of setting fire to the town; "that the firing from the rebels made it necessary to destroy that part of it next the water, and that as the wind was moderate, and blew from the shore, it was judged with certainty that the destruction would end with that part of the town which the King's ships meant only to destroy; but that the rebels unnecessarily completed the destruction of the rest by setting fire to the houses in the back streets, which were before safe from the flames;" adding, "that this ill-judged fury of the rebels was not confined to the town; the country round was illuminated with the houses burnt, among which was the distillery, with large quantities of rum, &c."

All these letters concur in the principal fact; but here follows one from a merchant on the spot to his correspondent at Liverpool, dated so late as Feb. 20. which essentially differs from all the former, and ascribes the firing of the town on the first of January to the shirtmen, 'who continued plundering and destroying till the 6th of February, when at four o'clock in the morning the signal was given, and every house from Farmer's Plantation, tan-works, windmills, churches, &c. were all set on fire, and so quick you could not tell which began first. The writer adds, the people are in great distress, but that he and his friends, thank God, have plenty of provisions and are in perfect health.'

We shall only observe on these letters, that, notwithstanding their apparent authenticity, there are some who discredit the fact, and contend, that though parties from the ships might set fire to the wharfs, the wind from the shore with certainty blew out the flames. There are others, who, with equal reason, conclude, from the silence of the last-mentioned letter-writer, and from other circumstances that will be mentioned hereafter, that, though they deplore the fate of the town, the parties from the ships had no hand in the burning of it. Indeed, one very striking argument in favour of this conclusion is founded on the information in an intercepted letter written by a rebel son in the Provincial army to his more rebellious father in the Provincial Congress, in which is this positive assertion: "I am convinced our instructions will be immediately to burn Norfolk, a place full of the vilest wilest Tories in the world.—We have been the more particular in our endeavours to elucidate this fact, as the London Gazette, the fountain of all true intelligence, has thought fit to pass it over without notice, as a matter of little or no importance, though the writer has been very precise in fixing the date when the King of Prussia first took an airing on horseback, after his late illness.

Indeed, the accounts relative to Quebec are very little more to be depended upon than those already related concerning Norfolk. An officer lately arrived from New-York, in a letter to his friend at Manchester, acquaints him, in addition to the information given in the Gazette, that Davy Wooster, on hearing the news of the disaster at Quebec, marched off with his three companies from Montreal for St. John's; that John Lamb, the "chief engineer, at Quebec, was shot in the eye, and was prisoner, and so was Arnold, though the Gazette was silent about them; and that the widow Montgomery has been distracted ever since she learnt the fate of her husband." But this letter, (though evidently written by an officer,) like those already recited, is no more to be depended upon than if written by a private soldier, for it has since appeared, upon rather better authority than that of one single testimony, that Wooster has not retreated from Montreal, and that Arnold is not prisoner in Quebec.

But the accounts of the continuance of the blockade before Quebec, during the severity of the winter, are, we think, still more to be suspected. It is but barely probable that the hardiest and best disciplined troops in the King's service could have been kept together for so many months, buried in snow, as the besiegers must have been, even if those veterans had been ever so well supplied with necessaries. Is it credible, then, that a raw undisciplined rabble, ill-clothed and provided, and with hardly shoes to their feet, as the Provincials are represented to be, can have been compelled by officers, to whom they scarce own submission, to endure the hardships of a winter's blockade in a climate, where being exposed to the rigour of the cold is the certain loss of that part of the body that, as the phrase is, is bitten by the frost? The intelligent reader will therefore suspend his belief of all those heroic wonders that have been said to succeed the late attack of Quebec, and join with us in humbly hoping that no more blood may be shed in this rebellious attempt, and that British and American troops may cease to butcher one another for the diversion of their natural enemies.

The late advices received from Boston leaves it no longer doubtful that the King's troops are removed from that city. This retreat was foreseen and foretold several months ago, and intimations thrown out in the papers that orders were sent from hence for that purpose: the reason assigned was, that the troops might be in readiness, as soon as succour should arrive, to effect a landing at some place which may open a communication with the interior parts of the country: but this notice was at the time totally disregarded.

The following plain narrative of the army's retreat, removal we should say, is copied from the London Gazette verbatim.

"Whitehall, May 3. General Howe, commander in chief of his majesty's forces in North-America, having taken a resolution on the 7th of March to remove from Boston to Halifax with the troops under his command, and such of the inhabitants with their effects, as were desirous to continue under the protection of his majesty's forces; the embarkation was effected on the 17th of that month, with the greatest order and regularity, and without the least interruption from the rebels. When the packet came away, the first division of the transports were under sail, and the remainder were preparing to follow in a few days; the admiral leaving behind as many of the ships of war as could be spared from the convoy, for the security and protection of such vessels as might be bound to Boston."
